I leaped from the car. "Good-by!" I screamed. As I rushed for the building I could still see his horrible, freckled face looking after me, smiling.

Well, time went by. One thing about school, I thought gratefully as I entered the halls, it always rests me, in a way. At free period, I was sitting with Norma and Kate and some of the girls when Marsh came up.

"Greetings," he said. "How's my favorite split personality today?"

"Hello, Marsh," I said. I was aware of a hushed silence among the girls as they gazed at him and then at me in an awed silence.

"You know," he said, dropping down beside me on the lawn, "I've been worried about you. As a matter of fact, I've decided to devote some time to your problem. How about Saturday night?"

"Sorry," I said mechanically, "Saturday night's the prom." (Sammy always takes me to that.)

"Well, we could start there," Marsh said agreeably. "Eight o'clock?"

"No," I explained, "I have a date ——" I stopped. "Feel free"—that's what Sammy had said. Well, why not? I smiled brilliantly at Marsh. "Why not?" I said.

"Good deal." He stood up, spread his smile generously about the group. There was a reverent silence after he had gone.

"Marsh Hammond," Norma said at last, in a quiet voice. "For the prom! Wow!"

"You better watch out," Kate said practically, "Sammy is going to kill you. Or Marsh. Or both of you," she added with interest.

"That's right," said somebody else, "you better watch out, Laurie; I'll bet Sammy will be wild ——"

I sighed. "I hope so," I said simply. "I certainly hope so."

I waited until that afternoon, when we were parked in front of my house after school, to do it. "Sammy," I said, "I don't know quite how to tell you this," I said, "but I saw Marsh today, and—well—he asked me to go to the prom." I turned and looked him full in the face. "Somehow," I said, "I just found myself saying yes."

There was a moment of silence while Sammy looked at me, and I almost thought I saw it—a shadow of actual human emotion in his face. Then he smiled. "Well," he said, "that's good."

"Good!" I screeched, forgetting all my plans. "Good—what do you mean, that's good! We always go to the prom together—or have you forgotten?"

Sammy blinked. "Well, no," he said, "I hadn't forgotten, Laurie. But if you want to go to the prom with Marsh ——" He stopped. "You do want to go with him, Laurie, don't you?" he said.

Well, I don't think I have ever been so mad at Sammy before in my life, and I have been awfully mad at him. "Yes," I screamed, "yes, I do! I want to go to the prom with Marsh so much I can hardly stand it!" I jumped out of the car and rushed into the house. I slammed the door and leaned against it, trembling. Well, I thought finally, when I heard the sound of Sammy's car pulling away, well, that's it. Sammy doesn't love me any more. He not only doesn't care if I go with Marsh—he's glad. You wanted to find out, and now you have.

Dully I plodded up the stairs to my room. Sinking down on the bench that Sammy had made for me in Wood Shop, I stared blankly at my reflection in the mirror.

"Well, Laurie Merritt," I said aloud, "let's face it. There go six of the best years of your life, shot to bits."

"What was that, dear?" It was mother, calling out over the noise of the vacuum cleaner in the hall.

I sighed. "I just said," I shouted, "that I have just lost six of the best years of my life."

"Well, dear," mother called back over her shoulder, "if I've told you once, I've told you a thousand times, you should be more careful with your things."

A faint smile crossed my face. How wonderful to be like mother, I thought. Life is a tragedy for those who feel. I sat. After a long time, I heard them calling me to dinner.

They were all sitting at the table—mother, daddy, Andrea. I slipped into my seat and tried to smile.

"M'm-m-m-m," daddy said, taking the lid off the platter and making a loud, animal sound. "Fried chicken! Laurie's favorite!"

I picked up my fork and stared at the food on my plate. I put the fork back down. "I cannot eat this poor, dead thing," I said quietly.

"What's wrong with her?" daddy said.

"Laurie, dear, what is it?" mother said anxiously. "Don't you feel well?"

"She has had a fight with Sammy," Andrea said calmly. "Pass the mashed potatoes, please."

Daddy laughed in a relieved way and reached for a drumstick. He waved it at me. "Eat up, kid," he said. He took a huge bite.

I sat looking at them all. A person's whole world comes crumbling in about her, and, for everyone else, life goes on. It's brutal, but there it is. Probably right this very minute, I thought grimly, Sammy Hastings was stuffing his ugly face, just as if he hadn't ruined my entire life. I took a deep breath. I had, I decided coldly, made up my mind. For the last time I had given my heart to a man to tear. I had been hurt enough. From now on, I would take what I wanted from life. Men would be toys to be used, and thrown aside. Marsh Hammond, I thought calmly, would be a good toy with which to start.

I looked at Andrea. "I would appreciate it," I said, "if you wouldn't mention Sammy Hastings to me again. Incidentally," I said, including them all, "Marsh Hammond is taking me to the prom." I picked up my fork. "Pass the potatoes," I said.

The next three days went fast. As I had thought, Marsh was fascinated with the one girl around who could look at him without going into shock. It wouldn't last, but then, I thought coolly, what does? Marsh was with me everywhere—he walked me to class, he drove me home, he came over every night. The girls regarded me in a stunned silence that was almost awe, and I could tell that even Andrea was impressed. Only Sammy remained unchanged. Whenever I saw him he was as revoltingly lighthearted and cheerful as ever. How, I wondered miserably, could I ever have been so mistaken about a man?

I had a new white nylon net for the prom, and as I dressed I made up my mind that this would be a night to remember. Marsh was easily the most attractive man I had ever known, I reminded myself. Beside him, Sammy's knobby, freckled face was that of a gargoyle. What's more, Marsh was crazy about me. I was the envy of every girl in school. Tonight, I decided, I was going to live.

Well, I certainly tried hard. I wore Andrea's best perfume, I laughed, I danced, I gave it everything I had. Finally, when the dance was over, and we had had hamburgers at Carpenter's with the rest of the kids and Marsh had driven up and parked underneath the trees in front of my house, I collapsed against his shoulder, weak with effort.

"Marsh, dear," I said tenderly, "you're a lovely boy. Good night." It's not your fault, I thought sadly, that you aren't Sammy.

Marsh chuckled and put his arms around me. "Laurie," he said softly, "I like you. I like you a lot." The way he said it, he might have been making an award. Then he kissed me.

Finally, he stopped. I sighed, and shook my head. I just couldn't believe it. "Marsh," I said, "would you mind doing that again?"

Marsh smiled. "Not at all," he said graciously. He kissed me again. I sat quietly, waiting. Finally I put my hands on his chest and gently pushed. He let go. I looked up at him. Sadly, I shook my head.

"Nothing," I said.

Marsh just laughed and put his arms back. This time I had to push harder. (He was a very confident boy.) "Stop!" I said.

He let go and slid over away from me. "What's the matter?" he said, grinning. "Afraid I'm going to lead you astray?"

"When I decide to go astray," I said tiredly, "no one will have to lead me." I picked up my little pearl-beaded evening bag that Sammy had given me. "Good night," I said.

THE BIRDS BEGIN TO GATHER

By ELIZABETH COATSWORTH

The Turk's-cap lily unfolds his flower, the Queen Anne's lace is spread by every roadside like a dower, the bird-cherries hang there red,
the bird-cherries hang there red and the little birds come to the feast, and every guest is welcomed and fed from the greatest to the least.

The nests are empty, young wings grow strong,
the hayfields sway with the breeze, now is the time for occasional song from the curtained shadows of trees,
from the curtained shadows of trees
the occasional songs still rise, but the singers are dreaming of lands, not these, under tropical skies.

"Hey, Laurie, wait a minute." Marsh put his hand on my shoulder, and I paused. "Look," he said, "I'm sorry—maybe I rushed you a little. I should have told you first."

"Told me what?" I said absently, wondering what Sammy was doing tonight. He hadn't been at the prom. But, I thought, I bet he's got a date. Probably they want to be alone. Probably they're parked somewhere right now, taking life by the throat —— "H'm-m?" I said, aware that Marsh was talking.

He was smiling at me like Santa Claus. "I've decided," he said impressively, "to ask you to go steady."

"Well," I said, "that's awfully nice of you, Marsh, and I appreciate the honor and all, but I'm afraid not."

He didn't seem to hear me. "You might not think it," he was saying seriously, "with my type of guy, but I like to go steady. Always have. There's just one thing"—he looked at me warningly—"when I go steady with a girl, she's mine—all mine."

I looked at him with sudden interest. "Tell me," I said, "what you mean."

"Well," Marsh said, "now take this Hastings guy—he's O.K.," he said generously. "I've got nothing against him—but he's got to stop hanging around. Like I saw you talking to him at the drinking fountain yesterday after fifth period." He frowned. "I don't like that."

"I'll remember it," I said, fascinated. "Go on."

"When you're my girl," Marsh said, "you're my girl, that's all. My girl doesn't walk to class with other guys, she doesn't get phone calls from other guys, she doesn't dance with other guys." He smiled at me. "Do you dig me?" he said affectionately.

I gazed at him, appalled. And this, I thought, with horror, was what I wanted Sammy to be! I couldn't say a word.

"Now, you live next door to this guy Hastings," Marsh was saying, frowning, "and there's not much I can do about that ——"

"I could speak to daddy about moving," I offered.

Marsh laughed politely. "But the main thing," he said, "is that my girl is mine—understand?"

I looked at him. "Why don't you just put a collar around her neck," I suggested, "and chain her to a ring in the floor?"

Marsh looked puzzled. "Who?" he said.

"Your girl," I said, reaching for the door handle. "I'm afraid I haven't got the qualifications." I smiled at him then. "I'm sorry, Marsh, I appreciate it, but we wouldn't get along. And anyway," I added honestly, "it wouldn't be any use. I love somebody else."

Marsh stared at me. "What?"

"Somebody else," I said. "Another boy." I suppose, I thought, this comes as a sort of shock. "Try to understand," I urged. "I love somebody else."

Marsh was frowning now. "Who is it?" he said crossly. "That Hastings character?"

I sighed. Why deny it? "Yes," I said simply.

Marsh laughed. "Well," he said, "all I can say is, if you're his girl, he certainly doesn't act like it. If you ask me, he's trying to get off the hook."

"I know," I said sadly. "I think so too." To my horror, two large tears welled into my eyes. "Good night," I said hastily. I held out my hand, blinking back the tears. "It's been fun," I said.

Marsh took hold of my hand and shook it solemnly. "You're a kind of a strange girl, Laurie," he said, "but you're a good kid."

"Thank you, Marsh," I said.

"I feel pretty bad about this," Marsh said. "I really wanted to go steady with you. You're different," he said.

"I know," I said, "but it's only because I'm in love with somebody else." I patted him. "You'll be all right. There are two thousand students at Glendale High, Marsh," I said encouragingly, "and half of them are girls!"

Slowly Marsh began to grin. He got out and opened the door. "We'll always be friends, though," he said, as we walked to the door.

"Sure," I said, stepping inside. I'm getting a lot of friends, I thought wanly.

I went quietly upstairs and sat down on my bed. It wasn't any use. I was still in love with Sammy, and nothing was going to change it. I guess, I thought sadly, I'll always be in love with Sammy. I walked slowly over and looked at his picture in the moonlight that was coming through the window. I thought about the first time he'd kissed me, and the night he'd given me his class ring. I suppose I ought to give it back, I thought. He might want to give it to somebody else!

It was such an awful thought that I sat down. I closed my eyes, but it didn't do any good. Slowly a well-drawn picture was forming itself in my mind. . . . Sammy, with another girl. Sammy's car, pulling up beneath the trees at our favorite spot above the ocean. Sammy—his face intent, absorbed, as he turned toward the girl beside him in the darkness. A lovely girl—smiling faintly as she looked up at him, her face beautiful and mysterious in the moonlight. Sammy saying something, smiling, and then the girl laughing, and quickly, almost hungrily, Sammy taking her in his arms. . . . I leaped to my feet. I can't stand it, I thought, I simply can't stand it, that's all. Wildly I looked about the room. I'll go away, I thought. I'll —— That was when I saw it. The light was on in the Hastings garage. At two o'clock in the morning!

Slowly I crossed to the window and stood looking down. Sammy must be working on his car. Whenever Sammy was upset, he worked on his car. Poor Sammy, I thought, he probably feels guilty about me. He wouldn't want to hurt me, like this. Suddenly, then, I knew what I had to do. Quickly, before I could change my mind, I took one last look at the ring on my finger and then turned and hurried down the stairs. This much, at least, I could do, I decided. I could set him free.

The garage door was open, and I could see Sammy as I hurried quietly up the driveway. He was wearing his overalls that he always wears for working on the car, and they were covered with grease. There was grease on the end of his nose, on his cheek, and it was smeared in his blond hair. But he wasn't working on the car now, he was just sitting on an orange crate in the corner. He had a handful of something—nuts and bolts, I decided—and he was tossing them, one at a time, into two empty coffee cans on the floor. Puzzled, I crept closer.

Sammy dropped one into one can. "She loves me," he said dully. He dropped one into the other. "She loves me not." He sighed. He dropped another one. "She loves me ——"

I stepped forward, holding my breath, a strange, beautiful thought trying to be born in my mind. "Sammy," I said quietly, "what are you doing?"

Sammy looked up. He didn't seem too surprised to see me. "Oh," he said. "Hello, Laurie."

"What are you doing?" I said again.

Sammy smiled at me wanly. "You look good," he said, and I realized I still had on my white formal, and Marsh's orchid. Then I realized something else. Sammy, I saw suddenly, looked awful! His face seemed even bonier than usual, and everything about him drooped. "Have a good time?" he said, trying to go on smiling.

"Sammy," I said, "you look perfectly terrible. What's wrong?"

Sammy shrugged. "Oh, nothing," he said. "It's just that ——" He paused. "Well, frankly, Laurie," he said, "I think I'm cracking up."

I stared at him. "Cracking up?" I said.

"Well," Sammy said, shrugging, "after all, if you like somebody better, then you like somebody better, that's all. It's not your fault ——"

"Sammy," I said clearly, "what are you talking about?"

Sammy looked puzzled. "You and Marsh," he said; "what else?"

"Oh, Sammy," I said, "then you did care, after all. You mean you really haven't been trying to give me the brush?"

Sammy stared at me. "Me trying to give you the brush!" he repeated in a stunned voice. "Man!" he said. "I think I'll just go off alone somewhere and meditate on the sound of the clapping of one hand."

"Well, for heaven's sake," I said, "all these days you haven't done a single thing to stop me. You never got jealous—I thought ——"

Sammy shook his head in a dazed way, and then he walked toward me. "Look, Laurie," he said, "you were going for Marsh—what was I supposed to do? I had to let you find out for yourself who you wanted. Otherwise, how would you ever be sure? How would I? And anyhow," he said, "a man can't force a girl to love him—it's no good that way." He shook his head slowly. "Man!" he said. "I've aged!"

I just stood and looked at him then, and suddenly I couldn't see him very well, because there were tears in my eyes. I'd thought Sammy didn't love me because he hadn't been jealous and mad and selfish. And all the time it had been because he did—because he loved me so much, he couldn't get jealous.

"Sammy," I said, "I've been so dumb. I've just been trying to make you jealous of Marsh. You're the only boy I could ever love."

"Man!" Sammy said sickly. "Now she tells me!"

Suddenly, then, I couldn't stand it—the anxious, miserable look on Sammy's face. I threw my arms around his neck and kissed him, white formal and orchid and grease and all. It was just like coming home after you've been away for a long time. Suddenly Sammy raised his head and dropped the rest of the nuts and bolts into one of the coffee cans.

"She loves me!" he said with finality. Then, of course, he kissed me again, and it was all mixed up with grease and oil and the smell of gasoline—and it was wonderful. END

Second Marriage

BY NEAL G. STUART

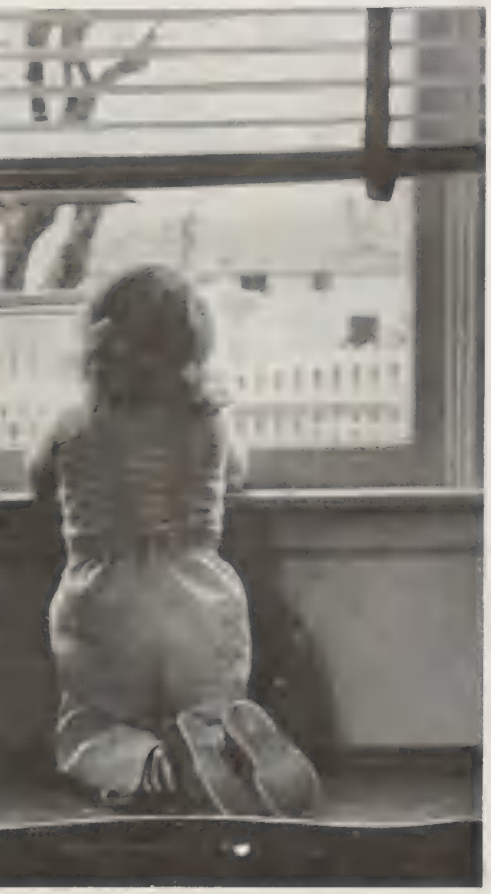
PHOTOGRAPHS BY JOSEPH DI PIETRO

"I made a lot of mistakes when I was young because there were so many things I didn't know. Now, with Bob's help, I think I have found myself." Brought up in foster homes and institutions without a mother's counsel, Ann Palmer has at long last won through to happy marriage.

One winter day in 1953, a young woman whose life was at sixes and sevens sat down and wrote a letter to a farm journal with a national rural circulation, Mother's Home-Life and The Household Guest. Her letter read:

Lebanon, Oregon

I am 27 years old and my birthday is September 21. I have four children, girls 8 and 10 years old and boys 6 and 2. My hobbies are writing for magazines; contests; and pen pals. I have no racial or religious prejudices and would love to receive letters from everyone. I promise to answer all, and if there is anything I can do for anyone, I will be glad to. Hope this escapes the clutches of that horrible Mr. W. B. [wastebasket] and that my mailbox will be filled to overflowing. God bless you all.



ANN SCHUELLER

The letter was typical of Ann's practical sort of energy. She had earned money for the typewriter it was written on by baby-sitting at home, even though her own two youngest were hardly more than babies themselves. She was considering taking in boarders in the big old house her husband rented, to raise some extra money, even though the family had barely enough beds for themselves. But her carefully cheerful letter made no mention of the problem that was most on her mind: an unhappy marriage. She had been thinking about divorce on and off for several years, but the combination of the children and lack of money had kept her stringing along in a bad situation which had recently deteriorated completely. Her husband had turned the house over to her and kept to himself in a single bedroom of his own. Ann scarcely saw him, and she was determined to find a lawyer, although she wasn't sure how these things were managed. From here on, as a woman with four children and no husband, anything she made of her life would depend on her own enterprise, and this letter was an enterprising impulse to find some friends.

Mother's Home-Life ran it in its August, 1953, issue. Over 2000 miles from Ann, a young man who lived on his family's farm in Ohio was among those Bob Palmer, bachelor, met Ann and her four children "by mail." Stepchildren, as well as his own first baby, Evelyn, all call him "dad." "You'd never know they weren't all his," say Albany, Oregon, neighbors.

"I was a worrier," says Bob. "Ann gave me courage to buy a house in spite of all the obstacles."

HOW AMERICA LIVES

Noontime ritual: No matter what they are doing, Evelyn runs to window, Ann to the door to watch for Bob. They don't want to miss a second of his brief lunch visit. He comes home because "nowhere else is so interesting."

Ann usually sets dinner table for lunch; today is hurried. Dishes washed, Evelyn and Bobby napping, Ann will work at contest hobby: she's won $150, a supply of frozen dinners. Then mending, school children home. Older girls help cook, older boy tends to wood, Bobby and Evelyn bring in milk.

who lighted upon it. He was having to kill a hot August night in an office on the porch of the family home, because his father was the local justice of the peace, he was the constable, and somebody had to man the telephone. A storm was brewing in the west, but a dull evening stretched ahead. He picked up his mother's copy of the magazine and settled down to read it. Eventually he came to Ann's letter, and it seemed to him to have more life than most such letters. It was also by someone his age, whereas most of the "Homemakers' Club's" correspondents were older farmwives. He figured from her signature that no husband was around.

Robert Palmer had had four years away from home in Washington, D.C., but even in those years he had never been much of a blade. He says of himself, "Deep down basically inside me, I suppose I'm a farmer at heart. Another one of my troubles—I'm shy. That August I was nearly twenty-eight, and most of my friends were married. I was an outsider, and I was thinking of myself as a confirmed bachelor." In spite of all this, or perhaps because of it, he picked up a pad of yellow legal paper and wrote an answering letter to Ann on the spot:

Dear Ann: You will no doubt be surprised by receiving a letter from a man who saw your letter. However, I happen to be one man who reads the magazine and enjoys it. Perhaps this is because I am interested in people and by reading their letters can come to understand more fully the different types and personalities of people. Your letter led me to believe that you must be a very interesting person, so I decided to write you a letter. However, I don't imagine I will get an answer, or will you fool me by writing me? I hope so. I will now give you a brief history of my past life so that you will be more familiar with my background.

My name is Robert Palmer and my friends call me Bob. I am 27 years of age, unmarried, 5′ 10″ in height, weight 150 pounds dripping wet (so you can see I am on the slender side) and have dark hair and eyes. My occupation is office worker-farmer. I live approximately 50 miles south of Cleveland in the state of Ohio at the village of West Salem. After graduation, I helped on our farms for a period of one year. I then obtained a position with the Government at Washington, D.C. I was in the employ of the Government for a period of three years as an office worker (white-collar red-tape boys, they called us).

I left the Government and obtained a position with the Washington Times-Herald as a salesman of classified advertising. I liked the newspaper position very much, but because of the poor health of my father I found it necessary after a year to return home and help run the farms. After a year and a half on the farm I obtained a position as assistant manager and bookkeeper at the local Farmers' Equity, where I am now employed. I also assist with the running of our farms.

I sincerely hope you will answer my letter as I get quite lonesome at times and receiving a letter would help to take away that lonesome feeling.

Trusting you will surprise me by dropping a few lines, I remain, Your friend,

BOB PALMER

Ann got about 200 answers to her letter, but she soon dropped her correspondence with the others (almost all women) in favor of Bob. She and Bob exchanged pictures, and Ann wrote breezily about the ups and downs of her life over the following months. Her husband had moved out of the house, accepting their separation as final. In February, she wrote that her divorce had been granted.

By spring she had moved with the children to a tiny apartment in nearby Albany, Oregon. She had been joined by her also-divorced sister, Mary, and Mary's two children, and the only money the two women had between them was a $150-a-month settlement from Ann's former husband, which he faithfully sent. There were times when the two families didn't have enough to eat, but Ann says, "Of course I never wrote to Bob how things were. I told him the funny things. As for his letters to me, I just lived for them."

Bob, meanwhile, found that he could express himself dashingly to this pretty (obvious from her pictures), vivacious (in letter style) girl—on paper. Soon he was calling her "Pretty Princess." One year and some hundred letters after their first exchange, he had raised the subject of marriage and was arranging to come out to see her. But he must have had a few last qualms, for on the back of his latest picture he wrote, "Look closely, beautiful Ann—if my heart must be broken, please break it before I come."

Bob arrived in the small agricultural county seat of Albany, Oregon, on August 17, 1954. He had never been farther west than his home town before, the plane trip into Portland had been rough, and he had been airsick from Montana on. He made the 70-mile trip up the green Willamette Valley to Albany by bus. Ann met him at the bus depot. Bob's first words were "Hello, Pretty Princess." Ann was so excited that she headed confusedly up the street until she remembered that her apartment was in the opposite direction.

Over the next three weeks Bob earned a little money picking beans. On September ninth they were married in a civil service in the courthouse at nearby Corvallis, because Ann, a Roman Catholic, could not remarry in her church. In the course of a few minutes Bob became the head of household of a full-sized family of children, and the husband of a girl who had written to him "all" her secrets, but whom he had known in person only briefly, and whose life had been uprooted since babyhood, in sharp contrast to his own.

Ann was born Anna Marie Lalor on September 21, 1925, in La Crosse, Wisconsin. She was the youngest of seven children, but the family broke up when the mother died six months after Ann's birth. The father put the six older children in an orphanage, from which they later went to foster homes, and Ann was received by the hospital where her mother had died. For more than a year she was something of a hospital pet. When she was nearly two, a woman patient with a bad leg offered to give the child a home. Miss Imelda Trayer, considerably older than the average mother of a two-year-old, lived in the village of Lansing, Iowa, with her unmarried brother, a Mississippi River clammer, and for the next ten years their house on the outskirts of the village became Ann's home.

Ann was raised to call the brother and sister "daddy" and "mamma" and knew nothing of her origin. Her first memories are of a strict household where "I didn't think of coming home late from school," and of having to wear "homemade clothes, long underwear, blouses in old-fashioned patterns to school." She says, "I was 'different' all the way. We were poor, and mamma was half invalid because of her leg, although I always knew she tried to be a good mother and raise me right. I wanted a family, so I made one up. I used to tell the kids at school about all my grown-up brothers and sisters who had gone away."

One day when Ann was 11, she was called in to clean up for "company." The caller was her brother Larry, then about 24, who had traced his little sister to Lansing. He was presented as a "friend," but Ann took to him on the spot. "I thought he was wonderful. Of course I didn't see many young people." Larry began coming to see her regularly and writing letters in between, signed "your pen pal."

Ann says, "One day after school one of the kids said to me, "'I saw your brother yesterday.' I think everyone in town knew more about me than I did.

"That night, something got into me. I was washing dishes and mamma was sitting behind me in the rocker, and I said, 'Is Larry my brother?' I could hear her gasp clear across the room. There wasn't anything she could do except tell the truth. The first thing that came into my mind was that I had a real mother. She told me my mother had died, and I stood there with tears dripping into the dishwater."

It turned out that all six of her brothers and sisters were scattered not so far away throughout Iowa and Wisconsin, and now that the truth was out, they all gathered at the Trayers' for a family get-together. To a little girl just turning 12, the emotional effect was tremendous. "I don't know when I've been so excited. I was so proud."

But she was also in a state of conflict. For the next year she would tell the Trayers that she wanted to live with her oldest sister, Lucille, then think how much they had done for her and change her mind. In the end, the mother of a school friend helped her leave. As Ann got into the car she said to Miss Trayer, "I'll be back before school starts." "No you won't," said Miss Trayer, who knew Ann's frame of mind.

Lucille was married to a man named Schueller, and lived in Carroll, Iowa, on a farm owned by her husband and his two older brothers, who shared the household. Ann arrived there before her thirteenth birthday in September, 1938, took her own last name of Lalor, and went through eighth grade. But the farm was a disappointment. "I'd hoped to wander about that big farm and soak up sun. I think I was looking for mothering. But there was so much work. I'd come home from school and find the work piled up for me." By the following spring she was writing to her beloved Larry, who lived in Racine, Wisconsin, with another sister, Louise, to ask if she could live with them. She says, "I was so unsettled I just didn't know what I wanted. I wanted to see all my family at once."

Larry and Louise shared a basement apartment, were out of work and on relief, but Ann says, "It was a lovely summer. They were just kids, too; we swam every day. We lived mostly on corn meal, I think."

With fall, Larry and Louise entered her in high school, and Ann, now 14, immediately felt hemmed in again. "I'd never been to a big-city school before. I didn't know anybody. I just hated it." One morning in November she left the apartment as though for school, went to the railroad tracks and headed down them instead. She had in mind to go to another brother, Bernard, in Milwaukee, some thirty miles due north. She says, "I started walking down those tracks at eight-thirty, and I didn't stop until two A.M. the next morning. I walked for a day and a night, and I was on the outskirts of Milwaukee. I had on new shoes that the welfare department had given me for school, and my feet hurt so bad they were all I could think of. I finally stopped when I saw a light in a little shop, with the idea of telephoning Bernard." The shop belonged to a photographer, and ten minutes later he had delivered her over to the police. The police found her name and Racine address in a schoolbook that she had doggedly carried with her the whole way, and by daylight she was back where she had started from.

The Palmers have exchanged love letters for four years—including the three years they've been married.

Ann finds a love note from Bob tucked under her pillow, hides an answer under his lunch plate. This year, from November to July, these often spoke of Ann's dream—"a baby boy for Bob."

HOW AMERICA LIVES

The episode strained her relations with Larry and Louise. Ann then made a decision that she has "never regretted." She wrote to a priest and asked for voluntary admission to the Good Shepherd Catholic home for girls in Milwaukee. Her choice seems to her now to have been divinely inspired. The home accepted her, and she lived the sequestered life of a convent girl for what were to be her last years of schooling. She says, "The nuns were so gentle. At one time I thought about becoming a nun, because their life is so peaceful. It settled me down." Ann's brothers and sisters had done their best, but it evidently took the gentle nuns to provide the maternal security she craved.

She went through two school years at Good Shepherd, learned typing and shorthand, and finished in the spring of 1941, a suddenly well-developed girl of 15. She went back to Lucille, her oldest married sister, on the farm in Carroll, Iowa. Here it quickly came over her that there was one way she could get the things she wanted—a home, a life of her own: by marrying. Her brother-in-law's two brothers lived with them, and Ann settled on Bill Schueller. He was 35 years older than she, but she says, "I wanted to be like Lucille—mistress of a house, and a grownup so nobody could boss me around. I was after Bill all that summer to marry me and take me away. We were finally married that October, one month after I was sixteen. Bill was fifty-one."

Almost none of the magic things happened after her marriage. Worst of all, Lucille was still the dominant woman of the house, and all that winter Ann "kept after" Bill to take her away. By now, defense jobs were to be had all over the country, and in March of 1942 the couple set forth by car.

Ann was a buxom (she weighed more at this age than she did later when she slimmed down to 110 pounds) and very young bride, who had along one of her most precious possessions—a composite photograph she had just had made from an old snapshot of her mother and another of herself as a

An information-packed article about your baby's care, feeding, growth and fun.

Can You Teach Your Baby To Talk?

You're a speech teacher long before your baby says his first word! "Mothers start influencing a child's speech from the day he is born," says Flora Rheta Schreiber in a fascinating new book, Your Child's Speech (G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1956). "Mother's arms, the tone of her voice, the aura of warmth she creates—these affect the way a child breathes and eats. They also affect the way he makes sounds and learns to speak." Through food, baby first finds pleasure and makes happy gurgling noises called "comfort" sounds! Soon he murmurs vowel sounds as he plays.

● Teaching tips: As you hand baby a toy dog, say its chief sound—"awg"—then say "dog." He gradually mimics your words and your tone (is it sweet and low or twangy and high?). Don't try to hurry baby's talking. Early or late—when his ear, mind and muscles are ready—a healthy, happy baby will talk.

● It's a tossup who's having more fun—father or baby! Just remind Dad: No roughhouse on a full tummy or right before bedtime.

● When you're "expecting"—why do you sometimes get special cravings for certain foods? You'll find the answer to this and hundreds of other questions in Heinz authoritative new book, "The ABC's of Prenatal Care." For your free copy, send your name and address to Heinz Baby Foods, Box 28, D-23, Pittsburgh 30, Pa.

● There's twice as much protein in Heinz exclusive new High-Protein Cereal than in regular baby cereals. Let your baby enjoy this nourishing dish with the pleasant nut-like taste soon. To fix it, just mix with milk or formula.

● Why does Heinz have exclusive baby-food kitchens in the nation's garden spots, right where the finest fruits and vegetables grow? So Heinz specialists can select the pick of each crop and pack it at flavor peak. That's how Heinz Baby Foods get their famous better color, perfect texture and finer flavor.

● Baby's face in the mirror is good company! Put him where he can laugh and play with his copy-cat friend.

● Delicious new time-saver: Strained Potatoes in a jar. They taste just like baby's buttery baked potato—but let you forget that daily baking-peeling-mashing chore! Fluffy, smooth Strained Potatoes—a Heinz Exclusive—are a fine source of energy (which your baby needs in his business!), plus Vitamin B_1, Niacin and Vitamin C—for his glowing good health. Later on, Strained Potatoes encourage baby's first tries at self-feeding; they don't go sliding off his spoon!

baby. The composite put the baby in her mother's lap, "because I wanted to be in my mommy's arms like everyone else." She had seen almost none of the good times of a young girl, and she still knew almost nothing of what marriage meant. Yet she had warmth and eagerness, and a picture scrapbook of babies and elegantly appointed interiors of homes that she had been snipping from magazine pages since she was a girl of 10, to feed her imagination.

They went to Arkansas, then Dallas, and by June were in the war-boom town of San Diego, California. Ann was pregnant by now, and dazzled by the sights of the city. In December of 1942 her first daughter, Eileen, was born. During 1943 Ann, then 17, discovered boys. She says, "I'd never been out with boys in my life, so they really were a discovery, and I flirted around. I was so dumb that I remember once begging Bill to let me go to the movies with a boy who thought I was his daughter. After Eileen was born, I'd pick her up and go downtown and see two shows in the afternoon. Then I'd go home and leave her with Bill and go out to see another."

Bill's reaction was to take the baby and walk out without warning. Ann discovered he had gone to Denver and followed him at once. "Bill had taken my baby; I had to go to her. I never even thought about it any other way. Bill was in Littleton, near Denver, and I settled down all at once and hard. I never saw another show again for nine years."

Two children were born in Littleton: Kathy in July, 1944, Billy in December, 1946. During these Colorado years Ann "just lived for the children." Bill put his foot down about her going anywhere at all alone, although he would take her downtown to shop. When she was visibly pregnant, he would walk a little ahead of her.

Ann, tormented by lack of companionship, began dreaming of divorce. To fill her mind, she started another scrapbook with pictures of her dream home, began entering contests, devoted herself to the children.

In 1948 they moved to Oregon, following a thyroid operation on Ann and a medical opinion that she should live in a lower altitude. They settled on the Willamette Valley town of Silverton, and four years followed of more loneliness compounded by real poverty. Bill couldn't find regular work, and Ann says, "There were times—many of them—when we didn't have enough to eat. In the summers Bill picked and we had fruit. In winters we lived on cottage cheese and toast. Our priest helped us out. We had bought a house when we first came, our first, and I was so thrilled I was like a little girl playing house. But we lost it, and that broke my heart."

The subject of divorce came more often to the surface. "Every time I threatened to leave, Bill would persuade me to have another baby thinking that would fix things up." Yet to outgoing Ann it seemed that undemonstrative Bill "wasn't interested in them when they came." Bobby was born in March of 1951, and in '52 Ann had a miscarriage that left her ill and discouraged.

That summer Bill finally got a job in the neighboring town of Lebanon, and it was at that time that the family moved into the big old rented house. Bill and Ann avoided each other, although Bill continued to support the family. It was in the loneliness of the winter of '53 that Ann wrote her letter to Mother's Home-Life.

In the three years since their wedding day Bob and Ann have so far thoroughly fooled anyone who might have questioned the chances of their marriage. It has had some strains, but all of them have been external. They are still in such a state of happy delight with each other that they relish like newlyweds the small, special intimacies of a couple in love. Bob (who says, "I can write things better than I can say them") sometimes writes little love notes and hides them under Ann's pillow. Ann promptly writes one back and may hide it under his lunch plate. On paydays he brings her little presents (perhaps a box of chocolate mints) which he calls her "pay." Every year they celebrate the anniversary of the day they met in the Albany bus depot "because we think it's a more exciting date than our wedding day." They exchange presents, and go down to the depot café for a cup of coffee. Last year they exchanged pajamas in a sensational "prisoner of love" chain-gang stripe.

By now they have a long list of things in common. Bob has gently nurtured a close and happy relationship between himself and Ann's first four children, all of whom call him "dad." They are attractive, affectionate children, and with little Bobby's entrance into first grade this fall all are in school. The birth of Bob's own first baby, little Evelyn, had him walking on air. Ann says, "It was the first time I'd been in the hospital that someone had given me flowers. I can still see them. He came in with a dozen big red roses." When their second was due this summer he wrote her a card, beginning ecstatically, "Methinks you are the prettiest, the sweetest, the nicest mother there could be." They went through the agony of house hunting together, and the joy of finding something even better than they had dared hope. Since then, they have thrown themselves into Sunday carpentering and improving with the enthusiasm of property-owners. Ann's feelings about having her own house after so many years are such that she can hardly enter her kitchen without exulting. She says, "I don't think either of us will ever take it for granted." And Bob, meanwhile, is ● Bob's salary is $85 a week, but his take-home check, after deductions for income and Social Security taxes, is $72.87, or $315.77 a month. Ann receives from her former husband $150 a month for the support of the four older children, so the net family income is $465.77. Every month they try to invest some money in property improvements. Their last project was graveling the dead end of road out front, and now they are saving to build a small addition to the house. They also try to put $50 in the bank each month for savings, although they also use this fund for irregular expenses, such as a $50 supply of wood in the fall and emergency repairs on the elderly car.

SUDDENLY A WIDOW WITH 5 CHILDREN TO SUPPORT

HOW AMERICA LIVES

nn was ordered to bed for most of the er, and her sympathetic doctor began giv- her expensive hormone shots and applying pressure about payment. But it was hard e ill, in bleak surroundings, with a feeling ebt piling up. Ann says, "Bob and Eileen, twelve, kept the house running. I couldn't e managed otherwise. Bob got breakfast lunch and brought it to me, and Eileen got ner and kept house." She adds, "It was a winter—the lowest point in our lives."

ob, meanwhile, showed the effect of the adjustments he was making by periodic ts of homesickness. He can talk about it n a rueful smile now. "It was awful rainy e that winter, and I wasn't used to that d of weather. I wasn't used to mountains er. I don't believe I'd seen a mountain ore I came out here. There were days when ould hardly keep from crying. I'd pack up Ann would say, 'Go ahead,' but I never ually left."

n April a telegram came from Bob's ther, saying that his father was very ill and thought he ought to come home. It was last little shove Bob needed. He quit his , he and Ann sold everything they could, e away the rest, and embarked for Ohio by n with the children. They had a drawing m so that Ann, still an invalid, could lie vn. He says now, "We both had a per- nent move to the farm in the backs of our nds."

They stayed only two weeks. Bob's family, e of six sons and three daughters, had always en close. He speaks of his mother as "a tiny, nderful woman who could always do the rk of two strong men." When he arrived West Salem this time, however, he found his her had had one of his heart "spells," and s now recovered. The homestead was filled h a sister and her family, and Bob had to pack his own family six-strong into his brother-in-law's trailer, parked in the yard. He couldn't find a house to rent, or a job, although he looked "all around." Ann was on her feet, but "just barely," and this made both of them feel that their visit was perhaps more of a nuisance than a help. Bob says, "It suddenly dawned on me what a nice job I'd had at Ward's. I caught myself thinking of Oregon as home."

He and Ann decided to return, and Bob's father helped out with some cash. They were back in Oregon by May first. Bob says, "I think that whole trip was mostly homesickness. But I got that out of my system, almost overnight. Maybe I grew up." Ann adds, "Since that last venture, he hasn't had a single homesick spell."

They arrived low on funds, and put up at Ann's sister Mary's. But Ann found a $100 check from her former husband waiting for her, and she sent Bob out to buy a car for job hunting. She says, "He was scared to death that we wouldn't be able to make payments on it, but I sort of screwed up his courage. Before the week was out we found our old apartment was still empty, and we moved back in. Then Bob found his old job at Ward's was still open, too, and they were glad to have him back. It was like a miracle. It seemed as though we were just meant to come back."

After paying the May rent they had $45 left, to last until Bob's first pay check; furthermore, they had stripped themselves of all their household goods for the Ohio trip, and Ann was in constant danger of losing her baby. The future was far from secure, but this low point marked a turning in their fortunes. From this point on, they began to pull their future into place.

Bob's base pay rose to $50 a week, and after taxes were taken out he was bringing home $180.66 a month. Ann's former husband has er failed to send her a $100 check at the t of each month and a $50 check on the enth, for the support of his children, and s $150 supplemental income brought the al for the family up to $330.66. Gardening-ipment sales that summer brought Bob o $50-bonus months, and Eileen and thy, now big girls of 12 and 11, joined the ws of school children who earn extra ney helping pick the fruit and bean crops. e girls were allowed to keep all their own ney for school clothes, but Bob and Ann re still able to pay Ann's doctor for her rmone shots, and pay for the delivery of the by entirely in advance. They recovered nn's old nonautomatic washing machine m her sister Mary, and soon finished the yments on it. They bought a small second-nd refrigerator on time, and were able to ep up the payments on the car. When the shing machine was paid for, they bought a "-screen television set on sale, for the same monthly payments. That September, Bob ade a $30 bonus and put it all into hospital d medical insurance.

Meanwhile, Ann spent June and July in bed ain, with a Caesarean threatened, but in ugust, Evelyn, the baby who had held onto e at such cost, was born in perfect health. he has since turned into a lively, curly-headed oppet, the darling of the family, and Ann n't help regarding her as a personal triumph.

That fall, the family started house hunting. or months, everything they looked at was ther too expensive or as shabby as their partment. But with Evelyn, the apartment as jammed. Then cold weather came, their el bill rose to $25 a month, the gas leaked, ipes froze upstairs and leaked water below, nd the hot-water tank burst. But in Decem-er a family had to vacate a little house on the dge of town rather hurriedly, and it was put n the market for $5000.

Ann says, "We had been looking so hard, nd gotten so discouraged. We were so happy o find this. It had three bedrooms, and the itchen stove and the wood furnace came ith it. They also left behind the curtains in he living room and big bedroom, a double ed, a crib, and quite a few other things. We idn't think we could get a loan for the down ayment [$500], but it came right through."

The green frame house had a picket fence, nd looked tiny from the front because it ran ack into the lot. It was a simple, one-story ouse without a basement; the "automatic" ood furnace was at one end of the living oom, and linoleum was on the floors. But the noleum was new, the walls and ceilings had een freshly painted, and the kitchen and athroom had modern plumbing. The green olor scheme in the living room had been hosen with taste and care. To Ann's eye it ad none of the drabness she had lived in so ong. Sunshine poured into the bedrooms, and he living-room windows overlooked a row of rees and the open land of a neighboring farm. The house was beside a dirt lane that came to dead end in its carport, and across the lane ere an apple orchard and some of Albany's ewest residential developments. Ann says, After Bob and I first saw it, we went home nd teased the girls that it had rough floors to crub, and peeling paint, but we told them hat 'at least it would be our own.' When they aw it they were just delighted. They were so hrilled to have a bedroom to themselves at ast."

The family moved in mid-January, 1956. That year was one of happy accomplishments. Bob put in closets, laid a patio, built a picnic able. Together, he and Ann and the children leaned up the yard, painted the picket fence, lanted, and lined flower beds with saw-tooth ricks. Ann's abundant energies now had direc-ion, and she put them to good use. Every iece of furniture that she picked up, whether iven to her by a neighbor, abandoned in the olshed in back of the house or bought at a econdhand store, was one more piece for her" house. She collected two chests for her nd Bob's bedroom (shared by Evelyn) and ainted them and the bed powder blue to natch the curtains. She bought herself a retty little maple desk, "because I wanted ne so bad." In the spring she had Bob con-vert a ramshackle structure of wood in the back yard into chicken coops, and brought home a flock of day-old chicks free from the poultry store. She says, "The children didn't take care of those chicks—I did. I like chick-ens." The family has also run through two ducks and assorted goldfish (decently buried in the apple orchard across the way), and still has a tough old mamma cat and her grown offspring.

On summer Friday evenings Ann would gather up the family and go down to Sears', where $5 coupons were handed to occasional lucky customers as a promotion stunt. Through persistence over many Fridays, the Palmers won, in all, five coupons, and brought home some tableware, scales, a coffee maker, sewing shears and a butcher knife. Ann says, "Billy won one of the coupons and gave it to me, so I went right over to the toy store and bought him a gun he wanted."

FORGIVE ME NOTHING

By PHILIP BOOTH

There are tears to being woman, tears no man can cry. Men fear to die, or weep to see their daughters grown in sleep, but none know the turn of mother years, or the flow of fear in time of omen.
Giving is woman's gift: she lives to bear love; at cost of pain she cannot share, in brimming heart she is most wholly woman.

If these words all come wrong, never try to tell me now. Now cry, and turn your tears here to my cheek, as for our seven years, two children, and a war. And while you cry, forgive me nothing. Before pain began, you were made wonderously woman; I, man.

In between things, Ann worked hard at contests. The Albany newspaper was at that time running a series of jingle contests promoting downtown retail stores, an idea which was later taken up by the nearby Lebanon paper. Then both papers ran a "safety slogan" contest for drivers. Ann entered all of them, and won in all about $150 in cash. An example of a winning slogan: "Every driver's greatest need: Twice the caution, half the speed." She entered a regional contest sponsored by a West Coast frozen-food concern, and won thirteen weeks of frozen "Sunday dinners" for four, or a total of 52 frozen dinners, including the pies for dessert. Each Sunday's lot wasn't quite enough for her family of seven, and, in fact, the house didn't have quite enough chairs for all seven to sit down at once, and some piecing out was necessary with extra food, a low stepladder for Bobby, and daddy's lap for Evelyn. But sheer initiative had produced the main requirements.

In 1956 Bob changed jobs too. He shifted from Ward's to Kern Electric Company, a small electrical-supply store. The owner has turned over to Bob most of the merchandising responsibility, and Bob is alone in the store most of the time. He has experimented with advertising, has brought in new customers, and is proud of his work. He has had two raises and is now earning $85 a week, although he must work all day Saturdays. This brings his monthly income up to $368, and the children's support money brings the total to $518. Taxes take the net income down to about $466 a month. Ann bought all her own clothes with contest money, and Eileen and Kathy earned theirs again by picking. Last summer Eileen earned $100, Kathy $50; Billy, then 9, picked in spurts, earned enough for a catcher's mitt and a gun. Last Christmas the three earned their own shopping money by selling Christmas cards. They made $5 apiece, and then found at a family council that there was no money in the family funds for a tree, because Bob had just bought an entire winter's supply of wood. So all three turned out and earned another $7 which they turned over to Ann for a tree and plenty of trimmings. Just about then, Ann found she was pregnant again, and began concentrating on "my dream—a boy for Bob."

Her new pregnancy made her take the first half of 1957 at a slower pace. Ann had a thyroid operation in April of '56, and ever since then it has been hard for her to keep her weight down to its old slim "normal." Early in her pregnancy she was firmly telling her doctor that his next job after the baby would be helping her diet, on the principle that "you have to keep working at a marriage all the time. I don't believe in sitting back and letting myself go."

They've kept up their medical insurance for the new baby's birth. Their car and refrigerator were paid for last year, and the bank loan for the down payment on the house was paid off this year. They will soon be making the last payments on an automatic dryer, bought when they first moved into their house, and they are paying off the television set and a new, fully automatic washing machine. The television set is unpaid for only because a vacuum cleaner and a sewing machine, which are now owned clear, were added to their account. Ann cannot use these daily tools of housekeeping without something of a collector's passionate joy. After all, she started a late-comer, from scratch.

Ann's mind is too active not to have reached some coherent views about her life. She feels very strongly that "nothing is impossible if you have enough faith and really set your mind on it." She is quite sure, too, that "for every black hour, there is something so much better and brighter ahead. I think of the times I was so down and out, and never could have guessed that I was to know Bob or have a wonderful new family and all the beautiful things that have happened since then. It just makes you wish you could reach everyone who is feeling that way and have some way to show them what's ahead."

Life comes to her as an adventure, but one that is being well managed by God. "I think God sends us suffering so we can appreciate the good things He gives us more. I remember one of the worst times when I was married to Bill, when we didn't have a thing to eat and things were really bad. I figured all I had left was my faith, so I decided to cheer myself up by reading Bishop Sheen's Peace of Soul, one of my favorite books. There in the middle of it was a twenty-dollar bill that I had hidden away in our better days and completely forgotten."

Since Ann was not remarried in another church, she was not excommunicated from her own, although she cannot take communion. She doesn't always get to Mass because of the littlest ones, and it is Bob who regularly takes the oldest children to the Catholic service. He is thinking about taking instruction and becoming a member of the church himself. Meanwhile, he, too, is reaching conclusions. "I'll be honest with you," he says in his slow, gentle voice. "Before I married Ann I hadn't been in a church twice in my life. I'd been raised in the depression, and my idea was to work and become rich. Work was my life, and I didn't know anything more important. Now that I'm married, my view has changed completely. The funny thing is, everything seems to go better for me too. I tell you—if you aren't married you aren't living."

Ann's thyroid operation in the spring of 1956, shortly after they had moved into their new house, was a frightening time for the whole family. She had been bothered by a growth on her throat for ten years, ever since her operation in Colorado, and it had now begun to grow rapidly. She went into the hospital on Good Friday, and her doctor, who suspected cancer, removed four tumors. On Easter Sunday she was given the news—no malignancy. She was home in four days, found "the house was a mess, all the kids had stomach flu, and Bobby had an infected ear. But I didn't care. I'd gone into the hospital sure I was going to die. After I got home I went out to feel the sun, and I thought, 'Oh, how wonderful to be alive.'" END word, and to this day I don't know whether he was angry at me, sympathetic, indifferent or just what. I haven't ever criticized Ron to pay him off for his criticisms of me, either to his face or behind his back. Until I came here for professional advice I've kept any disappointments I felt in him strictly to myself.

"I have consistently defended Ron to my parents, my mother in particular—she hoped I would catch an ambitious, he-man-type character for a husband instead of an introverted artist—but my parents scarcely represent a threat to Ron. They live in Seattle, a thousand miles away. On the rare occasions they do visit, Ron carries on outrageously, taking an opposite view on every issue merely to be annoying. Once my father mentioned his tailor and Ron pulled a poor mouth and pretended he acquired all his clothes in the bargain basement, a ridiculous pose since at the time he, too, was wearing a tailor-made suit.

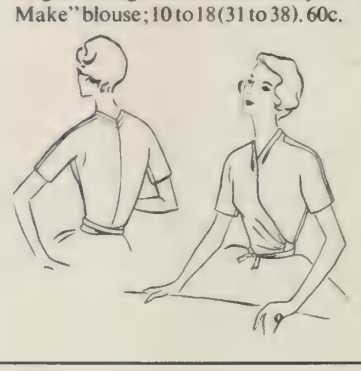
"Ron's parents live within a few miles of us. To please him, we see them at least once a week. Ron feels perfectly free to pick all kinds of flaws in my parents, despite their unfailing courtesy and generosity to him. I have never breathed a word against his people, although Gertrude, as both of us call his mother, can be considerably more difficult than my mother. She is far more demanding and harder to satisfy. Last Christmas, Ron spent hours shopping for an expensive Chinese brocade jacket he hoped Gertrude would fancy and then, in five minutes, he bought me an album of Count Basie records that he wanted for himself. He bought nothing for our children. Selecting their presents, as usual, was my job. Whenever Ron is in his mother's company he puts forth a special effort to be animated and amusing. I don't mind that. But automatically he seems to change personality, become less masculine and adult and more like a little boy. I often receive the impression he and Gertrude are deliberately conspiring to make me feel stupid and uncomfortable.

"Two Sundays ago Ron praised a frilly, bright red dress Gertrude was wearing, until she blushed with pleasure—my mother-in-law has excellent taste, which I suppose Ron inherited from her—and somehow both of them managed to make me feel like a big horse, wrapped in gunny sacking. Next, they plunged into a musical conversation, a subject where they shine and I don't—my college major was math—and in the midst of the palaver Ron suddenly asked me who composed the Pavane to a Dead Princess. Naturally I didn't know the answer and naturally Gertrude did. Once again and purposely, I believe, Ron flattered his mother at my expense.

"On the way home that day, in the hearing of the children, he wanted to know if I'd had a good time. I told him I'd had a dandy time and that his mother was charming. In some ways, strange as it may seem, I think Gertrude is charming. She is clever and original. She is also a real expert at the low-down art of making trouble and needling, without getting caught at it.

"When Ron began to pick on Susie in the car for the way she smeared her face eating candy, I suspected I was hearing an echo of Susie's grandmother. And when Ron jumped on the twins, whom he usually leaves more or less in peace, and got both boys sulky and upset, I knew darn well he was spreading a little of Gertrude's insidious brand of poison. During our visit she had made quite a thing of describing the beautiful manners and astounding poise of her next-door neighbor's small boys. Complimenting somebody else's kids is Gertrude's zigzag method of getting across a disagreeable message about me and the inferior way I'm rearing ours. Ron doesn't see it, of course.

"I've always kept my mouth shut on the subject of Gertrude. Ron is devoted to his mother and he detests his father, whom I rather like, though I've taken pains not to defend him. Something else Ron doesn't know is the way I've been cut by his admiration for his elder brother, Jerry, by his openly avowed envy. Jerry is unmarried and leads an unencumbered existence in a bachelor apartment in New York City. No wife, no kids to cramp his style.



"Now suppose I tell you what happened on the evening I discovered Ron's opinion of me as a wife. It was last Thursday, five days ago. When Ron didn't show for dinner I jumped to the conclusion there had been trouble at the plant again. I telephoned his office, but the switchboard was closed. For a week or so I'd been conscious of the growing tension in our house that generally precedes one of Ron's depressions. By eight o'clock I was definitely worried and thought I'd better go and hunt for him. Usually he heads for the beach.

"I rounded up a sitter and slipped away from the kids by the back door, which took quite a little doing. They're nervous youngsters, they'd sensed the tense atmosphere and all three were prepared to be real evil. Ron insists I spoil our children but can't see his changeableness frightens them. One minute he grabs and squeezes the twins till they can hardly breathe, the next he retreats scowling into the silences. He plainly shows he isn't extra fond of Susie, and she feels it too. According to her teacher, Susie should be near the head of her class, but instead she's near the foot. I guess neither Ron nor I is a good parent.

"Well, I drove twenty-five miles to the Pacific Ocean. Ron had parked his car and was walking along the beach. I saw at a glance the guy was in the lower depths. The tide was coming in and soaking his shoes without his noticing. When I appeared and asked if something had gone wrong at the plant, Ron went into the old song and dance about how he loathed his boss and how the boss' wife stifled his creativeness and how his work was dull and meaningless. I made the appropriate clucking, sympathetic sounds and for the thousandth time suggested he quit. As far as I could tell, we were going through the same old routine.

"Eventually Ron agreed to get in his car and follow me home. It was when we walked into the living room that the blow fell. Ron sat down. He then pulled from his pocket a letter he had written his brother Jerry, a twelve-page letter. In an offhand manner he remarked that maybe I should read the letter before it went in the mail.

"That letter was my announcement," said Eve in a shocked, incredulous voice, "that Ron had decided our marriage was on the rocks, that he intended to arrange for a divorce. After the divorce, so he wrote, he would fly to New York, find a new, more satisfactory job, share Jerry's apartment and resume leading a bachelor life. In the twelve pages it took Ron to relate his plans for the future and describe his bleak past—he wrote in glittering generalities, there were no specific complaints—he scarcely mentioned me, his daughter, his sons. He sounded as though we had no existence.

"Ron has now decided maybe he won't mail the letter, that joining Jerry might be a mistake. Ever since Thursday night he and I have been talking in circles. As of this moment Ron wants to table the divorce question temporarily, keep his present job awhile, but turn his studio in our back yard into a separate apartment to be occupied solely by him. I've vetoed that cockeyed plan. If I weren't ashamed to have my mother find out—I'd hate to have her learn she was right in disapproving of Ron—I believe I would be in favor of a divorce and a total separation. I've already applied to take a course in selling real estate if we do split up so I can supplement my person income and support the children. I'm t proud to accept further financial assistan from my parents and let them think of me a burden.

"By now you may be wondering why R and I got married in the first place. I expect was because we felt fairly comfortable wi each other and awkward with everybody el My two older sisters, who are little and cu were the belles in my family. I was suppos to be a son. My mother was so disappointe was a third girl she had hysterics in the deli ery room, and my father bought her a di mond bracelet as a consolation prize for the both.

"By the time I followed my sisters to colle and into their sorority I was nearly six fe tall. I was good at sports—skiing, tenn swimming, golf—but at dances I was th giantess skulking in the corner, attempting make like a midget.

"Ron was an odd-ball too. He can ta Mozart and Picasso, but he doesn't know t difference between a two-base hit and a dr kick. We met at the annual home-comi dance at our university, the one night most the students stay up all night. My date, snagg for me by my sister, Edith, had gone to slee Ron's girl had stood him up.

"Three months after the dance, Ron w drafted. By then he and I were pretty well a quainted. His mother approved of me, maybe of my family's social references—G trude is something of a snob—but in tho days I liked her and Ron's whole family fin They seemed so gay and informal after m family, where one cocktail, no more, w served before dinner, we ate by candlelig and with finger bowls, and immediately aft dessert all we females retired to our rooms an shut the doors, while my father, assuming h had appeared for dinner, raced off to his clu to play bridge.

"Ron and I corresponded for the two yea he was in the Army and got ourselves engage by mail. Three days before our marriage h panicked and suggested we break up. I w panicky too. I consulted my college counselo and she seemed to think Ron and I shoul wait a while, that both of us were immatur But by then five hundred invitations had bee mailed. Also, my sisters were married and a though I was only twenty years old I wa afraid if Ron didn't marry me I might be a old maid.

"Our two mothers enjoyed our weddin more than we did. And, from my point view, anyway, our honeymoon was dismal in deed. Ron has a strong sex drive but no te derness whatever. Furthermore, in a funn kind of way, he is a prude. We spent our fir night in the bridal suite of the hotel where m parents and my two sisters began their ma ried life. I came out of the dressing room in filmy nightgown—I wasn't frightened or em barrassed—and Ron instantly handed me bathrobe to put on, saying that somebod might look in and see me through a window We were on the fifteenth floor and all th shades were drawn.

"The remainder of our honeymoon, spen in a lodge in the mountains, was worse. Ro and I would begin the night together in th double bed but then invariably he would hav an attack of asthma and would have to leav me and go sleep on the floor in front of th fireplace. With an asthmatic seizure, Ron ha to breathe warm air. I understood that, but a a bride I felt humiliated, discarded. To me ou sexual relationship has always been unsatis factory. I've never achieved a climax, which i something Ron doesn't know, since I've pre tended with him, considering it my duty as wife.

"On every single occasion Ron has eve kissed me I have known his mind was on sex but I've never refused his kisses. Nor did ever reject the love-making that followed. can't see why Ron thinks our marriage is failure."

RON TELLS HIS SIDE:

"At age twenty-five my father-in-law had accumulated his first fifty thousand dollars; I haven't accumulated fifty thousand cents," said thirty-three-year-old Ron. Six feet one, with a crew haircut and dark blue eyes, he was handsome in a withdrawn way. "Eve tries to kid me into thinking she believes I'm quite a talented fellow. More than once she's offered to set me up in business, but I don't want her patronage; I couldn't take the silent look of disapproval in her eye if I flopped as she is sure I would.

"Despite my training and background and Eve's dry, insincere little compliments of my work, when she remembers a wife should encourage her husband, she has no faith in either my creative ability or my taste. I go for subdued, earthy colors in house decoration and clear bright colors in clothes, my mother's colors. Eve unfalteringly chooses the reverse. I've never seen Eve wear a dress that wasn't a wishy-washy blue, gray or brown. Yet a few months ago she wanted to put a vivid provincial-style wallpaper in our contemporary-modern bedroom. Eve and I had just painted the interiors throughout our house in a shade of off-white that took me two weekends to mix. When I expressed my opinion of the paper, Eve told me she was only joking and was crazy about our off-white walls.

"A while back there was a song popular on TV called The Great Pretender that puts me in mind of Eve. Our marriage was a big pretense from the beginning. Eve and I never did love each other. Maybe we aren't capable of romantic love. What we had in our courtship days was liking, respect, and a desire to present a mutual self-protection front to the world. Both of us were misfits and it seemed we needed and could help each other.

"I had a job in the university library at the time and Eve hung around in the stacks with me and we talked books and seemed to be compatible. During my Army service Eve and my mother were my only correspondents. My father couldn't be bothered to write. When I was decorated my mother saw to it my exploit was covered in the local press. She sent me the clipping and a long letter I treasure to this day. In a brief postscript my father cracked a corny joke to the effect I should be careful if I couldn't be good. I tore his postscript from the bottom of my mother's proud, affectionate and, in some ways, awfully funny letter. She warned me to avoid cold night marches for my asthma's sake and to drink plenty of fresh milk for my stomach's sake, as though a humble G.I. had the say.

"During my overseas service Eve and I drifted a long way apart. At the time of our marriage the truth is we really didn't know each other very well. Eve can't say I rushed her to the church. I had a strong last-minute hunch I was the lone-wolf, bachelor type like my elder brother, dubious husband material. But Eve and my mother both favored the match; in those days the two seemed to like each other. Gertrude still likes Eve and of course she adores our three youngsters, but if it were in Eve's power I'm sure she would cut me off from my mother.

"After my first six months with Eve, I had practically decided I wasn't temperamentally suited for marriage; anyhow, marriage to her. But by then she was pregnant with Susie and that seemed to be that. Eve's sisters beat her to the altar, but she was determined to present her parents with the first grandchild in the family and she succeeded. Occasionally I think that might be why she married me.

"At times during our ten years together Eve has professed to love me, but her love is all show, no feeling. If I ever marry again, which seems doubtful, I want a living wife, somebody warm. Eve seems to be bloodless, unfeminine, not like a girl at all. Our sexual relationship has been perfunctory with us both. She has just pretended to enjoy herself when we made love, though she doesn't know I know it. Eve has dutifully accepted my advances but inwardly she has been untouched.

"Eve and I are both detached and remote from people. I have never in my life had a friend, a genuine friend. When I was a kid my mother broke her neck to get me in with other boys. My father, a Yale graduate, didn't earn enough for us to live in a decent neighborhood and the kids nearby were toughies. At a time my mother could hardly pay the grocery bills she wangled me a membership in an exclusive country club and every afternoon I would walk two miles to get there—no bus fare. I didn't have much fun. I had the feeling the other kids, those with successful fathers and pocket money, suspected me of wanting to cadge ice-cream cones and soft drinks from them. On my birthdays my mother would arrange for the sons of her college classmates, women with successful husbands, to be transported from way across town to my party. Half the time my father would show up and spoil the occasion by making snide remarks about my guests and about me. Gertrude hoped I would be a musician and I played the piano and because of her wanting me to appear a prodigy I was kept in short pants longer than the average. My father's jeering at those pants can haunt me yet.

"Eve's childhood was soft but apparently she, too, was short on companionship. She had a nurse until she was thirteen years old and she went to a girls' day school until she was ready for college. Eve now has a few so-called friends who condescend to come to our house because of her family's position. I don't enjoy Eve's friends and their parties bore me. Our entertaining—Eve weighs our social obligations with the scrupulous care of a miser counting gold and pays off each party in kind—is an even worse bore. We don't have buffet suppers in our house. The table is laid with a lace cloth and our wedding china, gold-banded. I would prefer informal pottery and the guests waiting on themselves instead of Eve turning herself inside out to provide a sit-down dinner the way her mother does.

"Something nearly always goes wrong when we entertain. At our last party the sitter arrived

What Does the Gardener Do in the Fall?

One thing that can be done only in the fall is to plant the bulbs that bloom in the spring.

By THE GARDENER'S ASSISTANT

Outstanding among the bulbs that bloom in the spring are the tulips and the daffodils, first and foremost. Hyacinths, crocuses, muscari, scillas and the rest are charming but minor parts of the pageant, to be taken up at another time.

To begin with the wild, or species, tulips known as botanicals, there is one, Tulipa fosteriana, of which the variety Red Emperor is described in a Dutch bulb grower's catalogue as "the most famous of all tulips. Everybody wants it all over the world. The best seller of all time. The earliest, the largest, the most fiery red tulip ever grown. Vermilion scarlet with beautiful black heart. Height, 22 inches." All too true, you think in early spring as you pass front yards exploding on every side with great broadside beds of Red Emperors. You can, of course, do as you wish, but remember these are wild tulips and try naturalizing them in twos and threes instead, and sometime try T. fosteriana princeps instead of Red Emperor. It's the same big fiery red flower, but only half as high—in my opinion, much better proportioned.

These botanicals, of which the fosterianas are so sensational a tribe, are really at their best when grown as Nature intended, the way other wild flowers grow. They just aren't flowers for beds. The ones commonly seen pictured in the catalogues and featured in the garden stores and display grounds are generally the most reliable growers—the kaufmannianas, or water-lily tulips; the clusiana, or lady tulips, and the striking Tulipa eichleri, tall, slender, straight, yet still essentially "wild." I like them all enough to keep planting a few more every fall, for they seldom stay with me more than two or three years. I don't know where they go. They just disappear.

So let us deal now with their descendants, the tulips extraordinaire. Do you want me to describe all sixteen divisions among the Early Flowering and the May Flowering? I'm glad you don't! All you really need to know until you take up tulips in earnest is that in most places the five divisions of Earlies bloom in April, two to three weeks ahead of the eleven divisions in the great May Flowering group, with its Darwins, its Cottages, its Parrots, Breeders, Rembrandts and the rest. In a season that suits them, there are tulips in bloom for just about two full months, beginning with the botanicals and the Earlies and ending with the late long-lasting Darwins.

Of the singles in the early group I like best the pretty pink-and-white Pink Beauty. The red-and-yellow Keizerskroon has finally worn out its welcome with me, though I still recommend it. With Pink Beauty, White Hawk's very nice. These are doorstep tulips; three to five on either side. Tallest in the Early group are the Triumphs, nearly the stature of the Darwins but not nearly the kaleidoscopic coloring. Of these, I like the pure white Kansas, the yellow Golden Wonder and the scarlet Crater; but I grow them in among other spring flowers, not in beds by themselves.

Sometimes I wonder why they keep on designating and isolating the four main divisions so sharply: the Darwin, Cottage, Breeder and Rembrandt; for actually, most of them are quite a lot alike in their tall straight stems and cup-like flowers. The Darwins have the wide range of colors and color combinations; the Cottages excel in the yellow and orange hues; the Breeders in the deeper brooding violets and bronzes; and the Rembrandts in the painted-petal effects. For instance, here are ten tulip varieties which make a beautiful bed, blooming harmoniously together, all the same height. Four Darwins: the pink Aristocrat; the black legendary La Tulipe Noire; Scarlet Leader; and The Bishop, violet blue. Four Cottages: the salmon-red Advance; the yellow Mrs. John Scheepers; the fine White City; and the bright-rose Smiling Queen. One Rembrandt: the red, white, and blue-centered American Flag; and one Breeder: the pure orange President Hoover.

In the same way, I like to bed lily-flowering tulips together, keeping in mind the height, the blooming date and of course the colors; they're so gracefully and delicately different in form from the tall, straight cup types. The same goes for the doubles and the peony-flowered kinds, and most of all for the fantastic Parrots, with their petals fringed, crenulated and curled; more orchidaceous at times than orchids. These last are really tulips to plant in twos and threes.

Daffodils to me are the dreamy delight of spring, beginning before the final snowfalls with the big blaring golden trumpets like King Alfred and Unsurpassable, and continuing right on into May with great white clouds of the poeticus narcissus Actaea—all daffodils to me, whether trumpet, large-cupped, small-cupped; jonquilla, tazetta, poeticus or wild. I entreat you to try as many different kinds as you can afford, keeping them in small clusters of three to five; never in formal beds, but tucked in the forefront of shrubberies, scattered in among ground covers such as ivy, myrtle and pachysandra, and strewn in the tall grasses away from the smooth-cut lawn.

Three of the most entrancing of the daffodils are the dainty triandrus hybrids Stoke, Silver Chimes and Thalia. These carry from two to six flowers on each stem; white and primrose, pale yellow, and pure white, in that order. Larger, and a charming change, is the pink-trumpeted Mrs. R. O. Backhouse, with white petals. And as I indicated above, there is the poeticus Actaea on which you can splurge with twenty-five or more for a cloud effect, especially if you have a place under a white birch for these big, tall, flat, white-faced flowers with their red-margined eyes—one of the last to bloom. The latest I know is the tiny upfacing Yellow Hoop Skirt, 6" high, like a little wild flower. And I must say, I hate to see them leave.

For all the bulbs, follow directions as to depth and distance apart, but don't fuss or fret too much about it. And get to know, too, which is the top and which the bottom of the bulb; though even upside down, bulbs have been known to come up, sometime, somehow.

In December:

WHAT DOES THE GARDENER DO IN WINTER?

Platter flattery—the added flavor you get from French's, the light and lively mustard that cold cuts just can't do without!

On food

In food

Great New Idea . . . Mustard Bread made with French's—see easy recipe below.

no other mustard has FRENCH'S Light and Lively flavor

How can a mustard be more than a mustard? When it's French's—the mustard that owes its light and lively taste to secret spices and flavorings, plus specially grown mustard seeds. Little wonder, then, that French's adds more flavor on foods, brings out more flavor in foods! And its tangy taste won't fade out in cooking. So now you know why more people buy French's than any other mustard.

MUSTARD BREAD

1 small loaf of French, Vienna, or Italian Bread (about 15 inches long) ¼ cup butter
½ cup chopped green onions or sweet onions (including some of tops)
2 tablespoons French's Parsley Flakes or chopped fresh parsley
2 tablespoons French's Mustard
2 tablespoons French's Sesame Seeds or Poppy Seeds

Cream butter. Blend in onions and parsley. Split loaf the long way. Spread with butter mixture. Spread with French's Mustard. Top with French's Sesame Seeds. Cut bread diagonally in 1½ inch slices not quite through crust. Heat in a moderate (350 degrees F.) oven for about 12 minutes or until lightly browned. Hard rolls can be used instead of bread.

late and Eve, busy in the kitchen with the cook she'd hired for the evening, shooed the kids into the living room where I was dispensing cocktails. You couldn't hear yourself think for the uproar. When I tried to remove Susie from the scene she screamed so loudly it's a wonder the police didn't show up. I don't know how to handle Susie, who is now at the pudgy, unattractive stage, and is stubborn as a mule. A few minutes after I'd got Eve to put Susie in her bedroom the sitter appeared and took charge of the twins. Billy was jumping up and down on one end of our white sofa, ignoring the guests seated at the other end. Bobby was rubbing the woodwork with his dirty hands. Eve maintained later the guests didn't mind the turmoil, but the evening was a horror to me. When I finally got to sleep—I'm an insomniac—I had one of my recurrent nightmares. In this nightmare I see myself hidden in the branches of a leafy tree, looking down on a crowd of people below and feeling snug and secure when suddenly I realize that above is a huge, cold, expressionless eye watching me. When I woke in the morning I was too sunk and sick to go to work.

"Perhaps I could endure the emptiness and lack of love in my home if I received any satisfaction from my work. At home I'm silently pressured by Eve—I don't accuse her of subjecting me to scenes and hysterics; I've never seen her in tears—and at work I'm steamrollered by my boss and his wife. My employer admits that my designs are fifty per cent responsible for his business success, but he won't lift a finger to protect me from the noisy verbal assaults of his wife. Nor has he transferred any company stock to me, something he has been promising for years. I can't count on him in anything. Last spring I was asked to make rough sketches for a new line of dinnerware. By sitting up night and day I was able to turn out finished drawings and both the boss and his wife were delighted with them. Next day, Mrs. Boss denied she had approved the drawings and I had to get my crew to work out another series. After six weeks of seesawing back and forth, endless misunderstandings, recriminations, and three other series of drawings, the boss and his wife settled for the designs they had seen in the first place. By then it was a miracle I didn't have two ulcers. Nobody should be expected to be creative in the kind of atmosphere where I work.

"I realize I'm a perfectionist and have been oversensitive since boyhood. I can't help it. To me molehills are mountains. A week ago, driving Eve to the shopping center, I stopped at an intersection for a red light. When we got the amber signal a car in the rear zoomed around me like a bullet shot out of a gun and I got so flustered I killed my engine. By then the light turned green. Immediately we were in the midst of blowing horns and traffic piled up and a policeman came over and bawled me out. When we finally drove on Eve said nothing. However, she gave me a look of calm contempt that reduced me to the status of a worm and shriveled my very soul.

"Fifteen minutes later I saw her buy three lipsticks she didn't need and I blew my top. I got another look. That night I told Eve I was wretched in our marriage and had been for years. Do you know, we are so far out of touch that she didn't even hear me? She yawned and went to bed. I wrote that letter to my brother not at all sure I would send it, but determined to compel Eve to read it and fix her attention upon my unhappiness with my work, with her and with our marriage.

"My three youngsters all dislike me, with Susie leading off the list. You can hardly blame her. I've developed into a father almost as bad as mine, impatient, sarcastic, critical. Susie is asthmatic like me and I know my attempts at disciplining her sometimes start her wheezing, but surely a sulky kid of nine requires discipline.

"When I ask the twins if they love me they shuffle their feet and look uncomfortable or else they run off. On their last birthday Eve suggested I give them a present. I spent an afternoon selecting a fine building set. It was a waste of time and money. Eve's gift was a surprise and a roaring success—a six-month-old puppy. My gift impressed nobody.

"Eve is well able to be both a mother and father to our youngsters. She is completely self-sufficient. If she won't accept financial assistance from her parents, she can go to work and sell real estate as soon as she gets her license.

"I think I should quit my job, clear out and go somewhere else. If I'm to be a misfit all my life there's no reason I should hang around and make my family unhappy too."

THE MARRIAGE COUNSELOR SAYS:

"There is a saying that people are often impelled to marry their problems. Both Eve and Ron felt inadequate and inferior. Both wanted friends, but repelled friendship by snobbishness and coldness. Both were too much in need of self-understanding to understand and help each other. Both had been damaged by the very different way they had been reared. Somewhere in their childhood the personalities of Eve and Ron had been distorted and they had forsaken themselves as they were intended to be. Through counseling, the two not only salvaged their marriage; they became the woman and the man each instinctively desired to be. In their case, the route to self-understanding was long and rugged.

"Eve and Ron shared a neurotic inability to feel for anybody except themselves. A divorce wouldn't have helped them find more satisfaction in their lives; the satisfaction for which they yearned is to be found only in giving love. In order to achieve the selflessness without which human existence becomes blind chaos it was essential for Eve and Ron to understand how they felt and why, to perceive the reasons they were in trouble. It was plain the answer to their present unhappiness lay in their past.

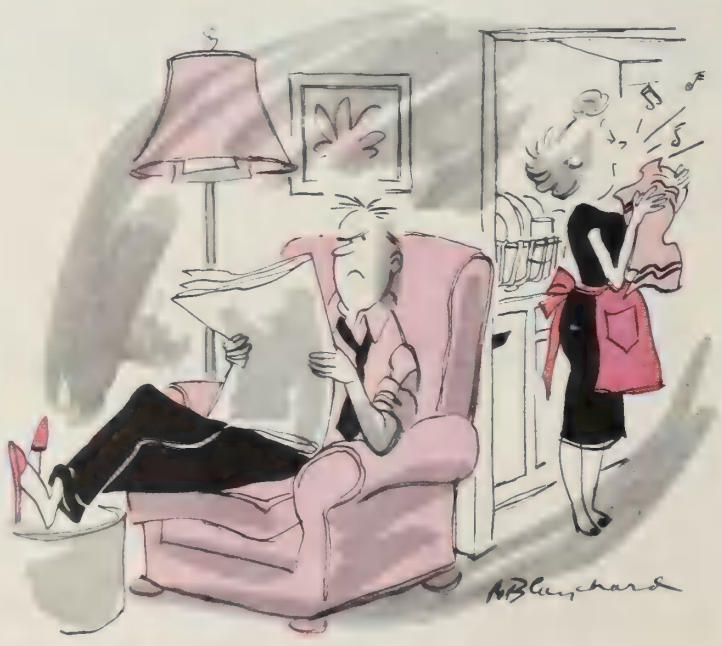
"In the cold, formal atmosphere where Eve, sympathetic by nature, grew up she was taught to curb her warm impulses. Also, she early picked up the knowledge that her parents had wanted her to be a boy. She did her best to oblige by denying her femininity. Simultaneously admiring and afraid of her father, she chose this aloof man as a model. She sought to win parental approval with proficiency at golf, tennis, basketball, sports in which men excel. Her unusual height added to her social uneasiness and her confusion as to just what was her position in the world. Envy of her sisters, pint-sized, cute, surrounded by swarms of boy friends, was probably also a factor in leading her to jeer at fluffy, feminine attire—'No ruffles for a big horse like me!'—and to choose severe-type clothes, tailored suits, slacks and the like.

"By the time Eve entered college she was very mannish. Another truism is that mannish women usually attract soft men. At the university Eve attracted Ron, indecisive, inclined to be a leaner and the possessor of artistic interests generally considered feminine.

"I didn't ever meet Ron's mother, but in the course of numerous interviews with her son I formed a strong impression of her character. Gertrude wore the pants in the family. I think it likely that, perhaps unconsciously, she badly wanted to be a man and took revenge for her frustration by attacking the manhood of her husband and sons. In psychologists' trade talk, Gertrude would be classified as a 'castrating female.' She damaged all three men in her family. Both Ron and his father suffered from asthma and ulcers, ailments associated with tension and nerves. The elder son, Jerry, was probably the unhappiest and most maladjusted of the three. He had twice attempted suicide. For Ron with his depressions and his problems to team up with an even more depressive Jerry would have been unrealistic indeed; I didn't ever tell Ron so.

"In counseling I try to lead my clients into thinking out their personal dilemmas and then acting on their own solutions. It would have been useless for me to provide Eve with a list of rules on how to conduct herself as a good wife and mother. For ten years she had slavishly followed a lengthy list of self-imposed rules. On the surface her batting average as a wife appeared to be high. No scenes, no quarrels, no tedious responsibilities to burden Ron, pep talks when he was low-spirited. What was lacking in Eve's performance was sincerity, insight, feeling.

"The truth, which Ron keenly sensed, was that Eve hadn't the slightest appreciation of the daily humiliations he suffered as he was bullied at work by his employer's dominating wife and was babied but inwardly scorned at home. When Eve realized and acknowledged the phoniness of the sympathy she had long professed to feel for Ron, she perceived something quite obvious—her marked resemblance to her mother-in-law. Instead of strengthening her weak husband, she had further weakened him. Completely self-sufficient, she had been depending on Ron for literally nothing, and he knew it. Ron desperately needed to be needed, he needed prestige, he needed to assume responsibility and to be a man. Eve didn't want to be a Gertrude.



"She proved it. She transferred to Ron the task of handling the major share of their finances, paying their bills, keeping up with their insurance payments, and so on. At first he was unenthusiastic; it was easier to hand over his weekly pay and let Eve worry about the bank balance. In the first month of his management the tardy payment of a premium jeopardized an insurance policy and he urgently requested that Eve take over again. She declined. Ron now takes pride in supporting his family—Eve's hundred-dollar-a-month income is reserved for luxuries—and he boasts of his skill in juggling the family funds. The responsibility has been very important to him.

"It was tougher for Ron than for Eve to perceive his real personality, the reasons for his difficulties. Curiously enough, the recurrent dream where he saw himself up a tree, hidden and looking down on other people, was helpful. We interpreted the dream to mean that Ron envisioned himself as superior to and above other people, withdrawn from life, while another part of him (the eye) understood the impossibility of escape. Gradually Ron realized he wanted to be an active participant in life, that his childhood experiences and his mother's influence had persuaded him to stand on the side lines, sarcastic, critical, hostile and—fearful. When Ron perceived how Gertrude had enfeebled him he didn't lose his affection for her, but he did become aware of her capacity to do harm. He then saw how unwilling his mother was for his small twin sons to act like noisy, normal boys. Eve and Ron still visit his parents, but less frequently. Ron has grown more understanding of his father, whose loud, rough kidding he has decided is a screen for timidity, and more watchful of his mother. He turns aside Gertrude's hints on how the children should be reared. He now has ideas of his own. When Eve began to depend on Ron for help with the youngsters, he rapidly improved as a parent and soon took the initiative in arranging games for the twins, helping Susie with her homework and such. The dramatic improvement in Susie's scholarship showed how badly she needed a father; she is now in the top group at school. Susie still has occasional attacks of asthma as, for that matter, has Ron. But their attacks seem to be less severe and Ron's depressions have almost disappeared. All three children are less nervous. Ron now knows better than to ask young boys whether they love him. Billy and Bobby demonstrate their love by the way they run to the door when Ron comes home. Incidentally, Eve now knows better than to ask Ron to buy a birthday present for the twins and then outshine his choice of gift with a beguiling puppy.

"After Eve learned to guard against the signs of masculinity within herself that lowered Ron's masculinity and of course her respect for him, she found she had learned how to love. For the first time the couple's sexual relationship became a pleasure to them both. With the change in Eve's pattern of feelings, her behavior changed in ways too numerous to mention. For one thing, she tossed formality in entertaining out the window and now is satisfied with buffet suppers like others in their neighborhood. Eve and Ron have built up genuine friendships among people with similar interests. Eve still wears slacks and tailored suits, costumes that become her, but she also wears the kind of dresses Ron admires in the colors he fancies. Ron has abandoned his incessant decorating and redecorating of their home, a symbol of his restlessness and discontent, but not long ago he papered the master bedroom with a provincial print that Eve liked.

"I believe the turning point in the marriage came on an afternoon when Ron arrived home filled with bitter complaints of his employer's wife. The old Eve would have rushed in with tons of sympathy and millions of suggestions as to how to handle the matter. The new Eve serenely informed Ron that the problem was his and it was up to him to solve it. All evening Ron brooded. Next morning, however, he told off the boss' wife in no uncertain terms and his show of strength was promptly rewarded. Alarmed that a valuable employee might quit, the boss fulfilled his long-standing promise and cut Ron in for a share of company stock.

"These days Ron is much better satisfied with his work, but he and Eve are talking seriously of the time he will set up in business for himself. Eve and Ron now talk to each other. It is no longer necessary for Ron to write a letter to his bachelor brother to capture his wife's attention."

"Someday he'll come along—the man I love—and he'll be big and strong—the man I love ——"

When You Shop For Food

Mrs. Wizard ~~that's~~ You!

Seven people eat well for $1.00 a day each.

By LIANE WAITE

ACKROYD

The willing helper is Bobby. When he's peeling the carrots or potatoes for dinner, he gets extra dividends (sometimes raw) as he works.

Shopping for an active family of seven with a food budget of around $45.00 a week is no snap for Ann Palmer. A third of this amount is spent for milk—about $13.00, since each of the 5 children still requires 3 glasses of milk a day—a total of 105 glasses a week! Her weekly budget for solid food is $32.00. Out of this she spends around $2.00 for household supplies.

Providing appetizing, varied and hearty eating for her growing children, including school lunches and a midday meal for her husband at home every day, requires that the budget be almost elastic. Ann watches the weekly specials and is not afraid to ask the grocer the difference between potatoes priced at 39 cents and 45 cents for 10 pounds.

Also included are recipes made by herself or her daughter Eileen, who is delighted to help with the cooking.

Pork Chops in Casserole. A simple but piquant dish, the children's most favorite, and costs only $1.12

Flour 8 pork chops well in seasoned flour. Then brown them in a heavy kettle, using only enough shortening to start them. When they are all well browned, remove the chops to absorbent paper. Add 1½ cups chopped onion and ½ green pepper, cut into thin strips, to the drippings in the kettle. Cook these, stirring from time to time until they are tender. Replace the pork chops on top of the vegetables, cover with 1½ cups water and season with 2 teaspoons soy sauce and a pinch each of thyme and marjoram. Cover the kettle tightly and simmer the chops for about 3 hours or until the meat is tender. Thicken the gravy a bit with a flour-and-water paste just before serving and adjust the seasonings. Makes 8 servings.

Rice Soup. One of those things that just evolved as recipes do. It is a good hearty soup with plenty of meat and is budget-priced at $1.27

Put 3 lamb shanks in a heavy soup kettle and cover them well with water. Season with 2 teaspoons salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper and ¾ cup chopped onion. Cover and simmer the broth well—at least 3–4 hours. Remove the meat from the bones. Skim off any excess fat from the broth. Re-add the meat and ½ cup uncooked rice. Simmer the soup again for about 20 minutes. Then add 1½ cups sliced raw carrots. Continue simmering until the carrots are tender—about another 20 minutes. Taste and adjust seasonings of salt and pepper—and add a whisper of rosemary. Makes 10–12 servings.

STUART

A casserole of ham hocks and Lima beans—an easy, tasty Saturday dinner. Accompanied by a crisp green salad, rolls and fruit for dessert, the meal is budget priced at $2.67.

Ham Hocks and Lima Beans. This savory dish is made for only 90¢

Cover tightly in a heavy kettle 2 pounds dry Lima beans and 6 cups water. Bring quickly to a full boil and boil for 2 minutes. Remove them from the heat and allow them to stand, covered, for 1½ hours. Add 2 pounds smoked ham hocks, 2 onions, chopped, and ⅓ cup diced celery. Season with 1 tablespoon brown sugar, 1 teaspoon dry mustard and 1 teaspoon salt. Cover and simmer for 2 hours. If you would like to hold the dish overnight, this is the point to do it. Remove the meat from the ham bones, leaving it in as big pieces as possible. Skim any excess fat from the top of the sauce. Return the meat to the beans and reheat well before serving. Makes 8 servings.

Cream-of-Celery Soup. The price of this easy one is 50¢

Sauté ⅓ cup minced onion in 3 tablespoons margarine until tender in the top of a double boiler. Stir in 3 tablespoons flour. Place over boiling water and slowly stir in 3 cups milk and 1 cup chicken stock. Cook until smooth and thickened. Add 1½ cups finely chopped celery, 2 teaspoons salt and ⅛ teaspoon paprika. Cook for about 1 hour. Serve with paprika on top. Makes 8 servings.

Meat-and-Sausage Loaf. A quick and easy, costing a meager 96¢

Mix together 2 pounds ground beef and ½ pound sausage meat. Season with 2 teaspoons salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper and a pinch each of savory and poultry seasoning. Add 1 egg, 1 cup soft bread crumbs and 1 cup tomato juice. When well mixed, pack into a 9″x5″x3″ loaf pan and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 1½ hours. Makes 8 servings.

Oatmeal-Nut Cookies. Eileen uses filberts in these, but walnuts will cut the price. A batch of 6 dozen costs 79¢

Place in a mixing bowl ¾ cup soft margarine, 1 cup brown sugar, ½ cup granulated sugar, 1 egg, ¼ cup water and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Mix thoroughly. Sift together 1 cup flour, 1 teaspoon salt and ½ teaspoon soda. Add to the shortening mixture and mix well. Stir in 3 cups rolled oats and 1 cup chopped walnuts. Drop by teaspoon onto greased baking sheets. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 12–15 minutes.

WHY DIETS FAIL . . . AND WHAT TO DO ABOUT IT!

the source of ill health and emotional mal-justment with diet the logical, magical cure. it in my opinion, obesity is a symptom, not a sease. It cannot and should not be removed til after the underlying reasons are brought light and corrected. Reducing diets are usu-y doomed to failure when they are blindly llowed by people who have no understand-g (or who refuse to face the facts) of why ey overeat—or when they are forced upon a rson who is reluctant to diet. In such cases, amatic weight loss, or a series of weight sses throughout life, may be achieved, but ese periods of reduced weight are almost al-ays disappointingly brief and are followed a return to the original weight. This kind of phazard or compulsive dieting is not only sappointing, it is potentially dangerous be-use it can precipitate depression or other notional upsets." Doctor Bruch does not tell this to frighten overweight people or to dis-urage them from reducing, but simply to oint out that dieting may create new prob-ms when it is undertaken without psycholog-al readiness.

Know the Facts Behind Your Figure Problem

Broken romances, disillusionment in mar-age, an unsatisfactory social life and dissatis-ction in work are among life's difficulties hich can lead to excessive eating. Even in ese situations, some adults can learn to nderstand their problems by themselves, or ith the help of their family physicians, and us pave the way to a successful reducing reg-nen.

A middle-aged woman who had always een slender suddenly began to gain weight. he had a devoted husband, a charming home, pleasant social life. But during the last year er two daughters had married and moved way, and her only son had gone off to col-lege. Her beautiful home had suddenly become quiet and empty. This woman was unconsciously filling a very real gap in her life with extra quantities of food. Once she realized this, she made efforts to find new ways of being occupied. She joined a garden club, offered her time at the local hospital, entertained more frequently. As her days filled up, her preoccupation with food dwindled, and her weight returned to normal. There are many comparable situations in which it should not be too difficult to detect—and correct—the reasons for overeating. In more complex problems, there may be a real need for psychiatric counseling.

"With children," says Doctor Bruch, "feelings of anxiety and insecurity are often responsible for overeating. Some mothers, consciously or unwittingly, substitute food for affection, counting on the extra piece of chocolate to make up for the comradeship she is unable, or unwilling, to give. Another means of overglorifying food is to consistently use it as a bribe or a peace offering. The mother who habitually appeases, silences or pampers a child with something special to eat must face the possible consequence that her youngster will value food as a prize out of all proportion. Making a virtue out of 'clean your plate' (regardless of the amounts piled on it) may also boomerang as the child grows older, by turning overeating into a habit. Many youngsters are overweight because they do not get enough physical activity. Every child needs to be encouraged to enjoy the social as well as the physical aspects of games and sports in order to develop wholesome interests, as well as wholesome eating habits."

Naturally, some children eat more than others for the perfectly normal reason that they enjoy food more, or burn up their energies more quickly and need more food, or because they are brought up in homes where it is the custom to "eat hearty."

When parents suspect that youthful overeating results from an emotional or physical condition, Doctor Bruch emphasizes the need for insight and special attention, because "wrong eating habits and neurotic attitudes developed in childhood and during adolescence offer the most difficult problems later on." In such cases, it is important to restore a child's feeling of security and help him develop self-esteem, before putting him on a diet. This sometimes requires professional guidance.

Are You Really Overweight?

In contrast to the psychological aspects of overweight, Doctor Bruch brings up an entirely different side of the weight problem, having to do with certain physiological factors. In doing so she speaks of your "preferred weight," a name she has given to the weight which your body "in its mysterious self-regulatory capacity prefers as its pattern of adaptation." It is a weight designated by Nature to help you maintain a peak in physical and emotional stability and it is as individually yours as the shape of your nose or the color of your eyes.

"Preferred weight" distinguishes itself from the so-called "ideal," "average" and "standard" weights (which we find charted in a doctor's office or near the scale in the drugstore) by being a weight which functions nicely for you no matter what the charts say. Doctor Bruch questions any unqualified acceptance of the weight charts because she says they are "figures derived through mathematical manipulation, while we all know that people in real life do not follow scientific calculations but have a stubborn way of clinging to their own figures."

One way to determine your natural weight is to close your mind (if you can) to all preconceived notions and outside influences which prompt you to feel dissatisfied with your weight. Forget, if you will, the size 10 sheath dress you'd like to squeeze into and the friend who is your height but who weighs fifteen pounds less. Now think about the weight which enables you to: work at top efficiency without becoming tired and irritable; be your most cheerful with your husband, children and friends; avoid frequent colds and headaches.

In other words, think about the weight which helps you wind up each day with your health, emotions and expression intact. That is your preferred weight. If it is exactly or within a few pounds of what you weigh now, you're lucky and should keep up your good eating habits. If it is ten, fifteen or even twenty pounds more than you weigh now, chances are your self-imposed diet is keeping you slim at the expense of wearing you out. Relax—add some weight and some cheer to your life! After all, a woman in a size 16 can be just as attractively turned out as a sylph in a size 7! (Helen Fraley discovered on her weight return that she felt and looked better at 150 pounds than she did at her reduced weight of 135.)

If, in being honest with yourself, you discover you weigh ten, twenty or thirty pounds more than your preferred weight, then try to recognize and correct the reasons you have let yourself go.

If you have ever defended your weight with the plaintive cry "everything I eat turns to fat," take heart in learning that Doctor Bruch and other forward-thinking medical scientists are less prone today to reject this possibility altogether. Recent investigation suggests that "deviations in internal carbohydrate-fat metabolism may be one cause in the development of obesity." In other words, it is not only the food you eat, but the way your body burns it up, that may determine the fate of your figure. This could explain why one woman maintains a high weight on meals that seem barely enough to keep a busy housewife alive, while her neighbor eats circles around her and still boasts a flat tummy and a 24" waistline.

Doctor Bruch hastens to add that this new physiological approach to obesity may apply only to certain cases. She warns women against using the information as a signal to gorge themselves with the thought that Nature alone has the power to determine the outcome. The fact still remains that if you consume more calories each day than your body expends in energy, the "extras" pile up in superfluous fat. Our reason for bringing this interesting thought to your attention is to reassure reasonable eaters who feel frustrated about their weight that modern science is seriously searching for the reason "why."

Really Overweight? Try the Monotonous Diet!

Fortunately, many overweight people can reduce and stay reduced by following one of the conventional low-calorie eating plans which provide a wide choice of natural foods. Others, no matter how hard they try, cannot stick to a calorie-counting diet.

When such "business as usual" diets fail, Doctor Bruch believes a "monotonous diet" may be the helpful answer. "Monotonous Diet" is the unglamorous name she has given to the more restricting diets, which contain all essential foods, but which lay down the law, once and for all, about what a fat person should eat. (These diets are not to be confused with trick diets which starve you by supplying too little nourishment, or trick diets which stuff you with filling foods to give you a feeling of satisfaction but which actually are lacking in balanced nutrition. Such diets, if followed for any length of time, could cause harm.)

Doctor Bruch has found that many severely overweight people have more success with a diet which eliminates choice or self-denial at every meal.

"The Fabulous Formula Diet fits into this category," says Doctor Bruch, "because it avoids the social handicaps, the 'this-time-it-won't-hurt-me' attitude about dieting. It keeps you from constantly agitating over a little bit of this, a little bit of that or a little bit of the other thing." Doctor Bruch and other physicians have found in personal experience that the monotonous type of dieting is also a convenient method of short-order reducing. She recently prefaced a trip to Copenhagen, where she had been invited to participate in a medical conference on obesity, by using the Fabulous Formula Diet part time for two weeks. "I knew the deliciously rich Danish food would be irresistible," says Doctor Bruch, "and I had to lose some weight ahead of time if I wanted to come back with my preferred weight intact." We were glad to learn from such an eminent authority, whose opinions on nutrition are highly respected by her medical colleagues, that she has personally found the Fabulous Formula Diet to be a reliable and handy way to reduce.

Another supersimplified diet is the pound-of-hamburger-a-day diet. On this, you have ¼ pound of hamburger for breakfast, ¼ pound for lunch and ½ pound for dinner, with ½ grapefruit or a green vegetable for each meal. A salt-free diet may also work by the simple expedient of making the diet something different from ordinary family meals. The major value of these packaged diets is that they keep an overweight person from being obsessed with food. Reducing diets, regardless of type, should never be undertaken without the approval and supervision of a physician.

The timing of your diet may also have effect on its success. Doctor Bruch believes that dieting is especially hard at times of increased emotional or physical responsibility, or during periods when you are engaged in any sort of work that makes special demands on you. She says, "College students have told me they would gain as much as fifteen pounds during examinations which they could easily lose again during the following vacation period." In planning your diet, select a suitable time—the week your husband will be off on a business trip, the time following your spring cleaning, or early in the fall when the children are back in school and your daily life becomes more orderly and serene. Businesswomen might start "Operation Diet" when work is going especially well.

One final word. Avoid self-recrimination and self-pity and, instead, try to meet your weight problem with real understanding. Give it respect, treat it with courage, and rejoice in new self-esteem!

Detailed information on the problems of overweight is included in Dr. Hilde Bruch's book, The Importance of Overweight, published by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.

100 rooms and marble halls with millions of dollars' worth of paintings and lavish furnishings and started giving parties. She was a great success. At Playa she enjoyed introducing the Duke and Duchess of Windsor to Palm Beach society, though they were perhaps not unknown even there. This year she decided she could no longer maintain it with a suitable staff of servants, and she put it on the market. The only prospective buyer, a private school, was rejected by the Palm Beach zoning board. Mrs. Dodge then announced she would tear it down at a cost of $150,000, and auction off its furnishings. But before its demise she gave a party. It was like the old days. There were two orchestras, a champagne fountain, twenty pounds of Beluga caviar (at $35 a pound) served in a carved-ice swan. Mrs. Dodge, who sometimes decks her short chunky figure in a manner felt to be a bit overelegant, was her most distinguished in simple floating black chiffon relieved only by her diamonds and pearls.

No one speaks of us in our presence as he does in our absence. BLAISE PASCAL

She loves to dance and hardly gets a chance these days. That night she was seldom off the floor—hard stone floors that had many youngsters whipped early in the evening. The most formidable names in New York and Palm Beach society were there—more than two hundred of them; and when she bade the last of them good night well into the morning her eyes were streaming with tears for that unrecapturable, most glamorous period of her life.

Now most of the time Mrs. Dodge stays in a two-story maisonette apartment at the Everglades Club, seeing old friends and occasionally her son Horace II, whom she adores, and who is now married to former showgirl Gregg Sherwood, his fifth wife. Only occasionally does she go back to Detroit to reopen briefly the Grosse Pointe Farms mansion which she and Horace, Sr., built at a reported cost of $1,000,000, with solid-gold plumbing fixtures in the bathrooms, where the staff at one time included two men hired to do nothing but polish silver. Her yacht, the Delphine, when in full commission requires a crew of 78—which is the reason it is not in commission now. Among her jewels are the Empress Catherine of Russia pearls, said to be the most magnificent string of pearls in existence, bought for her as a present by Horace when he won his $40,000,000 suit against Henry Ford.

When Dodge died in 1920 he left her many holdings, but the largest single chunk was $141,000,000 in tax-exempt municipal bonds which even at a low annual interest rate of 1⅝ per cent makes a happy income to count on every year.

In 1926 she met Hugh Dillman, former actor and ex-husband of actress Marjorie Rambeau, in Italy, and a year later they married. Dillman, friends feel, taught Anna Dodge "how to have fun with her money." They traveled, went to parties, gave parties and didn't worry about a thing. They were "So many people think of a recipe as eating," says Jinx, "instead of 'do I have what I need to make it that good?' Yet I've found, particularly with chicken, that freshness is the key to how well the recipe turns out. That's why I'm happy about Acronized chicken. It takes the guesswork out of buying and cooking chicken. You don't have to worry because you know it's fresh when it's Acronized. All you have to do is find the chicken with the Acronized seal, and you're sure every recipe will taste deliciously different through real freshness and flavor."

The freshness and tastiness of Acronized chicken is not the result of a freezing or pre-cooking process. Rather, it is due to a processing agent that slows the growth of bacteria which cause spoilage and loss of freshness and flavor.

So next time you are shopping for chicken — look or ask for the one with the Acronized seal — it's your best buy for reliably fresh chicken. And remember, IF IT HASN'T THE SEAL, IT ISN'T ACRONIZED!

divorced in 1947, and she resumed her former name of Mrs. Horace E. Dodge. She is sole administrator of the fortune for its next heirs, Horace II, his children and the children of Delphine, who died in 1943 after marriages to James H. R. Cromwell, socialite, who later became minister to Canada and husband of Doris Duke; Raymond T. Baker, director of the U. S. Mint in the Wilson-Harding administrations; and Timothy Godde, English bank clerk. This reponsibility has brought painful court actions from Godde, who sued for an amount he said was agreed on for his waiver to all rights to Delphine's estate, and from Mrs. Christine Cromwell "Cee-Cee" Asserson, who claimed she needed a greater portion of her inheritance in advance.

Anna Dodge is little interested in great sums of money, but fascinated by the idea of money, which she grasps more vividly in small amounts. She loves to play tampola ("little raffle") at the Everglades, and when a game is going she enforces a strict rule of silence at her table while she watches the cards intently, and gives little moans of dismay when other tables seem to gather most of the prizes. The top prize is seldom more than $50.

Mrs. Merriweather Post, on the other hand, is a combination of the old and new kinds of multimillionairess. A charming woman who spends lavishly on herself and those around her, she also has one of America's top business brains and perhaps has given away more money than any other woman in the nation's history.

When Marjorie Post was born in Springfield, Illinois, C. W. Post was still only a traveling salesman. By the time she was nine, he had invented the common plow blade, men's cummerbund suspenders and Post Toasties and was making a great success in Battle Creek, Michigan. He took her, while still in her teens, to company meetings with him and explained how business worked and invited her to ask questions. When he died in 1914 she became the already huge company's largest single stockholder and remained so until 1922, when with her second husband, Edward Hutton, she began to work mergers with other companies—Jello, Maxwell House Coffee, Log Cabin Syrup—eventually fifty products that became the General Foods Corporation, of which she is still a director.

She has been married three times. The first time was to Edward B. Close, an attorney she met shortly after she was graduated from a Washington, D. C., seminary, and with whom she had two daughters, Adelaide and Eleanor. The second was to Edward Hutton, businessman and father of her third daughter, Nedenia, who is now Mrs. Stanley Rumbough, Jr., of New York City, the mother of three small children and a part-time actress now appearing as Dina Merrill in a supporting role in the movie Desk Set. Her third marriage was to Joseph E. Davies, later U. S. ambassador to Russia. They are now divorced.

Mrs. Post's marriages have seemed to mark definite periods in her development. As Mrs. Close she became established socially. As Hutton's wife she became an avid collector, at first of businesses for the General Foods Corporation, then of possessions of all kinds: jewelry, houses, boats, rare furniture—everything for luxurious living on an almost incredible scale. With Davies, she became intensely interested for the first time in philanthropy and politics.

With Hutton she built the Sea Cloud, largest privately owned sailing yacht in the world and a breath-takingly beautiful sight under full sail—350 feet long, a four-masted bark-rigged vessel outfitted like a floating mansion. It had gold-plated washbasins, a $4500 set of bone china and cost $1,000,000 a year for maintenance alone.

The Huttons also maintained four huge homes: a 54-room Fifth Avenue apartment in New York City which rented for $75,000 a year and was said to be the nation's largest individual apartment; an estate near Roslyn, Long Island; Mir-A-Lago at Palm Beach, where she frequently gave parties costing $40,000 to $50,000; and Topridge, actually a private village in the Adirondacks approachable only by barge across a lake, accommodating 30 guests in individual houses with a staff of 40 servants.

At Mir-A-Lago she once hired the Ringling Brothers-Barnum and Bailey Circus for three days—the first day for her guests, the next two days for orphans and underprivileged children she then brought in from the surrounding area.

During the depression she seemed to recall her father's words to her that "the duty of the rich is to give to the poor." She became interested in philanthropy and politics, particularly in the Democratic Party. During World War I she gave the Red Cross money to build what was then the largest base hospital of its kind in the world at Savenay, France. She financed and personally supervised a Salvation Army feeding station in New York's Hell's Kitchen which fed 1000 people a day from 1929 to 1935.

With mystery writer Mary Roberts Rinehart, she became interested in a giant women's crusade to abolish crime through small anti-corruption groups. Women could fight crime more effectively than men, they believed—"Their reaction to it is more violent. They have a faculty for organizing and pushing through."

She was decorated by the governments of Belgium, Luxembourg and the Dominican Republic for her relief work.

It was her interest in the Democratic Party that caused the final rift with Hutton, not a New Dealer. They were divorced in 1935. And in December of that year she married Joseph E. Davies in a $100,000 all-blush-pink wedding at the New York apartment, where caterers tinted everything from flowers to the 300-pound wedding cake to match a swatch from her wedding gown. The newlyweds sailed aboard the Sea Cloud to the West Indies. Shortly afterward Davies was named ambassador to Russia. His wife prepared for the move by sending over in advance two tons of frozen food, including 2000 pints of frozen cream, and a dozen electric refrigerators which she had heard were unavailable in the U.S.S.R. (General Foods had just taken over Birds-Eye and she was much interested in the new process.)

Drab, austere Moscow was a period of trial for the gay, social-minded Mrs. Davies. She bore up bravely, but made no secret of her delight when her husband was made ambassador to Belgium two years later: "Thank God," she cried, "it's got a king."

Back in Washington after the start of World War II, Davies served intermittently on diplomatic missions abroad and Marjorie Davies again entered into the lavish social life. At Tregaron, the Davieses became a noted capital waltz team. In 1950 Mrs. Davies introduced capital society to the square dance and Virginia reel, which became instantly popular. Davies never learned to square-dance. In 1955 Mrs. Davies was granted an Idaho divorce on grounds of mental cruelty and incompatibili

She resumed her maiden name, reopen Mir-A-Lago, moved into a new apartme in New York, bought a new estate, "H wood," in Washington and started givi parties again.

"Marjorie Post," said a friend, "has stamina that is very discouraging. She com into a room and everyone else looks e hausted." It would be humanly impossit for her to enter a room unnoticed, partly b cause of her bursting vitality, partly becau over a figure already slightly robust she som times wears large feathered and floppy ha grand fur pieces and sweeping gowns. T effect is, of course, overwhelming. She is r ported to own about 10 per cent of Gener Foods stock, among other holdings, and is the nation's highest income-tax bracket. S actively oversees all her interests, includi two counties of oil land in Texas, which mov the Grand Duchess Charlotte of Luxembou to remark on meeting her, "I understand th your kingdom is bigger than mine."

Financial responsibilities have sat light on Marjorie Post and she seems to enjoy h money as much as anyone; but "wealth she has said often, "is a greater responsibili than it is a privilege."

No one could agree with her more than Mr Chauncey McCormick, of Chicago. Bo Marion Deering, she is heiress to two gre fortunes—the McCormick reaper and t Deering plow. Both have long been incorp rated in the International Harvester Cor pany. Mrs. McCormick still is acutely emba rassed by her election as Chicago socie queen. A friend explained, "It's just all out character for Marion. She loathes attention

When she visits the International Harvest offices, where Brooks McCormick, one of h three sons, is director of manufacturin "you'd think it was somebody's aunt fro Ohio wearing a well-cut but undistinguishe little suit." and have totaled more than $1,000,000; the Illinois Home and Aid Society, where she has been a guiding force for more than thirty years; and to the Miami Corporation, one of the nation's wealthiest private holding companies with vast oil interests in the South, large blocks of downtown Chicago real estate and assets believed to run into the hundreds of millions. It is reported to be the largest single holder of International Harvester common stock.

She is a gifted hostess and when she entertains in her fourteen-room Lake View Avenue apartment—mostly at small dinners since her husband's death last year—"she looks like a McCormick." Out come the pearls and rubies, the soft gray chiffons sprinkled with brilliants. Her eyes sparkle and she is gay and laughing. "And then she'll disappear somewhere," said a friend, "and you'll see her off with someone she has noticed was a little out of things, and she will be trying to make him happy and comfortable. Marion is a most gentle, simpatico person."

But she never lets people forget that though she married a McCormick—a cousin of the late Chicago Tribune publisher Robert R. McCormick—"I myself am a Deering." She was reared in the tradition of great wealth on one of the most fabulous estates ever built in America—the $10,000,000 Florida home of her uncle, James Deering, "Vizcaya." Deering never married, and the chief joy of his waning years was planning Vizcaya as the perfect setting for art treasures collected over a lifetime. It took 800 men over five years to build, including several hundred special workmen in stone and mosaics brought over from Europe. The result was a 72-room mansion topping two great terraces that has been called the only modern construction comparable in splendor to the Versailles Palace. It contained uncounted priceless treasures in tapestry, furniture, porcelain and metalwork. The foundation was threaded with underground grottoes. Surrounding it were Chinese pagodas, canals, tea gardens, boathouses, and in front a man-made island 330 feet long and 165 feet wide, covered with lush tropical blooms and sunk in a huge stone-constructed basin. At night special lighting effects played over the island. The whole place required a year-around staff of 100 gardeners alone. After Deering died, the McCormicks maintained it, but finally turned it over to Dade County as a museum in 1952.

Besides occupying her luxurious Chicago apartment sheltering Goyas, El Grecos and rare jades, Mrs. McCormick spends appropriate periods of the year at a farm in Naperville, Illinois, where they used to raise prize-winning Guernsey cattle; at a new 18-room "cottage" in Florida; and at the family home in Seal Harbor, Maine. When she is not otherwise occupied she writes letters, dozens every week, to friends and to persons who have written her because they saw her name in the paper. She feels it a duty to answer every one personally; she would no more dream of turning this task over to a secretary than she would delegate the planning of one of her elegant "little dinners." Her son Roger teases her that she "would, if she ran out, I do believe, start answering the ads in the paper that say 'Do you have heart pains and falling arches?'"

Equally publicity-shy—"You can't get a birth announcement out of the Fords," say Detroit newspapermen—is Mrs. Edsel Ford, widow of the late Ford Motor Company president and mother of its present head, Henry II. Besides the Ford multimillions, she inherited as Eleanor Clay one of the Midwest's great department-store fortunes from her uncle, J. L. Hudson.

Since the death of the elder Fords, however, Detroit society has seen a change in Eleanor Ford, a new gaiety where before she was quiet and subdued. Indeed, during the elder Fords' lifetime the Edsel Fords' existence, business and social, was ringed about with Henry's rigid rules against drinking even a light glass of wine, or smoking, or excess merrymaking of any kind—"They didn't breathe," said an old-line Detroiter.

This known austerity plus the Fords' extreme desire for privacy gave rise inevitably to rumors of intrafamily difficulties—the report, for example, that the elder Fords refused to speak to their son and daughter-in-law for months after an all-night party for the then Prince of Wales, later Edward VIII, that ended in a 2 A.M. cruise on the Detroit River; and that Henry, Sr., personally perpetrated the theft of a $100,000 strand of pearls from the Edsel Ford home because he thought such baubles were too frivolous.

These are pure legend—gossipers were astounded at the richness of Clara Ford's own jewels when she died a few years after Henry—but it is true that the elder Fords were a reining, not to say sometimes depressingly restrictive, influence on the Edsel Fords' social life. "After Edsel died in 1943 Eleanor went into deep mourning. They were truly devoted to each other," people in Detroit feel. When Henry resumed the presidency Eleanor Ford became a vice president and for years, until her youngest son came of age, she went to board meetings and was Ford's largest single stockholder. For part of that period she controlled 54 per cent of Ford voting stock.

But lately "she's like a debutante," a friend said. "She goes to parties, she's gay, she does whatever she wants to—probably for the first time in her life, Eleanor Ford is really free. And it's changed her whole face. She looks pretty and young. She did the Charleston at a party in Washington. She's taken up the new fluffy hair.

"I don't mean she's too gay—Eleanor Ford could never be anything but a lady—but she's happy and she's having fun. Everybody had forgotten Eleanor Ford was a lovely woman. Now she sweeps into a room in a pink satin ball gown by Mainbocher, with that schoolgirl face and her tiny waist and a skirt out to here, and you know."

With her sons all officials of the Ford Company, she has resigned her own offices, and though she continues to fulfill a score of social and civic obligations, she also travels extensively, to Washington, New York, abroad. She winter-visits at the Sea Ridge estate of the Ernst Kanzlers in Hobe Sound (Kanzler was married to Mrs. Ford's sister, the strikingly beautiful Josephine Clay, who drowned three years ago in their swimming pool); and in summer goes to the Fords' 75-acre estate at Seal Harbor, Maine. In Detroit she stays on in the exquisitely furnished and architecturally prize-winning $3,000,000 English Cotswold house which she and Edsel built on Lake St. Clair, for which they themselves brought many of the materials and furnishings back from England. All her children are married and living in nearby Grosse Pointe Farms—Henry II, Benson, William and Josephine (who married Walter Buhl Ford; no family connection, one of the old investment families of Detroit. Old-line Detroiters still refer to the match as "a case of the old aristocracy marrying nouveau riche," the "car mechanic" Fords being the parvenus).

Mrs. Ford is thought to have tried very hard to raise all children with a sense of duty but also with a spirit of fun, feeling that Edsel Ford had too much duty, too little fun in his life.

In contrast to Mrs. Dodge, who spent little time in Detroit for years, and so is regarded as an expatriate, Mrs. Ford is generally loved. She is part of Detroit and her good deeds are legion and legendary. She is a foremost patron of the Detroit Institute of Arts, one of the nation's finest art collections. She founded entirely on her own inspiration the unique "Children's House," a tuition-free school where children are helped to see and appreciate beautiful things and express their reactions to them. She is active in Junior League, Women's City Club, and many other organizations, including the Franklin Settlement House where she did her first social-service work at the age of fifteen, teaching tap dancing to settlement youngsters.

There are uncounted "eyewitness" stories of her unpublicized personal acts of kindness and charity. A few years ago she was forced into the local political spotlight briefly when a change in boundary lines made her estate the only populated section of Lake Township, except for one neighbor; so that she, the neighbor, her chauffeur, groundskeeper and their wives were the only available candidates for the township board of review. They won a predictable landslide victory. Boundary lines since have changed again and a new board has taken over.

Most of Mrs. Ford's entertaining is done quietly, at home, although recently she gave an afternoon benefit party for 300. But more often she invites only family and close friends (which can mean 150 people in itself) to parties beside the swimming pool in summer, or for gala Christmas affairs in the Great Hall. For such occasions she may bring in an orchestra, caterer and decorator from New York to do over the entire hall. But also, she is blissfully happy with her grandchildren and loves to invite just them over for afternoon tea with her.

Mrs. Henry Ford II—the former Anne McDonnell, of New York, who was named to last year's best-dressed list of the New York Dress Institute—is credited with making her mother-in-law more style-conscious in recent years. Two things Mrs. Edsel Ford never does: drive her own car; appear on the street without gloves. She nearly always manages to have yellow tea roses around, wherever she is.

Doris Duke makes a farm her headquarters these days—the 2500-acre Duke family farm at Somerville, New Jersey—but it is only the jumping-off place for New York, Paris, Hawaii or South America.

Miss Duke is as passionately desirous of anonymity as Mrs. Ford, but where Mrs. Ford achieves her goal with an almost total news blackout, the "richest girl in the world," heiress to the multimillion-dollar American Tobacco Company fortune of her father, James Buchanan Duke, fails utterly. Probably there have been as many words printed about her as about any other woman in the history of the world.

All her millions have brought the blond heiress little joy, for reasons difficult to discover. She was reared in strict simplicity, according to her father's rule. She was privately tutored, then sent to private schools. James Duke died when she was thirteen, but her mother carried on his plan. Doris was introduced to Newport society in 1930 and later that same year was presented at court in Buckingham Palace.

She was a pretty, shy, honey-blond girl, unspoiled and likable, inclined to be bookish and retiring. In 1933 she came into the first of her inheritance and in 1935 she married James H. R. Cromwell, sixteen years her senior and the former husband of Delphine Dodge, of the Detroit auto maker's family. In 1937 she built the magnificent Shangri-La estate, an Arabian Nights palace at the foot of Diamond Head in Hawaii. It had walls of priceless Persian tiles, a fountain from Damascus, a jade-inlaid bathroom, a swimming pool with hydraulic-elevator diving board. Rare orchids grew indoors and out. Her own suite was of all-white alabaster, with appointments of pearl and dressing-room walls inserted with mirrors after the design of the Taj Mahal. One entire dining-room wall was the side of a glass aquarium containing tropical fish swimming in a setting of white coral. The Cromwells spent much time in Hawaii, living quietly, entertaining

WHY CAN'T A WOMAN BE MORE LIKE A MAN?

Because, according to Arlene Dahl, Betty MacDonald, Mrs. Norman Vincent Peale and others, it is in so many ways so rewarding to be womanly. You'll know these celebrated women better after you read "Why I Like Being a Woman."

Fern Morlang, of Fallon, Nevada, was a widow fifteen hours after her husband felt the first pain of cerebral hemorrhage. With five children, aged from fourteen years to fourteen months, and no insurance, she learned the hard truth about what Social Security can and cannot do. friends. Occasionally they visited their homes at Newport, Lynnewood in North Carolina, the cottage at Antibes, a Palm Beach villa or the farm at Somerville. But they liked Shangri-La best. Then James Cromwell was named U. S. Minister to Canada, and Doris went along.

In 1940 she gave birth to a baby girl three months prematurely. It lived only twenty-four hours. Shortly afterward the Cromwells separated and in 1943 Doris Duke Cromwell obtained a Nevada divorce, although later it was disputed in long and painful court proceedings. Doris Duke then plunged into the United States' World War II effort.

She offered to take over the care of 500 refugee children for the duration. She gave Shangri-La as a base where officers could rest from Pacific combat duty. She turned over her 55-foot yacht to the Navy. She got her first real job, paying $1 a year, as a worker for the United Seamen's Service, helping American merchant seamen with various problems. She went to a U.S.S. school in New Orleans, then was sent to Egypt and, later, Rome. For the Allied air forces she interviewed servicemen in recordings that were sent back to their home-town radio stations. She looked vital and happy; and she said it was the happiest period of her life up to then—"I really feel that I'm doing something worth while and earning the right to be friends with a lot of swell, interesting people that I've somehow missed before," she said. "I've discovered, I guess, that it's fun to work." Afterward she took an assignment with International News Service, sending back interviews from the Balkans. She returned to the United States briefly in 1947, then having been named America's best-dressed society woman, went back to Europe as fashion editor for Harper's Bazaar in Paris. That same year she married Porfirio Rubirosa, Dominican playboy-diplomat, who had been the husband previously of French actress Danielle Darrieux and Flor Trujillo, daughter of Dominican President Rafael Trujillo. Rubirosa later briefly married Woolworth heiress Barbara Hutton. The Duke-Rubirosa marriage lasted fourteen months; and with its breakup all the fine verve seemed to fade. "I'm not soured on marriage," she said. "I'm willing to try again." But she wept as she said it.

In recent years she has traveled widely and restlessly. In the United States she often commutes between New York City and the farm at Somerville, where Rutgers University now operates the world's most modern piggery with individual air-conditioned stalls, each equipped with special water sprays and deodorant atomizers. Her name has been linked romantically with several men. She has become an avid jazz fan and often visits Birdland and other Manhattan hot-music haunts.

She is still shy and awkward-seeming with strangers. She practices yoga, from which she had got some peace of mind. It has not been the complete answer, but it may have helped her over some of the rougher spots.

Jessie Ball duPont is now the wealthiest of a fabulously wealthy family that got its start in 1802 with a gunpowder mill on the banks of Brandywine Creek and rolled up huge fortunes for everybody connected with it. At one time the duPont family included 75 millionaires. When Jessie Ball entered the family it was boiling with feuds. Jessie, a gentle, soft-spoken schoolteacher, met Alfred Irénée duPont and they fell very simply in love.

Alfred had made a success of the company reorganization and fathered four children with his first wife when he decided to get a divorce. His astonished wife, Bessie, sweetheart of his youth, gave no opposition. He was forthright in stating his reason: "I've been married twenty years and at forty-two I feel like an old man. I hope it will be different when I'm single again."

Family members sided with the first Mrs. duPont. Their indignation was not assuaged a year later when he married young Mrs. Alicia Maddox, his second cousin, who had obtained a divorce from his private secretary, George Maddox. All Wilmington, Delaware, society was drawn into the warring camps.

Slander suits were filed. In 1913 Alfred became so exasperated he tried to get the Delaware legislature to pass a bill changing his son's name from Alfred to Dorsey duPont. Alicia's death a few years later did not heal the rifts. In another reorganization coup Alfred was forced out of control of the business in which, though he remained E. I. duPont de Nemours' largest single stockholder, he was never again able to seize an overriding role.

It was at this time, with family and business associations fragmented by feuds and bitter feelings, that Jessie met Alfred and was attracted, as many women were, to the nearly bald, half blind and deaf (from hunting accidents) but still handsome and fiercely vigorous man. They were married in 1921.

Alfred admired Jessie's mind and everything else about her, including the fact that he couldn't walk all over her. He encouraged her to use her quick intelligence, and set her up in an office next to his in Florida, where he forgot the duPonts and began to oversee his vast other holdings in real estate, railroads and banking. "Don't rubber-stamp these," he would warn Jessie in handing her a sheaf of letters. "Criticize them." He seldom made a decision without her. Gradually he softened; by 1925 word went out that the rest of the family had been won over, too, by the quick charming ways of the brown-eyed, gentle-voiced daughter of a Virginia attorney. The hatchet was buried for good.

STORM WARNING

By THELMA IRELAND

They now predict a hurricane.
Its course is charted, so
The people have some warning
Of which way it will go.
But there's a hurricane, age two,
Whose course begins at dawn.
You cannot tell which way he'll go
But you can where he's gone.

Alfred became interested in humanitarian projects—treating crippled children, creating college scholarship funds, preserving historic Southern shrines. Together he and Jessie poured millions of duPont dollars into such worthy causes. They became interested in art and music, which Alfred learned to enjoy despite his deafness (he used an ear trumpet with exaggerated dramatic effect most of his life).

When the Delaware legislature failed to pass a bill establishing old-age pensions in 1929, Alfred set up his own pension system under which nearly 1000 worthy persons over 65 received payments from him until the state finally acted. He bought radium mines in Colorado and set aside large sums for research in the use of radium to treat cancer.

He and Jessie worked as such a close unit that when he died in 1935, one of the largest landowners in Florida, both his charitable and business interests went on without a break under her administration.

Mrs. duPont spends nearly eight hours every day at the St. Joe Paper Company in Jacksonville, where she is board chairman, attending to company business and her interests in the Florida East Coast Railroad and the Florida National Bank, parent organization of the Florida National group of twenty-two banks, of which she is a director. She is lifetime trustee of the Alfred I. duPont Estate, director of the Alfred I. duPont Institute at Wilmington, and president of the Alfred I. duPont Foundation in Jacksonville, and has given away millions of dollars to educational and charitable projects, particularly in Southern colleges and universities, where she supports at least seventy full scholarships every year.

Last year she finished serving a four-year term on the Florida State Board of Control, to ich she was appointed by Gov. Fuller War- to consult on policy and conduct of lorida institutions of higher learning.

She maintains three estates: Nemours, in lmington, where Alfred is buried at the base a 210-foot carillon tower, and most of hich now has been turned over to a crippled ildren's free clinic; Ditchley, a small Geor- an brick house in Virginia; and Epping orest, near Jacksonville, where she spends ost of her time.

When not working, Jessie duPont likes to ear big floppy hats and sprinkle her conver- tion with regional expressions from her Vir- nia childhood. "In my kittenhood years," e will say, "my daddy used to ride me out in e countryside with him and I'd be his helper, llecting his fees. He was a lawyer." Her father lped develop her early business sense and terest in the intricacies of business relation- ips.

Jessie duPont has dozens of close friends d she has some of them over to dinner arly every night. "I love socializing," she ys, "in my own home, and not for the ciety pages. However, that's not my biggest orry; I've never really been received in ciety."

People seldom see the great jewels she owns. sually she wears two rings and a simple pearl ecklace.

"I'd love to wear some of my jewelry," she ghs, "but I don't even see it myself most the time. It's in the bank. It's not worth tting cracked over the head for it."

Mrs. Frederick E. Guest, fragile, white- aired, whose immense blue eyes show clearly e beauty that was a half century ago, might ave become the first woman to fly the At- ntic.

She failed because her family found out bout her plans.

But life has its compensations. She is a ving gold-encrusted improvement on the ap opera about the poor little girl from the Vest who grew up to marry England's rich- st, most handsome lord.

The chief variant from the legend is economic: Mrs. Guest inherited two huge fortunes. The other hardly counts, because Frederick Guest, if not quite a lordship, was certainly one of England's most handsome and wealthy noblemen. Nor has life held many baffling soap-opera complications for Amy Phipps Guest—it's been excitement and fun all the way. And it still is, though at 85 she has been pressured into listening to doctors who say she must begin to take care of herself.

Reluctantly she let her secretary take along a wheel chair last year when she insisted on going to the troubled Middle East personally to see what was causing all the difficulty. Mrs. Guest talked with leaders of many nations, including Israeli Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion and Egyptian President Nasser. She came back with no cure-all but with greater understanding, which "is always part of the solution. We have to start there always."

She has made many similarly motivated trips in recent years, several times to Europe, each time visiting heads of state. "People would have me take such care of myself I'd never do anything interesting"—an interference she tolerated only once, to her regret, and has no intention of allowing now.

Mrs. Guest is the custodian of two huge fortunes founded in iron and steel on two sides of the ocean. Her father, Henry Phipps, was a partner of Andrew Carnegie. Her husband inherited an equally large fortune which he left to her on his death in 1937. The holdings now extend into nearly every phase of the nation's economy; the real-estate holdings alone, in Florida, New York and along great stretches of the Atlantic coastline, are estimated to be worth $400 million.

Few lives have held the glamour and adventure that have been the lifelong lot of Amy Phipps. As a child she was surrounded by wealth and luxury, private trains, servants, famous, charming and distinguished people, homes in London, Paris, Africa, a castle on the Scottish moors and estates in New York, Long Island and Florida. Her wedding present from Frederick Guest, third son of the Baron of Wimborne and first cousin of Sir Winston Churchill, was the world-famed Park Lane, London, residence of Alfred Beit, a partner in Cecil Rhodes' diamond mines. Here she entertained for diplomats and government heads. She and Frederick shared a high sense of adventure and instilled it in their children. They took them along big-game hunting in the Kenya Colony; introduced them early to international society with its attendant interests in riding, horse racing and polo, in which both their sons became experts.

Especially the Guests shared a passionate interest in aviation. Frederick Guest served as British Air Secretary in 1921–22, and Amy was one of the first women to take an active interest in flying an airplane herself. She was laying plans for a pioneer flight across the Atlantic when her family got wind of it and blocked her flatly. Instead, then, she backed Amelia Earhart in her successful Atlantic flight in 1932. But it wasn't the same thing, and the years have not dimmed her acute disappointment that she didn't do it herself.

Amy Guest's next trip undoubtedly will be conceived, planned and got under way inside a week, or two weeks at the most. Until then the popular, unceasingly active lady will make her headquarters at Villa Armetis, the huge rolling water-front estate near Palm Beach which she lent to the Navy as a convalescent hospital during World War II. She may go up to New York for a few days to see old friends, take in some shows and discuss business with her sons, Raymond and Winston Guest. Her daughter, Diana, now the Countess de la Valdone, lives in a seventeenth-century château outside Paris and she may fly there to visit with her before returning to Palm Beach, where she enters actively into local society and civic life, has friends over for dinner and informal group singing, and paints and sculpts.

The Whitney family is as fraught with distinguished names as with money. Paynes, Vanderbilts, Hays; they have been over here since 1635, and fantastically wealthy since shortly after the Civil War, when William Collins Whitney—the present heirs' grandfather—acted as lawyer in disputes between the traction barons and city governments and earned large fees which quickly became astronomical when he invested them in oil and tobacco interests.

At about this same time his brother-in-law, Oliver Payne, was lining up alongside John D. Rockefeller in the Standard Oil Company. Later William became Navy Secretary under Cleveland, and John Hay, the present heirs' maternal grandfather, served as Lincoln's secretary, U.S. Ambassador to London and as Secretary of State under both McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt.

When Jock Whitney—now U.S. Ambassador to Great Britain, but still most often labeled "millionaire sportsman"—removed himself from the Social Register a few years ago, everybody waited for his sister to do the same thing. She retained her listing; but it is one of the few times that Joan Whitney Payson (Mrs. Charles Shipman Payson) and her brother have ever chosen to go separate ways. As children they picked blueberries together during summer vacations in New Hampshire to increase their allowances by one penny for every 100 berries picked. They indulged a mutual fascination for the movies and spent all their extra money to sit spellbound through as many as a dozen in a single week. And in 1927 they shared with their mother, Helen Hay Whitney, in one of the largest estates ever filed for probate—a fortune estimated at Payne Whitney's death to amount to nearly $300 million before taxes.

Mrs. Payson and her brother have continued to be of similar minds about how their money should be spent for charity, financial return and fun, so the sharing has gone on ever since. They, with their mother, gave the Payne Whitney gymnasium to Yale University. Together they donated the land and financed a large part of the building of the new North Shore, Long Island, hospital near their estate. Individual projects show their mutual concern, as Joan's Helen Hay Whitney Foundation set up to study rheumatic fever after Jock was stricken with the disease.

They have backed numbers of theatrical and movie ventures and their friends include many of the outstanding personalities of the entertainment world: the Gary Coopers, Mary Martin and her husband Richard Halliday, the Sid Caesars. They were the first big financial supporters of Technicolor and formed their own company to produce color-showcase films. This company became Selznick-International and its productions included the biggest movie moneymaker ever made, Gone With the Wind. Later they backed Life With Father on Joan's insistence after Jock and his friend Robert Benchley rejected the original manuscript. Eventually they turned over all their earnings from the play and movie version to the Helen Hay charitable trust.

But the most familiar association with the Whitney name is through the black-and-pink silks of one of the world's most successful racing stables, Greentree. Now valued at some $11,000,000, Greentree has developed such famous Thoroughbreds as Easter Hero, Capot and Tom Fool. Its success, however, is attributable to the genius of its management under the Whitneys' mother, Helen Hay Whitney, who never missed a Belmont meeting (even when she had a broken leg) or an important race at any other track, and was known by every stableboy and racing fan as the "First Lady of the American Turf." She set up stables on Long Island, a stud farm in Kentucky, winter stables in New Jersey, and a spacious home at Saratoga where the family could cruise up the Hudson aboard their yacht and stay for the racing season.

Mrs. Whitney's main interest, however, was in improving the breed, not winning at the track. It was part of her basic conviction that life is lively and interesting to just about the same extent that it is possible to bring about improvements in it.

Accordingly, when Joan married and had her own children, and noted a dearth of good children's books, she started her own bookshop. She furnished it with books she liked, even clerked occasionally, and is supposed to have written several stories which turned up in print there, although she always denied this. While her children were still babies she and her mother every year held the Greentree Fete on their estate for the Babies' Milk Fund. Later when Joan started her valuable collection of Renoirs, Monets and Munnings and discovered the difficulty of a young artist in getting started, she founded the Country Art Gallery in an old church near her home. She and her friends hold monthly exhibitions and receptions there and the gallery is a helpful showcase for talented artistic newcomers.

If every person in the United States were asked to identify Mrs. Payson's picture, it is doubtful that more than a few dozen, her friends, could do it. And if she were put with a group of representative women, and the question asked, "Which has the most money?" she would almost surely poll the fewest votes. "She simply," said a friend, "doesn't look like a woman who is loaded." She wears dark prints and solid colors—"everything elegant, nothing stunning." Plain little hats sit flat or cap style on her medium-brown short hair. She seldom wears jewelry. She hates to be photographed. She diets periodically, being inclined to take on weight, but without lasting success. "Joan is very comfortable to be around and she likes to be comfortable herself. She would never suffer to be thin. But she's a darling, like her mother. Everyone adores her, and her children worship at her feet."

Charles Payson, an attractive red-haired Down Easter from Maine, inherited $1,000,000 in his own right. He and Joan share few outside interests—he is interested chiefly in business and is a director of several companies—but both are devoted to their family and home life together. When Jock inherited the family mansion near Manhasset, they built their own rambling French-colonial home on the same broad Greentree acreage, separated from the Whitneys' only by woods. It is in perfect harmony with its owners' character, being one of the few four-story domiciles anywhere that manage to look cozy inside and out.

The Paysons have not a great deal to do with North Shore society life, but when they throw a ball it is remembered. Often it is a masquerade on the Fourth of July, the eve of their wedding anniversary. They hire a couple of orchestras, deck the trees, the house, everything in sight, and invite hundreds of guests. The party goes on as long as the guests are able. Often they have been known to wind up at ten the next morning with people still in fancy dress playing golf on the Whitneys' private links.

When their five children were young, a familiar sight during Christmas vacations was Mrs. Payson taking them all to lunch at the Waldorf. The death of their son, Daniel, in the Battle of the Bulge during World War II, was a tragic blow, and came at about the same time Jock was reported in enemy hands. For a long time afterward they went out little, devoted themselves to war work. They are still inclined to fuss over John, the youngest, who is still in school.

Their three daughters are married and living in California, Texas and Italy. They see one another frequently. Mrs. Payson is determined that all her grandchildren shall get up on ponies as soon as humanly possible, a time that coincides roughly in her mind with their first faltering steps.

But for sheer drama, life holds no more thrills and suspense than Mrs. Payson experiences in her front-tier box at Belmont track with a yesterday look

Its attractive colonial exterior encloses a house that's up-to-date in convenience and livability.

By CAROL L. CRANE

The snug little-cottage look of this one-story home gives no hint about the spacious accommodations within. But an imaginary tour through the floor plan reveals a happy blend of traditional charm and modern comfort. The wide, gracious entry hall leads with equal ease to the entertaining areas, the sleeping quarters and the family work-and-play kitchen. The formal living room, windowed on three sides, welcomes sunlight and air from dawn until dusk; its corner location discourages through traffic. A built-in china cupboard stretches halfway across the opening between living and dining rooms; crowned by a planter box, it provides just enough privacy for both rooms. Double doors leading to the kitchen swing back to allow easy passage with wide trays or wheeled serving carts.

Once inside the kitchen-family room, all formality disappears. Here the traditional big living kitchen is admirably preserved and adapted to contemporary requirements. Like the kitchen work zone, the family room is finished with easy-to-clean, carefree materials. The centered fireplace has a raised hearth for indoor steak roasts; it doubles for extra seating space when the children entertain. Doors on either side lead to service yard and terrace. The sink and dishwasher back up against a four-foot-high partition—low enough to let mother in on the family fun, high enough to shield the work counter and laundry.

Pull-down stairs in the bedroom hall give access to generous attic storage area augmenting the roomy closets on the living floor below. Trap stairs beneath the service porch lead to a partial basement which houses utilities and bulk storage room.

Estimates for building this house range from $21,700 to $28,000, depending upon local variations in material and labor costs.

The Unladylike Behavior of Maria Mitchell

In a quiet house in Lynn, Massachusetts, in 1889, an old woman lay waiting for death. "Well," she said in amused wonder, "if this is dying, there is nothing very unpleasant about it." And the book closed for one of the most remarkable of the many remarkable women America has produced.

Her story began on a night very long ago when, as a Quaker girl in Nantucket, Maria Mitchell discovered a comet—and got a gold medal worth 20 ducats from the Danish King.

Overnight she became a celebrity. But many people, wedded to the popular notion of woman as a "household ornament," regarded Maria as an unwelcome phenomenon and her discovery as only an accident.

That was because they didn't know Maria Mitchell. At 12 she could regulate a ship's chronometer; at 17 she understood Bowditch's "Practical Navigator" and was studying science in self-taught French, German and Latin. In time she would become the first woman member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, the first woman astronomy professor—in Matthew Vassar's Female College—and a member forever of New York University's Hall of Fame.

Moreover, all her adult life she was to work with growing success in the crusade to make American women free.

No one these days would question the rewards of Maria Mitchell's crusade. Women today enrich every level of public life. And, in family life, they guard financial security two times out of three. One reason, probably, why their families have more than $40,000,000,000 saved—in guaranteed-safe United States Savings Bonds.

hen a Greentree horse is running out in front. Mrs. Payson doesn't get up and holler," the ableboys say—"but she stops talking and ets quiet and just looks tense and pale all ver." She sometimes looks this way when a reentree horse isn't even running. This eans only one thing: she has her little tor-oise-shell pocket radio in the box with her, it's rned on to the ball game and the Dodgers re in a tight spot out at Ebbets Field.

Mrs. Mary Roebling, of Trenton, New Jer-ey, is reputedly one of the smartest women in he United States. She is lso handsome and almost errifyingly able. Though he inherited vast amounts rom two husbands who ied before she was 31—Arthur W. Herbert, a anker, and Siegfried Roeb-ing, whose family money ncluded that of the great Roebling engineering firm that built the Brook-yn Bridge—she undoubtedly has increased er wealth many times through her own alents as a banker.

Mary Gindhart Roebling grew up in Moorestown, New Jersey. Her father, Isaac Gindhart, was commercial manager of the Keystone Telephone Company. She studied merchandising at the University of Pennsylvania and afterward worked briefly for a Philadelphia investment firm. Then she married. After her second husband, Siegfried Roebling, died, she took over his place on the Trenton Trust Company board. A year later, in 1937, she was named the bank's president. Since that time she has been named additionally its board chairman and member of the executive committee, and has increased its total resources from $16,000,000 to $74,000,000. She has also accumulated trusteeships or directorships of 25 other organizations—about half of them commercial, the other half devoted to public service, like the National Lay Committee of Churches of Christ, three Trenton hospitals, the New Jersey Conference of Christians and Jews, the American Immigrant Association, the Women's Committee of the National Safety Council, the Westminster Choir School.

Mrs. Roebling speaks, always pithily, before business executives, women's clubs, citizens' groups in places as far away as Texas, San Francisco and Chicago in a single two-week period. One of her most fervent views is that the time is ripe for election of a woman Vice President of the United States. Before the last election she declared her "firm belief that the political party that selects for its vice-presidential candidate an able woman will be assured of the election by an overwhelming majority."

Anger blows out the lamp of the mind.

—ROBERT G. INGERSOLL

"It's absurd to think you can't have a job and raise a family as well," she retorts to criticism, and her own children "have always been devoted and perfectly well behaved."

Her outside time consists of leftovers from a business day that is ten to eighteen hours long from Labor Day to June. She handles her time with an art that conceals art, and when she breezes into a dinner of business executives or fellow bankers after a day's work there is no sign of strain. There is more likely to be an all-but-audible whistle, because tall, slim, red-blond Mrs. Roebling, who thinks businesswomen should wear inconspicuous clothes during the day, feels they should dress to the hilt after hours. And she has the Christian Dior-Traina Norell gowns, the Tiffany jewels, the sable wraps and the poise "to take everybody's mind off banking for a minute," an associate remarked. "She looks rich," a friend describes her.

She has fewer homes than any of the other "richest" women—only a hotel suite in Trenton and a three-bedroom country house and guesthouse near Stockton, New Jersey. When she entertains, therefore, it is in private parties of ten to thirty at places like New York's Stork Club, El Morocco or the St. Regis roof. Her son, Paul Roebling, is an actor, and her daughter, Elizabeth, is married and the mother of four young children. They all see one another often. She has many escorts, but "it isn't fair to have a husband and a job as demanding as mine," and unless she finds one who takes her mind off her work more than anyone has recently she says she will not remarry.

"I love people. I love clothes and hats and beautiful things. I am a very feminine woman," she reflects. "But I would honestly rather curl up with the Wall Street Journal or a good financial statement than any novel."

In 1952 she was named Trenton's Woman of the Year.

There is probably no more fabulous success story than Helena Rubinstein's: rags to riches; an unhappy youthful romance; banishment across half a world; success and acclaim; beautiful women; marriage with a prince; all the accouterments of wealth—homes, paintings, jewels, travel—and the zest to enjoy it to the fullest. It has every element of good fiction except credibility.

"As a novel it would be too much to be believed," says the short, dark woman whose business acumen and knowledge of feminine psychology have rolled up one of the nation's largest personal fortunes. "Sometimes when I think back I can hardly believe it myself."

Actually, it is only the end result that is fantastic. Her career's beginning and every step along the way have been logical and natural; at no point does luck play any extraordinary role in Madame Rubinstein's—or Princess Gourielli's—success.

She did not start actually with rags but in a middle-class family in Cracow, Poland, with a father who wanted her to be a doctor. She tried her best, but two things went wrong: she fainted at the sight of blood, and she fell in love with an unsuitable young man. Her father, thoroughly put out, sent her to visit relatives in Australia. "I was so unhappy there," she recalls. "Every night I went to bed with swollen eyes from crying." Suddenly things improved.

Australian women, their skins roughened by the dry winds, noticed Helena's clear complexion and the face cream she had brought from home. Helena generously let them try it. Then she sent for more and sold them the second jar. "Soon I had a little shop, and so many beaux I forgot the boy in Poland." She made enough money to go to London and set herself up in Lord Salisbury's house there. She married Edward Titus, a chemist, and came to the United States.

Fifteen years later her business had succeeded—her salons were running throughout Europe and America—and she had two young sons. But her marriage was not happy. In 1937 she and Titus divorced, and a year later she married Prince Artchil Gourielli-Tchkonia, a Georgian nobleman, who headed Rubinstein's House of Gourielli cosmetics for men (shaving lotion, and so on) until his death two years ago.

The business now has factories and salons all over the world, and markets hundreds of varieties of creams, lotions and cosmetics. And Madame Rubinstein—who says she still uses the same herbal cream she brought from Poland years ago—has a three-story penthouse apartment on New York's Park Avenue. In it she has collected some of the world's finest examples of modern art, African sculpture, jewels and antique furniture. She also has an apartment in Paris overlooking the Seine; a country house in France at Combe-la-ville; and another country house in Greenwich, Connecticut.

She sees a little—but only a little—of all of them; keeping in personal touch with her far-flung operations keeps her traveling six months out of every year. But "I like to work," she says; "in fact, it does not seem like work to me." In further fact, she cannot understand less dedicated folk, and so had difficulty finding people she feels she can depend on in business. Absence from work because of illness puzzles her. "I've been sick the last few days," she says wonderingly, "but I have stayed home."

She resembles an exotic hummingbird as she darts from room to room in her fashionable Fifth Avenue salon, her 4'10" figure garbed in vibrant hues, heavily jeweled, chin held imperiously upward, jet-black hair pulled severely into a bun, the total effect heightened by her own vivid coloring. Photographs invariably show her with a grim expression because she is incapable of smiling on command. The imperious attitude is also deceptive—"I know I frighten people," she acknowledges; "it is because I am short that I look haughty that way." She talks little; that, too, upsets nerves strangers.

Madame Rubinstein has netted an estimated $50,000,000 from her beauty business alone. Other investments have probably doubled that figure. She knows exactly what all her money is, and talks with her brokers several times each day. Several years ago in Rome she became ill with double pneumonia. Doctors put her under an oxygen tent and feared the worst. The next morning her secretary crept into the room to find Madame sitting under the oxygen tent indignantly reading the financial page of the New York Herald Tribune. "Why did you not tell me —— was falling?" she demanded. "Sell immediately!"

Her biggest coup came after she sold control of her company to an investment firm in 1928 for $7,500,000. She returned a year later to find company policy changed and income down. Meanwhile the market had crashed. She bought back control for $1,000,000 and never has relinquished it since. She says she can run her business better than anybody: "I make mistakes," she acknowledges, "but very few mistakes." Besides, she honestly enjoys every phase of her business—the competitive creation of new products, inventing advertising appeals and, by no means least, helping women to look their best. The possibility of actually creating, in a sense, beauty in a human being is an idea that fascinates her.

"Beauty, of course, is always worth while but in a human being —— Some people beauty helps. Some people it spoils. A beautiful woman can achieve a lot—or destroy a lot." She muses a moment. Then, "However"—she shrugs off responsibility—"what a woman does with her beauty is up to her, not to me."

one at a time, but many, simultaneously, and of many types. When the Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles, spoke of "massive reprisals" in case of a Soviet attack on any part of the free world (and Mr. Khrushchev has also threatened such reprisals), neither of them, certainly, was thinking of one H-bomb, or of a few shots from atomic artillery. A massive attack, if it means anything, means letting loose a whole arsenal.

And on the effects of this neither the atomic scientists, the military men nor the geneticists have differences of opinion. Millions would perish and the seed of survivors be contaminated in perpetuity. It would be a war against the race, or races, as such.

May we ponder a little further?

Thermonuclear weapons are the invention of white, Western men. The white (or Caucasian) race is only a fraction of the world's population, a small minority. If an atomic war occurs within the white world, which alone possesses the power to wage it, will it not hasten the demise of the white race as such? Biologically enfeebled, how will it, in a not very long run, manage to hold its own against the millions of Asians and Africans?

No country, no matter what its scientific achievements, is stronger than the physical and mental strength of its population. If that fails, its scientific achievements will dwindle from generation to generation, along with all its other strengths, including the capacity to survive.

Out of hundreds of thousands of quite ordinary but generally normal individuals, Nature has always produced occasional geniuses who have led their nations and the world forward into new and greater dimensions of understanding, revelation, wisdom and beauty. Will they be produced out of a population which is largely or in greatly increased proportion subnormal? They never have been. There are such populations, retarded by unfavorable aspects of physical nature, and they have not produced geniuses or much of anything else.

The human race, and especially the white Western races to whom the Russians (the Eastern Slavs) belong, is on the wrong track. These peoples must beware lest, like Lucifer having brought down fire from heaven, it consume them, slowly at first; utterly in the long run. EN

JOURNALITIES

John MacDonald

If you can bear almost unbearable suspense, start reading JOHN MACDONALD'S two-parter, The Executioners, on page 74 right now. (Oh, well, finish this column, then read it.) The common fate of good writers is that few readers care about them—they care about the people in their stories. But if you can, you might like to remember that John MacDonald is, in his own words, "happy, energetic, balding, bifocaled, forty-one, father of one, B.S. from Syracuse, M.B.A. from Harvard, lieutenant colonel in the Retired Reserve," and will, on January 23rd of 1958, celebrate his twelfth year of writing for a living. He has written thirty books and nearly five hundred short stories. Four of his novels are in various stages of preparation in Hollywood. Many of his stories have been made into television plays. One of his novels, The Damned, sold one million seven hundred thousand copies. He has made "somewhere close to four hundred thousand dollars and saved very little of it." Hopes to do better in the next five years.

Brunella Gasperini

In My Wife's Husband (page 62), BRUNELLA GASPERINI has performed an amazing feat. She has seen herself as her husband sees her—or, rather, she has seen herself as her husband might see her if he were Brunella Gasperini. Sounds complicated, but it's only hilarious. The facts: she is a graduate of the University of Milan, Italy, with a degree in literature; her husband's wife has two children—a boy of ten and a girl, six. The whole family loves to ski and does, including the six-year-old. In the summer they have a villa on Lake Lugano where they fish—or at least the wife's husband does. The wife hunts for the children, paints ceramics, decorates gourds and writes. Her first story was published in 1953; she plans to write hundreds more, but My Wife's Husband is the sort of story a wife can write only once in a lifetime and feel absolutely certain the plot will work out as neatly as it does.

Cynthia Wheatland

What can we say about our Decoration Editor, CYNTHIA MCADOO WHEATLAND? "Don't," she says, "say I 'have' a husband—I do have a husband, but it's like saying I 'have' two children and a Welsh Corgi. I do—or at least they 'have' me—but do I? Let's all just be, and hope for the best." We have never known Cynthia to be other than good to look at and in a good humor, and the rooms she plans have those same characteristics (see page 85). She was graduated from Barnard, where she majored in government and economics. At the time she wanted to go on to law school and get into politics—imagine that! Not that bright young women aren't needed in politics, but like her husband, her Corgi and her children, we are glad to have her—oops—we're glad she be with us.

Fan Letter

New Orleans, Louisiana

Dear Sirs: At last my JOURNAL subscription has expired and you may be sure I won't be renewing. Your magazine hasn't been worth the paper it's printed on for years. The stories are poor, the articles are boring, and worst of all, you editors are so smug. You know everything. In fact, I'll bet you eleven million dollars you won't even read this letter.

MRS. D.H.B.

▶ You forgot to enclose check. ED.

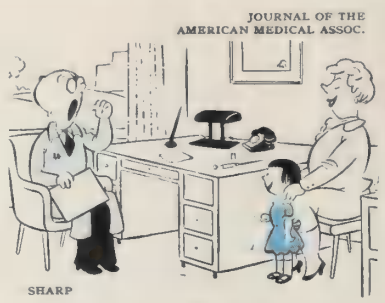
They Read an Article, and——

East Orange, New Jersey

Dear Editor: The letter by Ruth A. Crosson, R.N., on deplorable conditions in homes for the aged in New Jersey (February JOURNAL) has produced action.



Almost as a direct result of Nurse Crosson's statements, the League of Women Voters of East Orange, at its April meeting, adopted as its program for the coming year "the study of facilities available for the senior citizen in East Orange." It is the policy of the League of Women Voters to first study a situation and then take the findings to governing bodies and ask for new legislation where needed. The league's study will cover all phases of this subject.

In June, Hon. William M. McConnell, mayor of East Orange, appointed a Council on Senior Citizens to "find out the needs of the senior citizen in our community." This council will be comprised of representatives from the Welfare, Health, Library and Recreation departments of the city, United Community Fund, U.S. Social Security, Retired Business and Professional Men's Association and the League of Women Voters.

We hope this information will help prove to Nurse Crosson that she was not pleading in vain and that she won't have to continue "nagging and persuading" to get help for mothers, fathers and others, over 65—not in East Orange, New Jersey, anyway.

Sincerely yours,

MARGARET McLOUGHLIN
President,
League of Women Voters of East Orange

Need for Understanding

Somewhere in U.S.

Dear Editors: I suffered a nervous breakdown two years ago after the death of my two-month-old daughter. It took six weeks in a mental hospital and all our savings to cure me. But I have never felt better in my life, mentally or physically, than I do now.

However, after my hospitalization I had to re-enter my former life and that was harder than the cure of my depression. The doctors had told me that people would pay no more attention to a nervous breakdown than to a broken leg; but in my small town I was treated as a freak by intelligent people. I am now employed as a bookkeeper and also hope to substitute-teach in my "spare" time this fall—not because I am anxious to work outside my home but because I feel compelled to show I can do these things and not suffer a breakdown again.

Can you help to wipe out the stigma attached to mental illness?

IS THERE A RIGHT TO BAD TASTE?

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

Harper's Magazine's recent controversy between two architects (John J. Burchard and Albert Bush Brown) and a critic of modern architecture (Henry Hope Reed, Jr.) entertained me not a little. America has produced some modern architects of genius, and I find some contemporary building beautiful, delightful and practical. But I find some of it boringly stereotyped.

There have always been fashions in architecture as there are in clothes—fashion being something other than style. The buildings of the 1870's through the early 1900's have no "style" at all. Some pressure of fashion made them attractive at the time, but the time was quickly transient. On the other hand, Georgian public and domestic architecture ("Colonial") retains its comeliness to this day. It was a true "style" and remains so even though not "stylish."

The architects contributing to the debate, obviously modernists, are greatly annoyed at those members of the public who feel themselves free to have personal opinions about what is best and not best in architecture. They complain that in a democracy there is "a feeling that every man's taste should somehow have equal weight."

As a technician, the architect is indispensable. But a good architect also aspires to be an artist, and here we enter quite another realm. No academy of art and no college of architecture can create an artist.

From an aesthetic viewpoint, the essence of good architecture is proportion. There are rules about proportion (as there are rules about the composition of paintings) that, if followed, will produce generally satisfactory results. But it is not all a matter of measurements. Light is a factor. So are color and the furnishings of rooms. And many amateurs possess a natural or cultivated sense of proportion that trained architects (judging from their works) notoriously lack. Some of the most beautiful houses I have ever been in have been designed by their owners—amateurs in art and architecture.

Architects are not the only people who have spent much of their lives studying buildings and proportions. An interest in art is common to thousands of Americans who practice professions quite unrelated to it. Their quarrel with some modern architecture is aesthetic. And a great many people are sour on architects because the architect wants to build a house to please himself, without consideration of the family which is going to live in it.

In a democracy, if every man's taste does not have equal weight in planning his own home, the democracy will presently cease to be. Democracy implies that there are some areas of private life, and the place where Americans most seek and cherish it is in their homes. They want homes adapted to the way they live; reflecting their own tastes; and catering—if one wishes so to name them—to their particular prejudices. They don't want only a house, however interesting. They want a home—which is something else.

The modern architect not only wants to design your house; he also wants to design its interior—color, curtains, draperies and furnishings. He thinks of the whole thing as a unit. God help you, if you ever had a grandmother who left you a mahogany dresser or a set of Chippendale chairs! He'll have them in an auction room before you can stutter your protest. He tells you they don't fit into a modern house. But it will not occur to him to design a house that your lares and penates will adorn. He will say, "The modern architect cannot design well in the Georgian style." Does he mean he can't or does he mean he won't? If he can't, he's incompetent.

Suppose you like eighteenth-century English or French furniture, whether original or in reproduction? What's wrong with it? It was one of the finest styles ever developed, and one of the most comfortable. Suppose you're a collector of Early American? Haven't you got a right?

Every real home contains things that one cherishes purely out of association. In my home in the country I have a heavy, Italian walnut table, six feet long, which I've used as a writing table for thirty years, abroad and at home. The room is large enough to accommodate it (in a perfect light) but it doesn't suit the other furnishings at all. Yet I have a crazy idea that I can work better at it than anywhere else. Haven't I a right to my crazy idea? After all, it's my room. Who of us has not kept (and displayed) gifts from our children, presented at a time when their taste was, to say the least, underdeveloped?

What, for that matter, is "taste"? In furniture it embraces a lot of things—design, quality of material and craftsmanship—but, on the whole, it's largely a personal matter. It isn't a violation of the Constitution not to like posture chairs and furniture of wrought iron and plastic—or to like them.

Architects and interior decorators (who now prefer to call themselves interior architects) cannot successfully be rigid arbiters of so personal a matter as "taste"—or of other personal matters of living.

Color is a very personal matter. Nowadays we have rooms in "decorator colors"—whatever that may mean. There are a limited number of colors in the spectrum. How one reacts to them is strictly personal. But in homes or buildings they run in fashions. I can remember when "Burgundy" and "puce" were favorites for carpets. Now (I seem to observe) those who know what the well-dressed home will wear go in for pale shades of carpeting, even in the sootiest city, that can be washed on the floor. Fine, but by whom? By you? By me? If by somebody else, how often and for how much?

During the past few years there's been a rage for chartreuse, terra cotta, and pink walls that are just one paint drop from magenta. You see these colors on the walls of new high schools and colleges from Maine to California. Why these singular predilections? I have seen art classrooms with a southern all-glass wall, the rest of the room painted in "shocking" pink! Are students supposed to paint pictures in such an environment? Or is it just to make it harder? All artists want a neutral, uncolored north light, and neutral off-white grayish walls, because colors in the light and environment enter into and destroy the colors one is applying to canvas.

And are these violent hues, in general, conducive to student concentration? I seriously doubt it. No previous school designers have ever believed so, and have chosen neutral shades, and avoided vast expanses of glass to which youthful eyes stray.

Coral is a pretty shade, if you happen to like it. But some don't. Some greens make one feel bilious (chartreuse does me). Others are soothing, for some. There are yellows and yellows. Some like blue, and some (I am among them) find that blue walls of any shade give one the blues. Why argue? There are allergies of the soul as well as of the body. It's a personal matter.

How the stars stay slim

By CAROL MILLER

LOVELY Alexis Smith, lunching recently at a Hollywood restaurant, watched curiously as her companion devoured a rich, calorie-packed dessert.

"Envy her?" she was asked.

"Not at all," Alexis replied. "I keep in shape the easy way, the way Nature intended me to—by not overeating. Whenever I start to put on extra pounds, I take these," and she reached into her purse and held up a wrapped caramel candy. That's right, a piece of candy!

Now there's probably no place in the world as weight-conscious as Hollywood, or where as many different ways to lose weight have been tried. Turkish baths, Swedish massages, Epsom Salts, stretch machines, jiggle tables, pills, protein diets, salt free diets, bulk cellulose—these are but a few of the methods.

Of course, there's a very good reason for Hollywood's concern over calories. Apart from the absurdity of an ingénue with a double chin, the camera itself adds pounds to one's normal appearance. But even though screen stars watch their weight—studios and press agents soft-pedal the subject. They prefer the public to believe their stars have sylph-like figures without any effort. To set the record straight, Hollywood stars need help—just as the rest of us.

It's an old American custom—stopping to enjoy the scenery. The viewers here are Alexis Smith and her husband, Craig Stevens.

Well, what kind of help? Publicity releases to the contrary, dieting alone isn't the answer. Most of us know only too well what a mountain of will power it takes to stay on a diet. And it's that much tougher in Hollywood. Well then, what is the answer?

Just this: they eat candy. Not ordinary candy, but a special low-calorie, vitamin- and mineral-enriched candy called Ayds.

As June Havoc says, "Even for dancers and actresses like me, staying in trim is sometimes difficult—until you discover Ayds. It has done amazing things for my figure."

Another case in point is Juanita Hansen. Many readers will remember her as a top star for Mack Sennett during Hollywood's infancy. She was a slim, blonde beauty. She lost out in the movies and began gaining weight till she tipped the scales at 196.

She decided to do something about it. Today she is 127 pounds and looks like a new person. "I couldn't have done it without Ayds," she said.

The secret of this candy-reducing plan is that it's utterly different. It's not like old-fashioned methods, some of which were dangerous. Neither is it a fad diet or a "pill." Doctors call Ayds an "Appetite Depressant." Taken before meals as directed, Ayds curbs your appetite. You naturally eat less and lose weight.

What started the trend in Hollywood was a clinical investigation by six doctors at a medical center in Cambridge, Massachusetts, reported in one of the leading medical journals. It was a comprehensive study to determine the value of appetite depressants in achieving weight loss. The leading weight-reducing products were tested. And the doctors discovered that Ayds Reducing Candy gave by far the best over-all results. Other doctors recommended it to their patients, and the word soon spread throughout Hollywood.

In a world where appearance is so important, both husbands and wives have taken up this easy way to lose weight.

Mary Cummings, for example, wife of the popular star Bob Cummings and mother of four, admits, "Sure I lost weight with Ayds, without dieting or feeling hungry."

What seems to appeal to these people who can afford the costliest salon treatments is its ease and simplicity. They know from experience that exercise alone isn't effective. Skaters like Sonja Henie and Donna Atwood ("Ice Capades" star) rely on this miracle candy and, surely, they get enough exercise. But, says Sonja, "I keep myself in trim all the time with the help of Ayds."

When Steve Allen was in Hollywood making "The Benny Goodman Story," he was exposed to the local pre-occupation of fighting fat. When he returned to New York, he decided to try the Ayds Plan. His lovely wife, actress and TV panelist Jayne Meadows, went along with him. "We don't agree on everything," report Steve and Jayne. "But we do agree that two can reduce easier than one. We both take Ayds and losing weight together is fun."

Druggists report that Ayds sales lead in America's continuing "battle of the bulge." Grandmother must have been right when she warned you as a child that eating candy before mealtime would spoil your appetite.

Before you too start reducing with Ayds,® see your doctor and have him write for a reprint of the Medical Journal Report. The Campana Company, Box MD, Batavia, Ill.

the room. But when one burns out, who is going to replace it? And how? You'll need a six-foot stepladder if the ceiling is of average height—and where are you going to keep it? Who is going to unscrew the old lamp and replace a new one from an insecure step? Your husband? Suppose he has lumbago? You're going to call in the electrician to change lamps, and he will cost much more than they do.

And are you going to drag a vacuum cleaner up the ladder to clean the boxes, where dust settles? You may be the world's best housekeeper, but you will just let it invisibly accumulate to drift, eventually, around the room.

"Recessed" lights have been a passion of architects. In homes they are all right in places where they are seldom used. But to replace a simple bulb, one must mount a ladder, unscrew the frame and then screw it back, after lying on one's stomach, searching the floor for a screw one has invariably dropped. And if in a darkish hall, where they burn much of the time, perpetual removing of the box will soon damage the plaster, requiring replastering and repainting.

Decorators don't like marbelized, splattered or otherwise patterned kitchen linoleums or floor tiles. They should be of a single color: white, or black-and-white, is beautiful. Beautiful for anyone except the cook, or the cookless housewife! Maybe decorators just love to mop kitchen floors.

You have not lived a perfect day, even though you have earned your money, unless you have done something for someone who will never be able to repay you.
ANONYMOUS

I think I'm a good, even finicking housekeeper, and our kitchen floor is swept and wiped up with a wet or damp mop every day, and thoroughly washed and thinly waxed once a week. But it is not washed every time the laundryman walks in and out, or whenever a drop of something cooking spills on the floor. I had one of the prettiest kitchen floors you ever saw—from a decorator's viewpoint. But I cherished my cook more than the floor and relaid it in a marbelized pattern. (If I had been caring for the kitchen myself, I'd have done it earlier.)

The trouble with architects is that they want to remodel your life, your habits, your country, your nature and your domestics. It is important to remember that decoration, of itself, has nothing to do with creative art, and that great creative artists are notoriously indifferent to the "taste" of their surroundings.

Architecture is good in so far as it is honest and reasonable. A house must fit into its natural surroundings and use its natural (which are also usually its most economic) materials.

The "Cape Cod" or "salt-box" house was, and is, entirely rational. It originated in New England, a land of long and severe winters. It was built of wood, not only because wood was plentiful in a forested country, but because wood is the warmest of natural materials.

So people go on buying and remodeling old houses, not because remodeling is cheaper, but because, if one can still find a good carpenter and stonemason, the result is often pleasanter.

It just isn't true that most Americans love innovation and change. Most, I am quite sure, seek in their homes stability, tranquillity and tradition—of course with automatic heating, up-to-date kitchens and all the gadgets. Private life shows a formidable resistance to radical change. As long as an American's home is his castle, he'll go on insisting that he (or she) and preferably they are masters of one little place in the world. And until we are all thoroughly collectivized, brain-washed and psychologically conditioned we'll even insist on the right to bad taste. END

Busy homemaker enjoys the convenience of

"telephones where we need them"

A busy homemaker with a family on the go, Mrs. Dallas P. Raney of Little Rock, Arkansas, finds her new modern home makes her day easier. It includes practically every homemaking convenience—among them, telephones right where the family needs them most.

"They're part of the way we live," says Mrs. Raney. "We all depend on the phone a lot. I rely on it for all my grocery shopping, in church committee work and visiting with friends.

"That's why we have phones in the kitchen, family room, master bedroom and our daughter's room. Their colors complement each room's furnishings. Wiring is concealed in the walls, and portable phones serve little-used rooms and the outdoor patio."

You and your family can enjoy the convenience of telephones where you need them. Reach, don't run, for your phone. The cost is low. Ask your telephone business office for all the details.

Mrs. Raney especially enjoys having a telephone in the master bedroom, finds it especially convenient for chatting with friends.

She finds her kitchen telephone the "most useful." It's placed between sink and cooking areas for easy reaching.

Teen-age Sharon has her own separate telephone line and directory listing. This keeps the other line free for family use.

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

It is easy to tell who is the head of a family: it's the one to whom bad news is relayed.

An extravagance is anything purchased yesterday.

"Well, mother, I'll tell you exactly what he's like: on the second date you fall violently out of love with him."

"Those young parents," observed my neighbor, "have no routine with their children; only a ritual."

Above and beyond the call of duty: husband fixing something.

Compulsory education: getting dad to help with the homework.

By the time some parents get around to putting a foot down, the children are already following in their footsteps.

One man's opinion: "A woman will go to any length to concoct something new to spread on a cracker, then give a party to use it up."

An elderly lady confides her formula against loneliness: "Put on an old house dress, let the dishes set—and someone is sure to come by."

These days, before a woman can leave footprints in the sands of time, she has to "do her toes."

A beloved colored lady says, "I never lets myself carry more worries than I'd be miserable without, if I gets rid of them."

Perhaps the reason we never hear about a self-made woman is that she usually bestows the credit on some man.

A family wants a house to be cleaned the way it is in church: when those who make the work are not around.

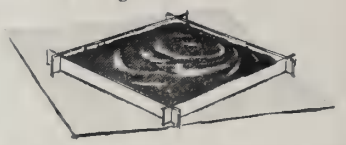
One thing our grandmothers might miss, were they to have a return visit to our modern world, would be lines of clothes drying in bright sunshine under blue skies.

After dispensing several of the boss' messages over the telephone, on her first day in a new job, a young girl concluded her title should be changed to deceptionist.

The perfect mother-in-law visits only upon invitation; brings her own bed linen, towel—even washcloth; and stays no longer than a banana stays delectable.

One thing that goes as far as it once did is dirt tracked in by a family.

Nearly every letter received by a mother from her young son vacationing in the West described his location as follows: "I can see six miles in every direction, including down."



Social strata of sweetening: molasses, sugar, saccharin.

In our neighborhood, a jet plane crashed the sound barrier and all the mothers ran outside to see what the kids were up to.

How two Midwestern communities have brought new hope to everyone who has ever suffered from a cavity

Two Towns Named Bloomington That Helped Lick Tooth Decay

By MARGUERITE HIGGINS
Noted Journalist and Pulitzer Prize Winner

TWO MIDWESTERN TOWNS – both, by coincidence, named Bloomington – have proved there is a new way to help prevent cavities in your teeth.

I know it works because I investigated – and got these facts.

For a long time scientists have known that cavities usually begin on soft spots – weak or vulnerable areas on tooth surfaces. Then, I found, an exciting discovery was made.

A toothpaste with stannous fluoride would strengthen those soft spots – thus preventing them from turning into cavities. The toothpaste is Crest with Fluoristan.

I found that in Bloomington, Indiana, over a thousand men, women and children volunteered to test this wonderful new way to prevent decay.

Half the volunteers brushed with "Toothpaste X"—actually Crest. The other half used "Toothpaste Z"—regular toothpaste.

After a year's time, dentists examined the teeth of all the volunteers. The results made history.

Grownups who brushed with Crest had 42% fewer new cavities than those who brushed with regular toothpaste.

Children who brushed with Crest had 49% fewer new cavities.

Full reports of these tests were published in official dental journals. The results aroused such interest that another test was made.

This one was in Bloomington, Minnesota, a thriving Minneapolis suburb. Almost all third-grade and fourth-grade school children in town took part. And again, the results made exciting news.

Again, children who brushed with Crest had far fewer new cavities than those who brushed with regular toothpaste.

Many children who used Crest had no new cavities at all during that year. This is the great event that Norman Rockwell has dramatized in his picture opposite.

These tests gave Crest a record of decay prevention never approached by any other toothpaste —for both grownups and children.

I think we owe our thanks to the towns that proved this new way to help lick tooth decay.

Questions you've asked us about CREST

How does Crest work?—Mrs. F. M. C., San Antonio, Texas

Crest with Fluoristan actually combines with and strengthens teeth themselves against decay. This is particularly true of the soft spots on teeth—the places where cavities usually start.

What is Fluoristan?—Mrs. J. P. R., Wheeling, West Virginia

Fluoristan* is a stannous fluoride formula especially developed for Crest. As you brush, Fluoristan strengthens teeth against decay. Fluoristan works for grownups and children.

Please tell me how many people, in all, tested Crest.—Mrs. C. J. C., Pasadena, Calif.

About 5,700 grownups and children took part in repeated tests of Crest over a 4-year period. This is the greatest "in-use" testing ever done on any toothpaste.

Does Crest stop mouth odor?—Mrs. F. L. C., Denver, Colorado

Yes. Crest freshens your mouth—sweetens your breath. Crest gives you the most effective protection against mouth odor available in any toothpaste.

A DENTAL HEALTH MESSAGE FROM PROCTER & GAMBLE, MAKERS OF CREST TOOTHPASTE

Norman Rockwell

"Look, Mom—no cavities!"

Crest Toothpaste stops soft spots from turning into cavities—means far less decay for grownups and children. And Crest freshens your mouth—sweetens your breath.

The child views God through parents' eyes

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M. D.

SPERRY LEA

What the church means to the parent will be felt by the child.

DR. SPOCK.

"The foundation for a love of God is the same as for love of parents. A baby is born to be affectionate."

I'd like to talk about the phases of emotional development in a child as they affect his attitude toward religion. Then I can mention a few of the problems in religious education that parents have asked me about.

From a psychological point of view I'd say that the foundation for a love of God is the same as for love of parents. A baby is born to be affectionate, as is shown by the fact that he smiles warmly by the time he's a month or two old, long before he can sit, walk, talk or even use his hands. If he is cared for by loving parents, his love for them and his trust in them increase each month. If there is no one to love a baby (as was true in certain cold, understaffed orphanages in the olden days), he grows up with a shallow, irresponsible personality and with little or no capacity to love anybody, including God.

It's particularly in the three-to-six-year-old period that a child comes to realize how much his parents mean to him. He's warmly affectionate toward them. He thinks they are the wisest, the handsomest and the most powerful people in the world. He asks them anything he wants to know and believes what they tell him. All day long he's trying to be more like them, in activities and in character.

If they tell him about God, he accepts their picture, literally. Parents in speaking of God to a child tend to emphasize the attributes which appeal most to them. The stern father will probably speak of a stern God. The gentle father will speak of a gentle God. The parents will show that they look up to God, the way the child looks up to his own father. As a result, the child comes to think of God as being somewhat like his father, only more idealized and on a grander scale. He will have feelings of love, of trust, of awe, of fear in somewhat the same proportions as he has these feelings for his father. If he has a father whom he cannot love at all, I doubt whether he will be able to love God. I remember being told once, by a priest who had studied such cases, that the boy who grows up thinking his father is a hypocrite in his religious practices is the most difficult of all to win to the church.

The child who hears little or nothing of God between three and six will of course form no concept of Him. But the attitudes he is developing toward his father will have a great influence on any religious attitudes he develops later.

After the age of six or seven it is the nature of a child to try to outgrow part of the excessive dependence and closeness he previously felt toward his parents. Though he continues to love them deeply underneath, he's apt to stop copying their diction and their mannerisms. He wants no longer to be considered their good little boy, but rather to be a rough, independent man of the world. He senses that he must get over the idea that his parents are all-wise, so he argues with them about everything and he quotes his teacher as a superior authority. He directs a lot of his emotional energy, that was formerly spent in adoring and copying his parents, into impersonal channels such as learning about the Three R's and science and manufacture. Since he feels the need to be more independent and critical of his father, he won't idealize him to the extent that he used to. Instead he turns to less close, less personal models. He finds that Superman and other heroes of the comic books are very satisfactory in regard to powerfulness, bravery, righteousness. And some of the reverence he previously felt for his father is now more comfortably accorded to God, if he has learned about Him.

But there is another aspect of the change in a child's nature after six which has a bearing on religion. He wants very much to be like the other children he knows—in clothes, in language, in haircut, in the TV programs he watches, in the school he goes to. Other things being equal, he'd like to go to the same Sunday school and church. But this need to turn away from his parent as a model and to pattern himself after his contemporaries is mainly concerned with superficial matters such as personal appearance and manners. Deep underneath he is still devoted to his parents and quite willing to share their beliefs. He is not at all ready yet—as he may be in adolescence—to question their religion or their ethics or their politics. If he finds there's a difference between the beliefs of his family and other families in these respects, he'll feel more security in lining up loyally with his parents. In a political campaign he wears the same button as his father. He accepts his parents' convictions about what is morally right and wrong, and he will stick to his parents' church if they indicate that they have feelings about it.

In the six-to-twelve-year-old period, it appeals to the child to belong to a church and to revere God, but in most cases the relationship is a relatively unemotional one—it doesn't involve very intense feelings or very personal feelings. In adolescence there is a real change. Now the young person's relationships—with parents, with friends, with members of the opposite sex—all acquire considerable intensity. The adolescent who is at all religious is apt to think about God as a real person Whom he knows and Who knows him. Almost every adolescent becomes at least somewhat introspective and concerned about himself: Am I normal? Am I acceptable? What are my ideals? What do I want to do with my life? He expects to find some guidance from his church and his God. In this sense his religion acquires real personal meaning for him, for the first time.

Now let's turn to religious education. It doesn't usually present problems to the mother and father who both belong to the same church and who have a comfortable belief in their church's teaching. When their child in his early years asks questions about God, they find it easy to convey their sense of Him—in a way that is understandable—much as if they were talking about a mortal to whom they are devoted. When he is ready for Sunday school, he usually goes without question, just as he goes to day school without question. The only advice that I would want to give to such parents would be to emphasize the positive teachings of religion, to emphasize the loving aspects of God, and to minimize the punitive aspects, particularly up to the age of six or eight.

A minor problem in religious education occasionally arises in the age period between six and nine years in the case of parents who do not attend church themselves and do not give their child any specific religious training, though they have very definite ethical and spiritual convictions. Let's say, for example, that they are disinclined to believe in the kind of God and heaven that are spoken of in the Bible or from the pulpit, but that they are more content themselves with the belief that God is the goodness in men's hearts and that heaven is the happiness which a man gives to others and for which he is remembered after he dies. However, they find that their young child picks up the remarks about religion of neighborhood children and brings them home to his parents for clarification. "Do we believe in God and heaven?" "Do people who don't go to church go to hell?" A conscientious parent of this sort is on a spot. He wants to be honest, he would like to explain his philosophy, yet he realizes that it is too vague for a seven-year-old. Of course he has to translate his beliefs into terms his child can comprehend, just as he has to simplify the facts of life or Santa Claus or the atom bomb. If I were he, I would answer, "Yes, we believe in God and we believe in heaven." I think this is a close enough approximation for a seven-year-old.

UP TO SNUFF

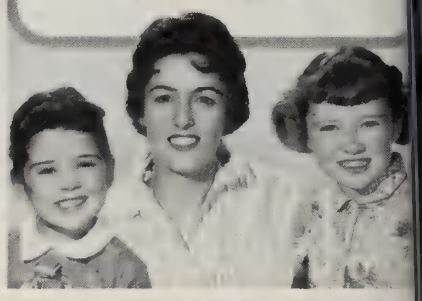
Tobacco was among the major curiosities found by early explorers in the New World. Smoking was introduced to Europe as a medicinal practice, became popular within a few generations. Snuffing of powdered tobacco into the nose caught on more slowly.

Yet the use of snuff eventually became all but universal. Dandies and great ladies liked their snuff ground on the spot, so went about equipped with silver and ivory graters. Lesser folk had to be content to buy ready-ground mixtures. Some mixers of snuff added spices and perfumes to their wares—while unscrupulous dealers didn't hesitate to adulterate it.

So it came to be proverbial that it took a sharp fellow, not easily deceived, to tell the quality of snuff from a single whiff. Many a self-styled expert was described as "up to snuff"—or wise to its ways. Transferring to other areas of activity the odd title came to name any state of skill, confidence or fine fettle in general.

WEBB B. GARRISON

S S S S S S S



He isn't interested in the subtleties. He very much wants a definite answer. He really wants to know, "Do we have beliefs, as other people have beliefs? Are we on the same side as the others, or are we different?" It seems wise to me, as a first step anyway, to emphasize the similarities. Otherwise the parents are, in a sense, insisting that the child think of himself as different from his friends just because of the parents' special philosophy. There will be plenty of time for him later to decide whether he wants to come to a regular or an unorthodox religion. If the child asks next, "Do we believe in hell?" the parent might well answer, "No, we don't," because severe punitiveness is not part of his philosophy and perhaps because he senses there is anxiety in the child's question. Then if the child asks, "Why don't we go to church?" the parent could answer, "Some people have a religion that makes them want to go to church and other people have a religion that doesn't make them want to go to church." If the child asks to go to Sunday school, I myself think the parent would be wise to encourage him to do so on the assumption that it would be beneficial educationally and spiritually. It would help him to some degree in the long run to find his own beliefs.

Next I want to mention the occasional problem in which the two parents have sharp differences in their religious views. More commonly it is the mother who is a strong believer in her own church; and the father is a nominal member of another church, or he is a nonbeliever, and he objects to the child's being indoctrinated in a religion of which he does not approve. Of course most couples who come from different religious backgrounds find, usually before they marry, a compromise that is agreeable to both, because their love for each other makes them want to. One can suspect, when the arguments continue, that it may not be religion which is coming between them, but that for neurotic reasons they have to quarrel and they find religion a very handy weapon.

I think that one parent who is at odds with the other is mistaken if he thinks that he alone can permanently direct a child toward one church or away from another by insisting on attendance or forbidding it. There is no doubt that a child brought up in a united family that adheres to an orthodox religion, in a neighborhood that adheres to that religion, will be strongly influenced for life. But it's very different if the parents are setting an example of unorthodoxy or if the parents are divided in their views, for then the child feels no deep obligation to follow any one creed and will probably decide for himself in adolescence or adulthood, on the basis of his fundamental attitudes toward life and on his special relationship to each of his parents.

I would guess that the children, or at least the grandchildren, of people who didn't attend church find their way to church eventually, in much the same proportion as other people do, provided they are reasonably well adjusted. For, though it is impossible to prove the existence of God, at least to a skeptic, it is easy to show that human beings are naturally religious. A majority of those who have grown up with love and respect for their parents have always wanted to express similar feelings of dependence and devotion and obligation toward a Deity.

I would advise parents who have sharp religious differences to make every effort to leave the child out of their arguments, and to come to a compromise which leaves the least tension between themselves. Otherwise the child will only be made miserable. I'd tell a father who was trying to keep his child from adopting a certain religion that he was courting defeat. And if a mother explained that she wanted her child to experience the beauty and the consolation of her religion, but that her husband objects violently to her taking her child to that church, I'd suggest that the inspiration which the mother receives from her church will be felt clearly by the child and will have a potent indirect effect on him in childhood even if he himself does not attend. This will draw him toward that church later when he can make his own decisions.

There are two reactions to religion in adolescence that sometimes worry parents. An occasional child is so churned up by the bringing up baby®

Hints collected by Mrs. Dan Gerber, mother of five...

When to lend a helping hand

Did you ever stop to think that when baby gets an out-of-sorts spell it may be that he's trying to accomplish something—like trying to turn over—to sit up—or to reach something that's out of reach? If you can't determine just what it is that baby wants, an extra helping of friendliness and affection often works wonders in getting baby over the rough spot.

"Strengthening influence" for baby

"Proteins," say the experts, "are the great strength-givers, the important 'growing tools' of the body." Gerber Strained Meats, of course, are rich in complete proteins as well as iron and B-vitamins. Made from succulent, selected Armour cuts, they're specially processed to remove most of the fat and coarse tissue. As for texture, Gerber Strained Meats are pureed to a smooth-on-the-tongue consistency that babies like.

ARMOUR

How to increase mealtime zeal

Forcing never made a baby a bigger or better eater, but these "tried and true" tricks help create a desire to eat.

Lots of fresh air and sweet sleep.

Reasonable exercise and play.

Reasonable regularity about mealtimes.

A goodly variety of good-tasting food.

A pleasant, un-hurried atmosphere.

New idea in baby food

Something special in the way of flavor—something extra in the way of nourishment. Gerber's new High Meat Dinners have 3 times as much meat, and therefore much more protein than regular vegetable and meat combinations. This extra meat is combined with selected vegetables and cereal for brighter flavor and a varied assortment of nutrients. And with all this nourishment in one main dish, they're economical to serve. 3 varieties in both Strained and Junior versions. Beef, Veal or Chicken—all with vegetables.

changes in his body and feelings that he almost loses the sense of who he is and where he is going. This is a frightening feeling and it may lead him—in his search for security—to an unusually intense, an almost frantic devotion to religion. I wouldn't worry about a levelheaded child who turned more to the church at this age in a serene mood. I would try to get expert guidance for the one who had become anxiously obsessed with religion.

The other adolescent reaction that bothers parents is quite different. It may show itself in objections to the parents' particular church or in resistance to going to any church at all. Of course the adolescent is trying hard to free himself from the remainder of his childhood dependence on parents and to prove that he can chart his own course through life. But rather than admit his doubts about his ability to accomplish these aims, he prefers to picture his parents as blocking his path. He finds all kinds of faults in them: they are still treating him like a baby or they have lost touch with the finer things of life or their religious beliefs are pathetically conventional. In one evening he believes he could formulate a religion that was more inspired and at the same time more in accord with the truth. Another reaction is to feel that religion is just one of those things, like schooling and family rules, that parents impose on their children. I remember in my own college days thinking that a majority of my friends (who came from normally religious families) had turned against religion for good. I was quite surprised a few years later to find that they were all having their babies baptized and that later still some of them were becoming pillars of their churches.

As soon as the adolescent feels convinced deep inside that he is an independent adult—it may come when he joins the service or when he takes a job or when he marries and has a child—then he can stop complaining about his parents and begin, happily, to behave very much like them, in churchgoing as in everything else.

THE LITTLE DARK ONE

By ELIZABETH HENLEY

Steve is Davy Crockett—
His cap of cobweb coonskin—
And Johnny is a Ranger
On a nonexistent roan—

So round and round the garden
Where Captain Hook and Tinker
And Hopalong and Robber Joe
And all their sort are known.

But Catharine—but Catharine
Walks softly through the roses,
Her baby doll in crook of arm—
She rides no role nor horse.

"And who are you, with roses crowned?"
She answers with her grave eyes round:
"I'm Catharine—just Catharine, I'm Catharine, of course."

So round and round the garden
They travel in the shadows
Of things that seem and things that are (Like people who are grown)
But Catharine, just Catharine
Already knows the mystery
And magic and enough-to-be Of Catharine alone!

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

JILL

Holly has such a look of virtue that we stop to laugh.

The fire burns brightly on the ancient hearth, the leaves on the sugar maples are brighter than the sunset, wisps of sweet hay stick out of every barn door. Goldenrod and a few late asters have survived the frosts, but the reaped fields are cinnamon and amber. Days are golden, nights are dark velvet pricked with stars.

There are other signs, too, that autumn walks the countryside. Comes the morning when the house is so chilly that even two sweaters are not enough. One year, in a brave showing of independence, I said we would not give in and start the furnace until we had to. We held off until Thanksgiving, but we never tried it again. Lugging wood for two fireplaces, and the old range, and my Franklin stove, proved to me that we are much weaker than our forebears. We got tired out!

It gave me a fine feeling of being able to battle the elements, and it also gave me a bad sinus attack and a head cold. For we have no heat upstairs without the furnace, and taking a bath meant leaping hastily into scalding water, then jumping out and shivering.

At some earlier day, the upstairs fireplaces in Stillmeadow were knocked out. Probably at the time the picket fence was used for firewood. There was a stove in Cicely's bedroom, for those tenants stored their ashes in her closet, and as the hot ashes piled up on the floor nature took her course, and the house nearly burned down.

But long before that, the people in our house did have a corner fireplace in one bedroom upstairs, and I often think of the children putting their copper-toed boots in front of the good heat as they popped into the feather beds and reached for the warming pan.

I was in the yard this morning, picking up fallen branches from the last storm. Holly and the cockers were helping. Holly got a fine branch, much too big to get through the door, but she worked at it. Finally she got it in and put it, properly, on my bed.

In autumn, the sense of the past is strong within me. As the leaves fall, time becomes suddenly very real. Not just what shall I do tomorrow, but what has been in the yesterdays, and what will be?

I remember going to Provincetown to see the Mayflower come in. It was a bitter foggy rainy day, with the dunes hidden in a bank of silvery gray. The wind was biting. Provincetown itself looked like a lost land, for the swirling fog hid the accouterments of civilization.

We went into a restaurant at the shore's edge, and waited, along with a crowd of other people. The waitresses flew about, giving the wrong orders to everyone. The guests were chiefly honeymoon couples, most of them looking, on that grim day, as if they feared they had made a mistake. But one couple ordered one bowl of clam chowder for Her, and He just dipped his spoon in and ate with her.

"He will be president of the company one day," predicted Jill.

A few couples on what we used to call "the shady side of middle age" when we were in school sat eating lobster and not paying too much attention.

Suddenly someone cried, "There she comes!"

The whole assemblage rushed to the windows. We had binoculars, and passed them around. Half an hour later a pretty little waitress said, "Who owns these?"

"I do," I said mildly, and got a look myself. But I always have to shut one eye when using binoculars, so it didn't do much good.

There she came, indeed, a tall ship, with an odd squarish front. The sea was rough, the fog heavy. We made out the flags flying, and we saw the whippet shapes of the cutters escorting her.

And suddenly I was back all those years, seeing the narrow shore from the deck of that tall ship. What hopes and dreams were riding with her then, and what a bleak, lonely harbor to anchor in! And yet from this came our country. As we drove back through spitting rain, I was glad we saw her coming in. I didn't care about the costumes, the speeches, the fanfare to come in Plymouth. All I wanted was to see the ship coming with difficulty around the end of the land, and see her finally come to anchor.

Then I thought, as the sand beat on the windshield, no, the best was the way everybody in the restaurant gathered together and talked and shared ideas and were uplifted with excitement. From the harried olive-colored Portuguese waitress to the pale elegant woman in a fabulously simple little gray knit, from the little hostess in her full hand-printed skirt to the honeymooners, peeling and doubtful, everyone knew a moment of unity. We shared the arrival of a ship that really was a symbol.

Two days before, we were sitting on the grass visiting with Art and Audrey Baines. And talking dogs. Art was rolling around with Holly, while Audrey moved the newest grandchild from her playpen. "Holly is a sweetheart," said Art. I sighed. We had been commuting to Art's for Holly to go to a show, meeting him late at night on a parkway somewhere—meeting him at one-thirty at Black Rock Turnpike—and Holly had nine points on her championship. But I didn't give a fig for a championship. It seemed to be an obligation to her breeding. I wondered, coming back from seeing the Mayflower rocking dizzily in Bewitching dishes:

New kind of breakfast and timely new recipes enriched with Quaker Oats

Quaker Oats and Mother's Oats are exactly the same

HALLOWEEN OATMEAL "LOLLIPOPS"

High-protein Quaker Oats adds nourishment and nut-like flavor to cookies.

- 1 cup sifted flour
- ½ cup granulated sugar
- 1 tsp. baking powder
- ¼ tsp. salt
- ½ cup brown sugar
- ½ cup shortening, soft
- 1 egg, beaten
- 1 tsp. vanilla
- 1 tsp. water
- 1 cup Quaker or Mother's Oats (quick or old-fashioned, uncooked)

Sift together first 4 ingredients into bowl. Add brown sugar, shortening, egg, vanilla, water. Beat until smooth, about 2 minutes. Stir in oats. Shape into balls; place on ungreased cookie sheets. Flatten; insert wooden skewers. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) 12 to 15 minutes. Cool slightly; remove from sheets. Decorate with confectioners' sugar frosting, coconut. Makes 4 dozen.

MINIATURE HAMBURGER APPETIZERS

Quaker Oats makes hamburgers juicier, tastier because it holds the good beef juices in the meat.

- 1 lb. ground beef
- ½ cup Quaker or Mother's Oats (quick or old fashioned, uncooked)
- 3 Tbsp. chopped onion
- 1½ tsp. salt
- ¼ tsp. pepper
- ⅔ cup tomato juice

Combine all ingredients thoroughly. For each tiny hamburger, shape scant tablespoon of the meat mixture into a ball; flatten slightly. Pan-fry or broil to desired doneness. Fasten on toasted bread squares with toothpicks. Dip in your favorite barbecue sauce. Makes about 50 tiny, juicy hamburgers.

APRICOT-BLENDED OATMEAL

Here's a brand new kind of oatmeal! And a new taste delight! It's an intriguing new way for youngsters (and grownups) to get the high-protein benefits of good hot oatmeal. The tangy flavor of fruit—blended into the oatmeal during the cooking—deliciously flavors every spoonful of creamy oatmeal. Try it!

Follow oatmeal recipe on package for 4 to 6 servings. During cooking, stir in 1 cup cooked, sweetened apricots. Cover and let stand as directed. Garnish each serving with additional apricot halves if desired. Serve with milk or cream.

the rough sea, if obligation doesn't move more than mountains.

Maybe some of those people did not want to go across the unknown oceans either. Their courage is more than I could envision. But they sailed, they took the heavy, awkward ship across the sea, and they managed.

Now and then there are moments that are like a sapphire in the hand. The Mayflower gave me enough to think about for a year, but having dinner with Shirley Booth made me pinch myself to be sure it was real.

"How is Little Sister?" she asked at once anxiously. "And how is Hollyberry?"

It turned out we both love Siamese cats too. As well as cockers. I felt as if she had lived next door all my life. Theater people always seem to be in a world apart, but not Shirley Booth. She is the kind of woman who would call up and say her roses looked a little weak and what could be the matter? And her dogs did not like the new dog food, should she change back?

I suspect the reason she is a great actress is that she lives completely, and it probably has nothing to do with the fact that when she sets foot on the stage the air suddenly becomes incandescent.

At dinner, I noticed that her voice is just the same, a little flat and very honest and with a sudden rise when she is moved. Very much like the voice that called, "Come back, Little Sheba."

Helen Beals, our hostess, said we might never get fed, for she was not going to miss any of the conversation, which was like birds flying by then. But dinner was excellent and Helen's black cocker, Peter, was a very happy boy in a roomful of dog lovers.

I asked Shirley how she worked on "Come back, Little Sheba," the line which was an echo of all women calling all lost dogs. "Very simple," she said. "I saw a shabby little woman walking a shabby little dog one night on the street in New York. And I thought of her, and it just came out that way!"

When we asked her how it felt to win her Oscar, she said the main thing was she had a very full, elegant gown, and told the designer she could never walk in it. "Do not worry, madame," said the designer, "it will just float around you."

"It didn't float," said Shirley dryly. "I put my foot through it right away and fell on my knees on the steps."

Now in October, everyone in our valley is busy. It is what I call a last month. Last time to clear the garden, time to prune, time to fill the woodshed, time to winterize, as they say, the car. Time to wash everything washable while it can dry on the line without freezing solid. For I know of nothing more discouraging than trying to part a frozen sheet from a frozen line. It is about like managing a section of wallboard. In the end it invariably falls on my face, crackling.

Erma wants to freshen up all the curtains. They blow on the line in the wine-sweet sun. And the dust of summer vanishes.

Holly loves activity. She helps with everything. She is always ready to nip up the clothespins, tear off with a towel, or swing on the dragging end of a blanket. Then after a hard day of helping, she stretches out comfortably in her chair in the family room and has such a look of virtue that we stop everything to laugh.

The soup kettle comes out. We like simmered soup, long over the open fire. Veal, beef, chicken bones are good. Plenty of seasoning, including five or six cloves. Then when the stock is rich and robust, we toss in any number of things from onions to celery leaves (never underestimate the value of celery leaves), carrots, beans, rice, peas, whatever we have. A bit of leftover tomato paste is helpful, as is some gravy from yesterday's roast. This thickens it a bit, which is all to the good. And then, if we are gilding the lily, I pop in dumplings with parsley flakes or grated cheese and lots of paprika. We always make a big pot because the cockers and Irish like it as well as we do. Jonquil especially loves carrots and onions.

Twilight comes sudden and soon now. The moon climbs above the old apple trees in silver beauty. The dogs take a last sniff around while I just look at the moon, and think of how many times the moon has risen over those old apple trees.

The moonlight is cool now, and the air smells of windfalls that have been frosted. The trees are giving up their red and gold leaves, so some of the branches are charcoal in the pale light.

All over my valley, I reflect, children are again battling with homework. The world has been an uneasy one for so long. But the children are still struggling with two times eight is —— and what is the capital of Argentina?

And I wonder, as I walk back to the lighted house, what have I learned of value, in the schools I went to and the bigger school of life?

Possibly not much, except that love is more important than hate, that lovingkindness makes for happiness. For hate is a kind of sickness that is worse for the one who establishes it than for the object, whether it be a neighbor, a race, a religion or a country. "Let us love one another," I say to Holly, as she races past.

"No problem for me," her tail says, "I love the world!"

The hills are strong and dark against the moonlit sky. Smoke feathers from the chimney. Jill is reading Agatha Christie and the logs in the great fireplace have fallen apart.

As I come in with a bevy of dogs, I hear the old house breathing. It is a quiet sound of settling ancient beams and sills.

"My, what a fine day," says Holly.

"How about just one more carrot?" asks Jonquil.

And one more day is over. END

PEDIATRICIAN RECOMMENDS "FENCING IN" TODDLERS

An Evanston, Illinois, pediatrician has recommended that preschool children be separated from "adult gadgets and trouble" for at least half of their playtime.

Dr. E. Robbins Kimball said this will help the child in his adjustment and adaptability by allowing him to escape the adult "no" for part of his time and by slowing down the expansion of his world to the point where he can handle it.

A child does not really understand what belongs to him and what belongs to his parents until he is four years old. Until then he should be relieved of the responsibility of not touching the possessions of adults for half of his playing hours (four hours a day), Doctor Kimball said in the Journal of the American Medical Association.

Because parents cannot live in a nursery, Doctor Kimball suggested that the child be separated from the adult world by means of a playpen, gated room or porch, fenced yard or nursery school, depending on his age.

Such "compartmentation" gives nervous mothers relief and decreases the number of household accidents. In addition, it prevents the child from developing habitual patterns of resistance to adults as they try to direct him.

Teen-agers with Time on their Hands find Boys' Club the Answer

GUY GILLETTE

Parents always know where to find these teen-agers. Members of Park-Holm Boys' Club, they spend many an hour in the workshop under the leadership of Tom Hastings, fourth from left.

Girls Learn Skills Too

By MARGARET HICKEY

Anyone who has ever visited a boys' club will tell you it is an invigorating experience. Boys who once played in the streets swarm, laughing and shouting, into their new-found funland, team off for boxing, baseball, basketball or hammering in wood and metal shops. Among them are boys who never had an adult friend, but who now find in their leader someone they can look up to and be pals with. Many are growing up with ideals and outlook they might otherwise never have had.

The same conditions—crowded neighborhoods, overworked mothers, lack of recreation—that show the need for boys' clubs also point up the need for girls' clubs. For these are youngsters who do not belong to other youth organizations, either because they cannot afford even small fees or because such groups do not exist in their communities.

By contrast there are only 65 girls' clubs with a membership of 41,379, but 400 boys' clubs with 375,000 members. Girls' club workers often find it hard to dramatize for the community the homely, yet wonderful, skills their girls are acquiring every day.

A typical example is the Winter Haven club, the only Girls Clubs of America member in Florida. Many of the members are children of migratory crop workers who toil all day in hot fields and come home too tired for anything but rest. Nine years ago these girls had no place to go, often gathered on street corners late at night. Miss Matilda Heinrich, director of the local welfare department, worried about this—until one day in 1948 she rounded up 20 girls for a club meeting in a school cafeteria. Over the years Miss Heinrich, as unpaid club director, has hounded the community to come to the club's aid. Today, five afternoons a week, some 200 girls aged six to sixteen jam their own clubhouse to make friends and picnic together, and also, under the direction of able volunteers, to learn to cook, knit, sew, garden, groom themselves and even to dance.

Clubs in other communities have grown up with the backing of civic groups, among them Soroptimists, Junior League, Kiwanis, as well as sororities and business groups. Some meet in old houses, some in streamlined concrete buildings, at least one in a converted garage. But all have a single aim—to help girls; and a common need—for more volunteers, more citizens' committees, more money. Counsel, advice, program help and training opportunities, however, are available to all through Girls Clubs national headquarters in Springfield, Massachusetts. END

Mrs. Hetland was stacking away supper dishes when it happened—a crash, then a shower of splintered glass from the kitchen window. Outside, there were sounds of scuffling feet. A moment passed. Mrs. Hetland, a little shaken, stepped cautiously to the door and peered into the darkness. But all was quiet now on the walk that separated the one-story frame buildings of the housing project.

"It's those boys again," she muttered, "always making trouble."

William Donovan, director of the Park-Holm project in Newport, Rhode Island, listened with concern as Mrs. Hetland told him what had happened. It was a story he had heard many times before.

Park-Holm, a low-income neighborhood of neat green, white and blue units surrounded by trees and clotheslines, is on the fringe of town and served by a bus that runs only infrequently. There was nothing for lively teenagers to do, that January of 1954, except stir up trouble. Evenings, older boys at Park-Holm gathered on the open back porch of the meeting hall. Usually they just stood around and talked after supper, but sometimes they forced the door open, crowded inside for a smoke. And there always were complaints from tenants—about rowdiness, milk bottles thrown at roofs and windows, fruits and vegetables strewn around the grounds.

In the hope of keeping the boys out of mischief, Mr. Donovan decided to let them in the hall. But after an hour, a janitor found the boys chucking water-filled paper bags at one another. That was the last time they used the hall—with permission.

William Donovan was surprised, a few weeks later, when a dozen teen-agers—among them boys tenants had complained about—filed into his office. A short, freckle-faced blond boy was spokesman.

"I guess you know, Mr. Donovan," he began hesitantly, "that there isn't much for us guys to do around here, and, well, we're tired of the same old routine of coming home from school, eating supper, then just standing around the back porch. Sometimes it gets pretty cold. Could we—that is, would you let us use the hall if we organized a club?"

William Donovan called on one of his own tenants, a tall, husky former marine, for advice. Thomas Hastings, barely thirty, then with three youngsters of his own, had a degree in social work and was a juvenile consultant with the Newport City Welfare Department. Furthermore, Tom Hastings knew something about boys' clubs—he had first joined one in Worcester, Massachusetts, when he was in second grade. Would he be willing to help?

Tom Hastings, remembering the five youngsters charged with vandalism he had encountered in an "out-of-court" case, felt a boys' club which combined recreation with guidance was sorely needed. Many parents he talked to agreed. "I try to do my best, but I have to work," a widow told him. Her son was one who had been throwing stones. Robert Barrows, though his son was too young for a club, knew what it would mean to others. "I've kicked a ball out there with some of the kids. You know, it's big news when a man plays with them. They need someone to show off to, get tips from." All parents wanted their boys to get out of the cramped apartments and have a good time. But they also wanted to know where they were and who their friends were.

That was the beginning of the Park-Holm Boys' Club. The twelve boys rounded up a half-dozen others for the first meeting in March, 1954, held in one small room of the community hall. Nobody knew exactly what to do at first, so Tom Hastings, as volunteer leader, explained parliamentary procedure and how it works. Election of officers then got under way.

"I saw this in a newspaper," a bright-eyed boy called out, holding a program of a boys' club in Providence active in community-fund drives and cleanup campaigns. The Park-Holm boys determined they, too, would have a service committee, to work for juvenile decency—as well as athletic and social committees.

Organizing the athletic activities was easy. Everyone wanted to play. But first they needed a place to practice. Park-Holm had a baseball diamond and a basketball court, but both were in need of repair. The service and athletic committees decided to recruit members to do the necessary work—level the ground on both areas, resurface them with clay and loam the Housing Authority promised to provide. The basketball court would get new backstops; the diamond, its base paths straightened.

How many forkfuls of no vitamins do you eat in a day? Some of the most delicious things on your table supply little more vitamins than an ice cube.

It makes a problem, because you want to eat and drink what you like. Can vitamin supplements set you free to eat and drink what you like without endangering your health? That depends.

There are things vitamins can do and things they cannot do.

You can easily get the facts: just ask your pharmacist for Squibb's free leaflet "Hidden Hunger." Make a note: Vitamins... Drugstore... "Hidden Hunger."

And if you are sick, see your doctor. Let him use his skill and judgment to decide what you need.

in the hall with steel wool; when that was done, they applied a coat of gym finish to make them good and smooth for future dances.

Next the boys painted their clubroom lounge blue with chartreuse trim. Chairs and lamps begged and borrowed from families and neighbors added a "homey" touch.

It was just a matter of time before the Housing Authority gave the boys another small room. By November, 1955, club members were building and redecorating again. This time they had a library in mind. With lumber purchased from their club treasury they constructed five-shelf-high bookcases, a dictionary stand, and a low case for children's books—for the membership was soon to include youngsters aged six to twelve. When residents of Park-Holm learned—through a mimeographed community newspaper club members left on doorsteps—what the boys were up to, donations of books started pouring in. Mrs. Raymond J. Lynch, a young mother and former librarian, volunteered her services and immediately put the boys to work cataloguing the books.

Now the boys have the entire hall for club activities. Drop by any evening except Tuesday. If you're early—a few minutes before six—you can see Tom Hastings and Joe MacDonald through the lighted window. They're getting out equipment and setting up games. Outside, on the steps, ten-year-old Mike Edwards waits patiently to get in. He's the youngest of four boys and often left out of things at home. But at boys' club there are "thousands of games," he tells you. he can play with fellows his own age. As soon as the door opens he runs to the table where Joe has started a list of players. "I'm in the checkers tournament," Mike shouts. Joe writes down his name, then reminds him to hang up his coat in the closet. By now four more youngsters have come in and a fierce game of table tennis gets under way. The hall is soon filled with younger boys and they jump into their places around the checker and chess boards and begin playing with intense concentration.

Twenty-year-old Joe MacDonald, one of the charter members of Park-Holm club, just about makes it by six on Monday evenings from his job at a supermarket. ("Dinner can wait—I look at food all day.") Joe is one of four assistant leaders who take charge under Tom Hastings' direction one evening a week. The assistants earn $1.00 an hour, paid out of a fund collected by mothers of club members.

Joe tells you proudly that tenants hardly ever complain about teen-agers in Park-Holm nowadays. And he is backed up by Inspector Paul Sullivan, who can remember when two or three police calls a week to Park-Holm were routine. The boys make their own rules of discipline, but with Tom Hastings quietly guiding and directing.

President "Bing" Coen has learned to "throw the ball to the guy that's clowning around" during meetings with the comment, "Let's hear your suggestion." The immediate reaction is a red face and a desperate attempt to contribute something to the discussion. Richard H. Fullerton, a member of the club's advisory committee, hopes his own seven- and nine-year-old sons will follow President Bing's example and develop leadership, learn to make decisions and organize. He, like a number of other parents, has found the club a means of strengthening points he makes at home.

Tom Hastings is always on the lookout for the little danger signals that indicate a boy needs special attention. There is the overactive youngster who can't work out his feelings at home; the shy, withdrawn child who needs reassurance and encouragement to take part in things; the boy without the guidance of a father who constantly teases older boys to get attention ("Ya oughta be in a cage" is one of the current name-calling favorites that Tom tries to discourage). Often all it takes is a special job to make these boys feel needed and important. One very quiet lad soon had a lot to say at meetings after he was appointed circulation manager of the community newspaper; another, a tease, no longer had time for mischiefmaking once he accepted chairmanship of Park-Holm cleanup day.

Tom Hastings frequently calls on parents of boys who consistently get into arguments at the club or disrupt the games. He will start off by bringing out one of the boy's good qualities, such as "Rob has a good sense of humor; everybody likes his jokes." Almost always the mother will open up with what has been troubling her: "Yes, but he's not doing well in school. He seems so restless." Tom then sees to it that the boy takes some job, such as supervising tournaments, to help him feel more settled.

The club, now with its new wood-and-metal-crafts workshop, boxing nights, fishing and stamp clubs and athletic teams, hasn't solved all juvenile problems in the Park-Holm area. But, through leadership and guidance, many boys have been helped who otherwise would have been left to shift for themselves. There was the boy who spent $25 he had helped collect for the club in a fund drive. Tom Hastings, convinced that stealing is a symptom of some problem or disturbance, treated it that way. He talked with the boy, got him to agree to work afternoons to pay back the money—and no one was the wiser.

Sometimes the older boys help. One youngster, whom we will call Jim, had been hanging around with a group of roughnecks, finally was brought into Juvenile Court for damaging a neighbor's property. After Jim was released in his mother's custody, Joe MacDonald, well liked for his easygoing manner, persuaded him to come around to the club. Jim's mother, a widow, now goes to work calm in the knowledge her son has made friends with the right kind of boys and is taking part in supervised activities in the evening.

The influence of the Park-Holm Boys' Club has not been limited to its 317 members, but now is reaching out to every boy in Newport County. The first seeds of expansion were sown when in January, 1956, Park-Holm Club wrote to the Boys' Clubs of America in New York City for help in bringing after-school recreation to other parts of the city where no youth groups existed. As it does in any interested city or town, the national group sent its regional representative to make a study of the youth situation. If a need existed, advice and assistance would be available free of charge to help win community support for a boys' club. Mr. Edgar W. Rylander, the New England regional representative, did find such a need. Of Newport's schoolboy population of 3977, he counted 2566 with no place to play after school except street corners and back alleys. Those who did belong to Boy Scouts, Y.M.C.A. or a community center, he learned, were not the youngsters who most needed recreation and guidance to keep them out of trouble.

Armed with this report, Tom Hastings called a meeting of representatives of local service clubs, churches and city government to tell them about Park-Holm Boys' Club and the need for more such clubs. Tom Hastings' talk about how a "gang" with proper leadership can be a positive influence in a boy's life got results. Out of this meeting came a steering committee to study the possibilities of a county-wide boys' club. Within a few weeks a new permanent "Boys' Clubs of Newport County" was formed, affiliated with the national organization. Thirty-one leading citizens were elected to a board of governors and $6000 was pledged anonymously to underwrite the first year's salary of an executive secretary. Tom Hastings, with his proved ability to absorb noise and fights, was the unanimous choice for the post. In addition, the Rhode Island Foundation, which manages gifts and endowments for community betterment, earmarked $4000 to provide a unit director for Park-Holm Club. Community fund-raising drives will help provide the operating budget.

Today Newport County has five boys' clubs and will soon have a centrally located headquarters where all clubs may come for tournaments and games. "I never see Bobby any more," one Park-Holm mother sighs, "but the important thing is I always know where to find him." END

"That's the last time I introduce anybody to anybody!"

Is the "teen-ager" a new figure pirouetting down our mid-century? Is she just the "bobby-soxer" with a pony tail? Or yesterday's "adolescent"? Is she perhaps more of an individual than her elders are inclined to think she is? Three novels about teen-agers—all good books in their way—make one speculate.

GIDGET, by Frederick Kohner (Putnam), is the story of a summer on a California beach, of a girl getting on to 16, and a gang of boys who are experts at the dangerous sport of surf riding. Gidget herself cuts the waves with a clean swift stroke; she's under four feet tall, and wears a pink bathing suit. Told in rock 'n' roll vernacular, this little novel is saved from complete cheapness by a pert and vigorous personality, and some terrifically big breakers.

DRIVES MY GREEN AGE, by Josephine Carson (Harper), is the opposite approach—quiet and delicate. Chris is only 12, a somewhat gawky little girl in a small Kansas town. But she is "aware"—of the feel of life, of the differences in people, of nature. She thinks about love, but observes without comprehension some of its manifestations. Whereas Gidget might suggest a fresher Françoise Sagan, Chris will remind one of Member of the Wedding.

THE SCORPION FIELD, by J. L. Musser (Appleton-Century-Crofts), is bitter. From the jaded angle of an adult it tells the tawdry little affair of two adolescents: a girl of 15 and a boy of 17 were found in an abandoned automobile making love. We never get close to the boy and girl, but we see with devastating clarity the ensuing tragedy that could have been averted but for the perfidy of a neurotic mother and the closed eyes of a weakling father.

"Children should look up to their parents," said cynic Bernard Shaw, "not as an example, but as a warning."

A pointer for the parents and teachers of teen-agers (and for anyone else with her future ahead of her) is the National Vocational Guidance Association, which gets out excellent pamphlets of information and advice on colleges and careers. Write for full information to National Vocational Guidance Association, 1534 "O" St., N.W., Washington 5, D.C.

No one who loves the Maine coast, the small firs and rocks and the salty tang, should miss THE WORLD OF CARRICK'S COVE (Norton), a nostalgic novel by Gerald Warner Brace, in which he looks back on the old days of simple island living, probably of his own youth.

But the finest American novel I have read in many a year is BY LOVE POSSESSED, by James Gould Cozzens (Harcourt, Brace). This is set in a small Eastern city, a county seat, with its judges and the local law firms, its citizens of integrity, its weaklings—a close-knit town where the generations intermingle and keep old memories alive. It is the kind of town in which the white Nordic old-family Protestant (preferably Episcopalian) is still in the saddle; where the one large family of Negroes is hard-working, respected and socially at ease, where the Jewish lawyer from New York is an outsider and the Catholic district attorney is ever so slightly suspect; where in fact the attitude of Protestants in power toward the Catholic Church is still nineteenth century. If you take the lid off the inner life of any town—especially an old town—you are sure to find scandal and romance and tragedy, and so it is here, breathing and sighing and shuddering under the come-and-go of everyday life. Beneath the surface of the most worthy lie such deep-covered layers of deceit and wrongdoing; below the calm exterior, such sickening fright. Slowly, as in real life, these many people of the town, held in bondage by as many kinds of love, become known to us in their rounded personalities. Their stories are logically and dramatically intertwined. Yet for all this diversity, the novel has a satisfying unity that lies in the sane philosophy of its creator. It takes place in a single weekend, and it never moves outside the city. Once caught up in it, our attention never strays. We stay to the end.

By Love Possessed will be compared, by many, to the best of Henry James—for its intensity, its infinite care and patience in delineation of character, and for the delicate balance in matters of conscience. But the canvas is wider than any ever conceived by James, and the world portrayed is, after all, our world today.

A really funny book is WARM BODIES, by Donald Morris (Simon and Schuster)—a Navy yarn with a happy ending and a riotous wedding. A "Warm Body" is a man with at least one arm and two fingers who can pick up something when he is told to. "Warm Bodies can carry boxes, sort small objects, turn on lights, chip paint and sweep."

Unfortunately only too useful, YOUR FAMILY WITHOUT YOU, by N. R. Caine (Crown), is about the sound practical importance of making wills. . . . "After all, you can't take it with you," said the exasperated salesman who was trying without success to sell a grand piano to a wealthy old lady. "I can take it with me easier than a grand piano," she answered.

COLLIER'S

"Your book has done more for my husband than all his doctors put together... and their sleeping pills."

Now we've gone the circle and are back to babies. A nice lighthearted gift book for the expectant parents—among the dozens of silly ones they're likely to get—is THE DAY I WAS BORN, in which they fill out for their child what was happening in the world on the day that he was born, with space for family photos, newspaper clippings, weather, fashions, best movies, song hits (Greenberg, 201 E. 57th St., N.Y.C.).

"Wherever we traveled, I gathered recipes."

Eighth in a series of her round-the-world favorites.

If you like a cup of hot chocolate occasionally as much as I, try the following recipe:

HOT CHOCOLATE MOCHA

Heat 3 cups milk with 5 small milk-chocolate bars over boiling water until the chocolate is melted and well blended. Whip ½ cup heavy cream, adding gradually 1 teaspoon powdered sugar and 2 teaspoons instant coffee. Place 1 tablespoon heavy cream in each cup. Pour in chocolate milk and top with coffee-flavored whipped cream. Makes 5 to 6 servings.

Extra special!

HONOLULU SHRIMP

1st step: Shell and devein 3 pounds raw shrimp. Cook in water enough to cover, adding parsley, a slice of onion, 3 whole mace (or ¼ teaspoon ground), 1 clove garlic, 3 stalks celery, ½ bay leaf, 6 whole peppercorns, 1 slice lemon, 1 tablespoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Simmer until tender—about 15 minutes.

2nd step: Mix the following dry ingredients: ¼ teaspoon curry powder (no more), ¼ teaspoon cayenne, ¾ teaspoon salt and 1½ tablespoons cornstarch. Blend with 2 tablespoons cold water (or ½ cup sherry, if you prefer). Bring 1 quart heavy cream to a boil. Add the cornstarch mixture, cook and stir until thickened. Add the cooked and drained shrimp.

3rd step: Serve the shrimp sauce over 6 cups hot cooked rice. Have the following ingredients in separate bowls: 4 slices cooked ham (cut into small cubes), 10 ounces peanuts, chopped fine, ½ coconut (grated), and 6 hard-cooked eggs (chopped fine). Put a little of each over rice-shrimp combination. Serves 12.

Potatoes done this way are wonderful with a roast-pork dinner.

GREEN POTATOES FROM SWEDEN

Boil 6 large potatoes (about 3 pounds). When tender, peel and put through ricer or mash. Add ¾ cup light cream, 1 teaspoon sugar, ¼ pound butter, 2 teaspoons salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Beat until light and fluffy. Now add 2 tablespoons chopped chives, 2½ tablespoons chopped dill leaves (or 1½ teaspoons dried dill) and 1 package frozen chopped spinach which has been cooked according to directions on the package and seasoned to taste. Beat again until mixture is blended. Taste for seasoning and add more salt and pepper if needed. Place in a 1½-quart greased casserole. Bake in hot oven, 400° F., for about 20 minutes or until thoroughly heated through.

Simple, but good.

ORANGE COMPOTE

Peel 4 seedless oranges and slice ⅓" thick across the sections. Arrange slices in deep dish. Cook ¼ cup sugar, 1 cup orange juice and rind of 1 orange, grated, until sugar has dissolved and liquid comes to boil. Cool and pour over orange slices and serve with sugar cookies. This is the perfect way to end a heavy meal.

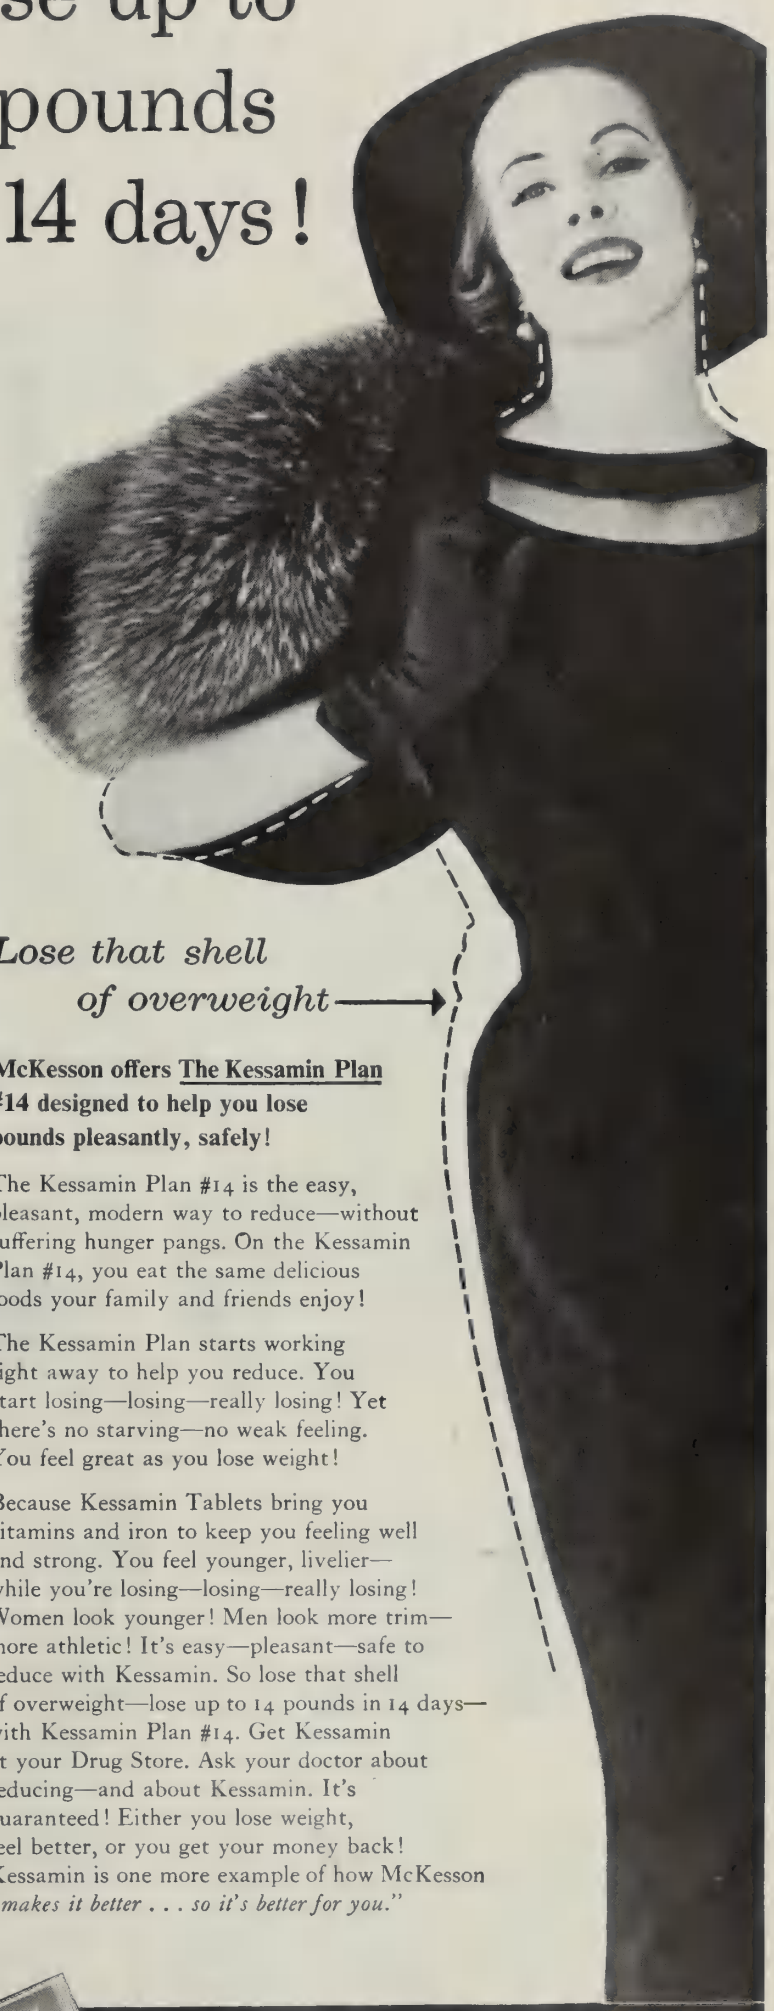
Although this onion-rye bread would be approved by women as well as by men, still this recipe is primarily for the men. For a stag dinner or for the night when the Master Mind invites a few friends over to watch the fights on television, try this:

A MAN'S WORLD

(Onion-Rye Bread)



Scald 1 cup milk. Put in mixing bowl 2 tablespoons sugar, 2 teaspoons salt and 2 tablespoons shortening. Add scalded milk. Cool to lukewarm. Dissolve 1 package yeast, compressed or dry, in ½ cup lukewarm water. Stir until softened. Add to lukewarm mixture. Add 3 cups sifted all-purpose flour. Mix until smooth. Sprinkle 5 teaspoons caraway seeds on dough. Add 3 tablespoons chopped onion and enough rye flour (1½ cups unsifted) to make a firm dough.

Knead until elastic to the touch on rye-floured board. Place in a greased bowl. Brush top of dough with salad oil. Put in warm place to rise double in size. Knead again on a lightly rye-floured board until free from air bubbles. Shape into a loaf and place in a well-greased loaf pan. Brush top of dough with salad oil. Cover and let rise until double in size. Bake in 350° F. oven 45 to 50 minutes. When taken from oven, brush with butter or margarine and let cool on wire rack.

have received about my article (Wanted—Women to Help) in the June JOURNAL. One letter that impressed me was from Michigan:

> "Do you know that I have called places like churches, etc., and offered to do this sort of thing and not once have I been called. I wanted to just go in and give someone a helping hand, possibly wash, clean up, cook a hot meal—all the things you mentioned—and people were surprised, didn't know anyone who would need this sort of help. I was not asking for any pay. Some years ago when I was seriously ill, had two children, and not one soul to help me, I'd have given anything if someone could have run the vacuum, done dishes and changed the beds. I know there must be many people who need this sort of help, but I feel so helpless not knowing who to call."

At the other extreme is an excellent letter from the president of the Homemakers Service of Middlesex County, New Jersey, which describes a highly organized service set up with the encouragement of the state Division of Chronic Illnesses and also with the approval of the state and county medical societies—all under voluntary auspices so far. This service sends out women who help with housework at $1.25 an hour. They do not do any nursing. Possibly in a good many other localities it has been possible to establish this sort of service. (In my own county, some organizations attempted to set up a service, but could not secure women to undertake the work.)

A letter from New Hampshire suggests that the state put out a program of home study courses so that mothers who have the time and qualifications could earn a degree for elementary teaching or for practical nursing at little or no expense. Several letters from older women say they have been stimulated to seek training now in these fields.

On the problem as a whole I have received very little light. But it strikes me that the churches are not doing all they might to solve this home help part of the problem. Sincerely yours, the breast and adjacent underarm tissue), everything in me cried out against it. I wasn't married, hadn't even a steady beau, and I couldn't believe that any man could want a wife with only one breast.

My particular type of cancer was a fast-growing variety which, unchecked, would have been fatal within six months. But it had been detected early—there was hope for me if only I would take it.

It is no exaggeration that I was on the verge of suicide. I feared cancer, death, the operation itself, but most of all life as an amputee. Even if the miracle happened and I did find love and marriage, could I ever have a child? Old wives' tales of mutations took root and helped spread the fear that could have cost my life. In sheer desperation I finally consented to surgery—if I must die, let it be quickly.

That was five years ago. I have been married for four of them. Throughout this time I've had the prescribed medical checkups, and there has been no metastasis (transfer of disease from one part of the body to another). Today I am numbered among the "cured." My husband and I have just returned from an extensive European tour and are now happily planning a family.

The hardest lesson for me was how to cope with fear. For months after the mastectomy I lived in a new kind of terror. I had lost a part of myself for which there could be no compensation—an integral part of femininity. I hid away in my room, feeling like a criminal every time I put on my new foam-rubber breast. It seemed a sort of deception I was perpetrating on the general public because it allowed me to pretend to be a whole woman. I would have preferred losing an arm or leg—something that could be discussed publicly without flinching—anything unconnected with sex. I cringed at magazines featuring bosomy cover girls, plunging necklines and bathing beauties. (But now I am tanned and relaxed after basking in the sun of a Mediterranean beach, where no one could have suspected a surgical "falsie" beneath my smart, halter-top swim suit.)

I became a recluse, refused invitations from my friends, refused to see my own mother! I emerged only after dark to buy groceries. I believed that everyone felt sorry for me, and I hated it. I never stopped to think that I was feeling sorry for myself.

Then, late in my convalescence, a married couple in another state asked me to visit them. I leaped at this opportunity to "get away from it all," and it was the best thing that could have happened. My friends didn't let me mope about the house; they took me to every social function their community had to offer. I found myself dating again, and my self-inflicted seclusion was over. Later, back at work, I met the man I was to marry.

Love had come into my life, but even this promise of happiness was quickly overshadowed. It was too late. How could I tell him about the mastectomy? Wouldn't his love disintegrate into horror? If I shuddered at the sight of my own body, how could I inflict myself on the man I loved? I tortured myself with questions—and how wrong I was!

"Darling," he said when I did tell him, "we all have scars of one sort or another. Yours happen to be physical. That operation saved your life. If you hadn't had it—well, I don't like to think I might never have met you."

In spite of his reassurances, I was still terrified about my wedding night. But scars do heal with time, love and understanding—the mental as well as the physical ones. When our wedding took place that winter, it was the happiest day of my life.

I did need more reassurances, in those early days of our marriage, both from my husband and my doctor, but as time went on I was able to see how foolish and unfounded my panicky outbursts were. When a young movie star died after a long bout with cancer, I wept uncontrollably, but my husband's gentle patience helped a great deal. I was on the road to a healthier outlook.

Cancer's symptoms are now well known to all of us. Should you discover any of these symptoms, don't let fear prevent an early diagnosis. If you fight that fear, you may learn, as I did, that you can live, love and be happy as a "whole woman" after a cancer operation.

Sincerely,

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"Not yet! Not yet!
I'll call you when it's ready!"

In our town's newer suburbs all the little ranch houses, split-levels and cottages gleam in bright tints and pastels, with garage doors ingeniously decorated; and as I flew over the lake the other day I noticed even docks painted coral and turquoise.

Recently I've lunched twice and dined once with Miss Universe, and even had my picture taken with her, without kindling my Royal Consort's jealousy. I'd sum it up in one sentence: She thinks Miss Universe has better fish to fry.

"Us girls," says Betty Comfort, deliberately ungrammatical while pruning her grapevines, "spend hours comparing notes on our mothers' foibles, especially the ones in their eighties. Grandmas are a breeze by comparison."

Our lunch-table Beau Brummell in the cafeteria basement swears that the whole world is overheated. "This winter," he vows, "I'm going to wear only summer suits, with maybe an old raccoon coat for the dash from warm car to warm entrance."

Among our town's semi-intellectuals a rumor has spread that Somerset Maugham has pruned his choice ten "greatest novels" to half their length. "Now," says our local Mme. de Staël, "is the time to read War and Peace, and Crime and Punishment, clear through."

In blushing modesty, I have hung only three copies of the photo snapped with Ike (and the editor of L. H. J.) in strategic spots where people might see it. After all, I nominated Ike for President in 1948, four years early.

I found a scorecard on the golf links with only one hole recorded—the first, a 7 and a 10. They'd decided not to keep score after all and threw the scorecard away; smart dubs.

In our twenty-nine-times-remodeled homestead, we have thirty-some small motors powering thirty-some appliances, none of which I fully understand. I advocate a high-school course to prepare young husbands for the unreasonable repair demands of their frantic young wives.

Our neighborhood's stateliest Victorian house got rid of its ancient accumulations with an auction sale in the front yard; a shameless attic exposé. Oddly, some of the more avid buyers were young newlyweds in our block, eager to get quaint.

As my spy among our region's eager beauties, my Dream Girl discovered that the Miss Universe aspirants dab petroleum jelly on their teeth, to make 'em glisten. Boo, it shines so it almost frightens you!

I ran into Bob Feller the other day, and though I had seen him only two or three times in fifteen years, he greeted me easily: "Hello, Harlan!" He still looks fit to pitch and he's the man I buy my next insurance policy from.

My researchers report that a family's milk and gasoline bills go down sharply when the kids are away at school or off for the summer. (They add that the average youngster consumes one quart of milk for each gallon of gasoline, their liquid diet.)

"One mark of the well-bred girl," muses Peter Comfort, turning his "Welcome" mat upside down for the weekend, "is that when she goes for a stroll on the links at the country club at night she takes off her high-heeled shoes to walk across the greens."

My Princess of Sheer Delight is a mixture of modern and old-fashioned: her latest passion in furniture is a combination rocking and swivel chair of metal, wicker and plastic, with all the best traits of the 1890's and the 1960's.

We try to behave nonchalantly about it: our town's most fashionable banker has bought a Rolls-Royce, and often his wife drives with her chauffeur to the neighborhood drugstore for a fizzy drink. Everybody tries to act casual, as if she were in a jalopy.

A hashery at the lake we go to for weekends (my wife's family built their cottage in 1878) gives you all you can eat for $1. Best customers: musicians from the famous orchestras who come to play each week for the dances; three meats and seven vegetables at a meal.

Our neighbors, the youngest gramps in town, have put off replacing their twenty-five-year-old davenport another year. Instead they've bought their married daughter some carpet and a back-yard fence, so their new grandchild can have it soft and safe.

I watched the judges at a nearby beauty contest wrangle and fume till they chose a complacent corn-fed beauty instead of her rival, an elegant, delicate creature. I conclude some people like cabbage, some broccoli, some Brussels sprouts.

Our local highbrow, palpably an intellectual and aesthete, bawled me out for speaking well of small-town Jean Seberg in Otto Preminger's breezy version of Shaw's St. Joan. Well, Shaw wrote his endless monologues in a talkier era; we're edgier now, impatient, won't listen after 10:30. Few people miss the lost verbiage.

From my barber I have the last word on haircuts: a man should never look as if he needs a haircut, nor as if he's just had one; he must appear always in the middle.

This year at home-coming I'll try a new technique on my Dream Girl's ardent old beaux at the state university: I'll pretend to recognize 'em as her old professors, call 'em "sir," and offer 'em my chair.

I envy gardeners who specialize proudly in iris or gladiolus or roses or begonias; how I yearn to brag also about a specialty, something exotic, yet sturdy and easy to grow. Like orchids, maybe?

Our young lieutenant now has his bride and infant Harlan III with him in Japan. When he returns from a fifteen-hour flight along the coast of Asia she allows him, as a reward, to give baby his bottle.

Some of our town's supermarkets stay open until 10 P.M., and I suspect that shopping for the groceries has now overhauled night baseball and gossip as the great American pastime.

. . . When my daughter sends me a floor plan of her new house, with front and rear snapshots and an arrow aimed at the guest room,

. . . Or my son-in-law writes me a four-page single-spaced letter explaining the viewpoint of the young exec,

. . . And my son gives me a frank analysis of his Air Force finances, and boasts how much he'll be able to save—next year,

. . . Or my daughter-in-law makes me a bush jacket of Japanese shantung,

. . . And my Lady Love warns me not to run up the stairs,

. . . Then for an instant I seem to have played all my cards right; I've got it golden!

Gossamer soft and petal pink—the dream of a negligee cascading in a froth of French lace and silk chiffon. Specially designed for Scott, it matches to perfection the luxury of Soft-Weve—Scott's superb "facial quality" 2-ply bath tissue. Five exquisite Soft-Weve colors for your bath or powder room.

How necessary are "equal privileges" to a wife's happiness?

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

"Betty is sociable and outgoing, interested in a wide range of activities. She enjoys entertaining friends, likes sports, takes part in welfare work. Nora finds such things pallid fare, but enjoys all-night parties, and off-beat amusement places.

"Betty avoids unnecessary risks, like driving a car at high speed or walking alone at night along a dark street. Nora rather enjoys the thrill of danger, but worries lest her reckless behavior cost her the good opinion of her friends.

"Betty is calm, cheerful, rarely fights to get her own way. She is not easily irritated, doesn't get upset when callers arrive unexpectedly or other minor annoyances crop up. Nora is moody, high-strung, often depressed, likely to 'blow her top' when she has to stop for a red light or stand in a crowded bus.

"Betty has a firm set of standards and values, but is otherwise flexible in her thinking, willing and able to change her mind. Nora's personal philosophy is not clearly defined, yet she is opinionated and somewhat intolerant.

"Betty's parents were happily married, and she enjoyed a close, confidential relationship with them both. Nora grew up in an atmosphere of quarreling and conflict; she does not love her father.

"In her own marriage, Betty expects (and prefers) her husband to 'wear the pants'; she wants at least two children, and plans to work hard for happiness. When Nora marries, she expects her husband to put her wishes ahead of his own, to grant her privileges equal to his, and to provide a liberal personal allowance."

It is not surprising that Betty has found happiness as a wife and mother, Nora has not. But if you are more like Nora than Betty, it does not follow that your marriage is doomed to failure. Instead, study Nora's traits as we have described them for clues to your own defects as a marriage prospect. Then set about improving your qualifications. Whether you are a single girl or already a wife, your efforts now can greatly increase your chances of future happiness.

WHO CAN BE HAPPILY MARRIED?

Can a person's chances of married happiness be reliably predicted while he or she is still single? Can the traits and characteristics favorable to a happy marriage be identified and described? To find out, we at Penn State have been carrying on an extensive research program for more than fifteen years.

In general, we can answer both questions affirmatively. Certainly our tests are not infallible, nor do we expect them to be. But they are highly indicative, and of established value in counseling practice.

In developing our data, we interview college students, both men and women, first before marriage, and then again some time afterward. In the first interview we investigate personality and character traits, family background and relationships, and other pertinent factors. The follow-up tests (many individuals are reinterviewed several times) are designed to evaluate the quality of the marriage adjustment—that is, the degree of happiness the couple has found in marriage. Favorable scores on the premarriage interviews have proved to be significantly associated with a good marriage adjustment.

Then, by studying the individual factors which combine to produce a favorable score or prediction, we can pinpoint the personal qualities which most often foretell a happy marriage. Married happiness must still be achieved (it cannot be conferred, like a college degree), but the person's capacity to do so is indicated by the presence or the absence of these factors.

From our thousands of records of premarriage interviews, we have selected two. From our follow-up interviews, we know that one is now a contented wife; the other is on the point of seeking divorce. Here are summaries of our original findings. See if you can identify the success and the near-failure.

HOW NOT TO SOLVE PROBLEMS

In any month I can expect to hear two clients say something like this: "I planned to come long ago, but I kept putting it off, hoping things would take care of themselves." This is a discouraging beginning, for problems in human relations, like physical ailments, are most readily treated before they become chronic.

To be sure, minor or infrequent complaints are often best ignored. Only a hypochondriac seeks professional attention for every fleeting symptom, only a neurotic thinks every petty difference between husband and wife must be discussed, analyzed and resolved. Talking about a problem too much, too seriously and too soon may actually precipitate trouble instead of averting it. But recurring severe discomfort, emotional or physical, deserves prompt attention. Very often, in the heat of a quarrel, a wife will inwardly resolve to take action. But when calm is restored, she decides (or hopes) that "things will take care of themselves." This sequence may be justified once or twice, but continued refusal to face the issue can be disastrous.

Consider this example: A young wife wrote for an appointment, saying, "I'm faced by a critical decision and feel counsel would be helpful. I think my mind is made up, but would like your reaction to my plans."

Three days before the scheduled appointment came another letter: "It won't be necessary to see you after all, as I've thought the problem through and decided to go ahead."

In ten days she telephoned: "I've started to carry out my plans, but find myself worrying about the outcome. I need general counseling as well as marriage counsel. When can you see me?" A date was set, but canceled a week later by telegram.

Next came another telephone call: "I must have help. Things have changed—for the worse. Will you see me tomorrow?"

She had still told me nothing about herself or the nature of her problem, and it seemed unlikely that she would ever follow through. Still, her distress was so obviously acute that I arranged an emergency weekend conference. ("Tomorrow" was impossible.) She did not appear. A special-delivery letter next day expressed apologies, but made no explanation except that matters were going smoothly once more.

In two weeks, another letter, another plea for an appointment. Replying, I urged her to consult either of two able counselors in her own city whom I had recommended earlier. She replied by wiring for an appointment.

Once more the pattern was repeated—a date set, a last-minute cancellation, profuse apologies, and the old refrain:

"I've made my decision."

After four months, a final letter arrived: "I thought I was in love with another man. I believed him when he told me he was getting a divorce, and left my husband. Now I have nobody, and I'm at the end of my rope." The envelope was postmarked two thousand miles from her original address, with no return address.

No one can say what would have happened if this wife had followed through on her original plan to seek help. The outcome might have been the same, it might have been different. But this much is certain: she sensed a threat, otherwise she would not have sought counsel. By failing to act when she saw the need, she denied herself even the chance to avert disaster.

If you are troubled by some continuing difficulty in your marriage, admit it, think it through and make a decision. You may decide on positive action, or simply to accept the situation as it is and make the best of it. But make up your mind, then stick to your decision, until and unless you have definite reasons for charting a new course.

When you find yourself thinking again and again, "I'm going to do something about that," it's time either to do it or to forget it, whether the problem is a leaky faucet, a child's unruly behavior or some deeper conflict with your husband. But wavering between "I'm going to" and "I'll let it go" can lead only to confusion, discomfort and perhaps heartbreak.

ASK YOURSELF:

Do I Know What Love Is?

Love is a feeling, both subtle and profound. Because it is so personal and so variable, it is difficult to define. Yet it can be expressed in many tangible ways. Perhaps your answers to these tangible questions can help you appreciate the intangible nature of love.

Do You:

1. Often tell your husband you love him?
2. Plan menus around his taste?
3. Have some endearing name for him?
4. Eagerly prepare for his daily homecoming?
5. Glow inside when he praises you?
6. Like to make him smile?
7. Want him always to look his best?

If you answered "Yes" to eleven or more of these questions, it is not necessary to define love to feel sure that you love your husband, and that he knows it. With fewer "yes" answers, you may still love him, but he probably doesn't feel certain. Finding more ways to show your love might add new meaning to marriage for him.

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know,
editors you like,
and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

A run on the banks caused a Wall Street panic in October, 1907, and the Knickerbocker Trust closed its doors. Women could no longer dress unassisted since their clothing began to be hooked and buttoned in the back. Rufus Rastus Johnson Brown was written; Socialist leader Eugene Debs was making his fiery speeches, and Marconi talked on wireless from Nova Scotia to Ireland.

Remarks Editor Bok in the October, 1907,* JOURNAL: "Because a boy has the 'gift of gab' does not necessarily mean he should be a lawyer; if he has neither will nor brains, does this point to the pulpit? Because he is sharp and greedy, a career in the stock market?"

"Twenty-five millions of records for talking machines were sold last year," continues Editor Bok. "Many of them trashy melodies of vulgar slang and coarse innuendo, morally dangerous and musically misleading."

The First Rule for a Husband and Wife, according to William Jennings Bryan, is to live within their means.

Economies: "Old hot-water bottles should not be thrown away. They make excellent traveling bags for toothbrushes or round mats to put under house plants."

"On one day a month let the whole family improve the house by staining furniture, or making sofa pillows, bureau scarves, picture frames or shirtwaist boxes covered with cretonne."

Household hint: "Number your flatirons on the stove with chalk 1–2–3–4 and use them in rotation when ironing."

Writes Laura A. Smith in What I Found Out as a Business Girl, "Cling to your womanly ideals, keep your heart young and envy no one. Show the men you work for that you feel they will treat you fair, protect you and look out for your interests."

"Although I am quite stout my figure is very hollow around the armholes," confesses a reader who is advised by Mrs. Ralston to wear padding under the arms.

"A good pair of shoes at $3 will often outwear two pairs of cheap ones."

ABBOT MILLS

Vickie Harris: a slice of toast for every taste.

Considering that in this country we consume 300,000,000 slices of toast a day—38 per cent white, 37 per cent whole-wheat, 14 per cent rye, then raisin, graham, cinnamon, protein, in that order—it wasn't surprising to come on Vickie Harris in front of the Homemaking Department's formidable control panel, testing various types of breads for toasting speeds, and setting up a fine fragrance. "Say a wife likes whole-wheat, which is medium slow," said Vicki; "the husband wants white, which is fast; the children wish raisin, the fastest toast of all." A three-slot pop-up was Vicki's recommendation for that family. Raisin takes one pop-up; white takes two; whole-wheat takes three. Children get three pieces to mother's one; husband gets two; but mother knows best: she isn't taking out all her calories on toast.

In Scotland, this summer, Bruce and Beatrice Gould visited friends, in residence as the queen's representatives, at Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh. They were much impressed by pipers wearing plaids (long shawls over the shoulder) as well as tartan (plaid to us) kilts, tootling their eerie wailing bagpipes at dinner; by the small stone room where Mary Queen of Scots supped with Rizzio just before his murder; and by Mrs. Gould's real Victorian bedroom, complete with steel engravings of horses, dogs and squirrels, a writing desk stamped V R, and a marble-topped washstand, equipped with bowl and pitcher. They later visited Dorothy Black, beloved JOURNAL author, in her charming house in the Scottish hills near Aberdeen, hard by Balmoral Castle. There they were impressed by Dorothy's concession to American taste, a modern bathroom to each bedroom, unlike Holyrood Palace, where bathrooms, though magnificent, were so few that guests had to nip in fast before a distinguished fellow guest got there first.

Week by week each month, under the ministrations of art editor William Fink and assistant Albert Serwazi, the JOURNAL emerges from bud form to flower on the walls of their department, and we must say it is a pretty eye-opening process to watch as monotone photostat layouts gradually give way to the final full color you see right now as you turn the pages. Each week the Goulds come back to hold a rehearsal, shifting page positions to improve the JOURNAL's performance when it reaches the reader; maybe replacing a regional house from New England with one from the South that better fits the mood of the magazine that month; bringing one story forward, putting another farther back. Then the day of the dress rehearsal, when the last-minute fashion pages are in place, when the finishing touches and final O.K.'s are given, and you can sidle back and forth three times along the two wide walls and take in the entire next issue. It would be a wonderful time and place to have a party, but we're afraid it's not much use suggesting that.

Motor scooters are all over town here. Like Japanese beetles, somebody said. But even so, we still give a double-take whenever we see a fellow editor buzz by on one, as when Tina Fredericks in a wide skirt and broad straw hat went scooting across Rockefeller Plaza behind Ruth Orkin, the photographer, on their way to the Metropolitan Museum for luncheon. "That trip was nothing," Tina said when Ruth returned her to us. "We met two girls from the public library who went scooting out to California and back last summer." We asked Tina how it felt to breeze along alfresco. "Conspicuous," she acknowledged. "What's tiresome are the same three questions everyone asks when you stop for red lights. . . . Do you have to have a license? Yes, you say. . . . How many miles to the gallon? A hundred and twenty, you yell. . . . How much do they cost? But by now you're machine-gunning off again, so you hold up four fingers, and they just nod up and down and wave good-by."

My wife's husband

She was a rag of a girl with a nose like a comma, and when she took off her glasses it made her no prettier.
It did something lovelier than that.

By BRUNELLA GASPERINI

Translated from the Italian by Elaine W. Senigallia

I know I should go home right now; it's nearly dinnertime, but the bar is cool and I'm tired. Then, too, I'm fed up. My office is a torment; maybe all offices are, but mine is even more so, taking orders from an idiotic boss—I who dreamed of a great legal career, the courtrooms resounding with my imperious voice, "Gentlemen of the court ——" Look at me now. Maybe I'd better fortify myself with another vermouth before going home. If you knew my home, you'd understand. Or even if you knew the cashier at this bar.

She's not just the cashier. She is the owner's daughter, twenty-two years old and named Floretta. When she gives me my receipt she smiles at me, drawing a melodious tinkle from the cash register and caressing her eyes with her eyelashes.

"Ninety lire," she murmurs lovingly.

You should know that girls like this have always been my type. When I was at the university I had a positive harem of girls like Floretta, beautiful, soft, perfectly turned out, with dreamy eyes and lots of money as well. I had only to choose—speaking just between ourselves—but I was careful not to do it. I had to be free. Free professionally, free in every way. And thus I should have remained if one summer day of my twenty-third year (I had graduated from law school the month before) the sky hadn't fallen on my head.

She wasn't beautiful. She wasn't soft. She wasn't perfectly turned out. Her eyes weren't dreamy and she hadn't a lira. She was a rag of a girl, thin as a nail, with a nose like a small comma above a slightly larger comma that was her mouth, with hands covered with ink, and wearing glasses. Furthermore, she wrote abstract poetry.

The first time I saw her I thought, "Mamma mia, what a disaster!" And I continued to think so, fiercely for months, asking myself why someone like me, followed by so many soft, restful blondes, should waste his time following, in his turn, a disheveled girl who wore glasses, who never said what I thought she would say, who dreamed of going around the world on a bicycle.

I called her Dante Alighieri and she called me Bob Taylor and we hated each other atrociously until suddenly a sort of painful numbing cloud surrounded me and from that cloud I uttered broken, subdued sounds incomprehensible to anyone but to her or me. Still inside that cloud, I held her in my arms and she took off her glasses. It was only a tiny gesture and yet so intimate that in front of her bare little face I felt my legs become like piecrust. I believe it was because of that gesture that I married her. The idea that someday she might take off her glasses for someone else drove me completely crazy.

Thus, just because of the glasses, I gave up waiting for my great career, took the first steady job that I found, and married her. Her and her glasses and her disorder and her butterfingers and her poetry. To all this add four children one after the other. Four, do you understand? "Oh," she says, "one more or less—what difference does it make? Anyway, every baby arrives with its own little basket." I've never seen any of those baskets. I've seen only diapers hung up across the dining room, bottles on my wife's desk, talcum powder in the cheese dish, safety pins everywhere. Perhaps you're beginning to get the idea. Perhaps you're beginning to understand why I am as fed up as twenty fed-up people, why I must reinforce myself with vermouth before going home. You begin to understand, but you are still far from the reality.

You should know that my wife no longer writes poetry. Good, you'll say; in all this sorrow there's a silver lining. Just a minute. My wife no longer writes abstract poetry but she writes stories, not in the least abstract, and what's more they get published in large-circulation magazines. And people read them. Our janitor's wife reads them. The other tenants in our building read them. They read them and cry. They read them and laugh. They read them and talk about them—oh, how they talk about them!

And then there are the letters. Mountains of letters. Not satisfied with reading, laughing, crying and talking, my wife's admirers write her letters. She reads them to me, her glasses misted with enjoyment. She smiles like ten smiling people and then she puts them in the first place that occurs to her. Whatever drawer you open in our home, you can be sure of finding at least one safety pin and one letter from an admirer. The best ones she pins to the wall of the living room-dining room-nursery-studio with thumbtacks and every once in a while rereads them, feeling herself very much Dante Alighieri while the children bite one another and the roast burns.

Eight o'clock! How worried Minni must be. A cute name, Minni, isn't it? It makes you think of a feminine little mouse. I don't mean that my wife is a feminine little mouse, nor even that she is cute. In fact, I don't even call her Minni. I call her Wife or Dante Alighieri CONTINUED ON PAGE 219

ANNA MARIE LINDGOUST

Margrethe and her sisters, Benedikte, 13, and Anne-Marie, 11, grew up in a minimum of "royal" atmosphere—for years they didn't even know they were princesses. With their mother, Queen Ingrid.

UNITED PRESS

Every winter Margrethe, her mother and sisters go off for a week or two at a Norwegian skiing lodge. Such moments of freedom are becoming rarer.

With her grandfather, Sweden's King Gustav VI, Margrethe digs in ancient Etruscan ruins near Rome.

Frederik IX is a gentle, understanding royal teacher who can take over when his daughter is unexpectedly offered a lively squealing piglet at the Bellahoej agricultural fair. He gave Margrethe the nickname "Daisy."

NORDISK PRESSEFOTO

CHOSEN TO

Margrethe was not born to rule—1000 years of tradition stood between her and the throne of Denmark.

Her people wiped it out in a single day.

For a girl whose destiny includes five castles, three hunting lodges, a yacht, stables, and millions of dollars' worth of jewels—including the Danish crown jewels—Margrethe Alexandrine Thorhildur Ingrid is remarkably casual about it. She bicycles through the streets of Copenhagen with blond hair flying. She digs with her grandfather in the ruins of an ancient Etruscan street. Newspaper snapshots show her unflatteringly down on all fours in a pit of relics, dirt under her fingernails and smudges on her face—and Margrethe doesn't care at all.

She is far more concerned when her two younger sisters act impossibly childish and silly. At such exasperating moments, Margrethe gets out her binoculars and heads for the woods alone, to watch birds and take notes for the Danish Ornithological Society, or simply to sit thinking long thoughts about life. Then, having accomplished something serious, she returns to her sisters refreshed—and may fall in with their whispering and giggling as though she were a child herself.

But these moments of freedom are becoming rarer. Last summer, Margrethe was carefree—and all the summers before. Next April, with a twenty-one-gun harbor salute to mark her eighteenth birthday and coming-of-age, Royal Princess Margrethe will become Crown Princess Margrethe of Denmark, namesake of one of the most fearsome women in history—and abolisher of the oldest tradition of the oldest ruling house in the world.

So perhaps it's a good thing she's had time for fun and freedom.

Margrethe (pronounced Mar-grā'-tuh) didn't set out to break tradition. Neither did her parents. In 1952, with three adored daughters and no sons, King Frederik IX and Queen Ingrid were perfectly willing to let the throne go to Frederik's brother Knud and upon his death to Knud's son Ingolf, in accordance with the ancient Danish law saying no woman can become ruler of the Danes.

But the Danish people—who greet each Fourth of July with fireworks, bands and speeches in admiration of American independence—are fiercely independent themselves. They saw nothing sacrosanct in a thousand-year-old tradition that denied Margrethe the throne; so Minister of Justice Helga Petersen proposed a constitutional change giving the right of succession to the ruling sovereign's eldest child—regardless of sex.

Some parliamentary gentlemen, however, were inclined to be cautious. After much debate, it was agreed that the king's eldest daughter should take the throne provided she had no brother either older or younger. When the proposed amendment was finally ready for the vote, it was weighted down by three other proposals of uncertain popularity: to abolish the upper house of parliament; to authorize surrender of some national authority to certain international bodies (NATO and UN); to change Greenland from a colony to full partnership in the Kingdom of Denmark.

Amending the Danish constitution is a long process. First parliament (the Folketing) must approve. Then a plebiscite must be held and the changes endorsed by 45 per cent of the country's total registered voters—more even than turns out in many U. S. elections! (But Danish people are so fervently interested in public affairs that failure to vote is regarded as disapproval.) After popular endorsement, the proposal goes back to the Folketing for final approval.

In the days before the plebiscite, women's clubs rallied to support the proposed change. Callers went from door to door explaining and discussing it. There were speeches and rallies. But there was really no need for such activity. No Dane who remembers the German invasion of April, 1940, could ever forget the sight of week-old Margrethe in her carriage, wheeled through the streets of Copenhagen by gallant Queen Ingrid—while ships blew up and sank in the harbor, tanks exploded in the square in front of Amalienborg Palace, and the palace itself was bombarded. And no Dane is likely to forget the bleak years of occupation when the happy, golden-haired little princess was the one bright image on the public scene; when she stood in their minds and hearts as a symbol of hope for the future. So, given the chance to show their regard for her, they responded overwhelmingly; on May 28, 1953, Margrethe was elected the potential future Queen of Denmark by grace of God and will of the people.

Eight days later King Frederik signed the new constitution at Christianborg castle. In celebrating, twenty-five criminals were amnestied, and—after Queen Ingrid called to ask permission—Margrethe got the day off from school!

In the same vote the little land of 500 islands and a peninsula, dotted with its ice-cream-colored houses and only a third as large as Pennsylvania, suddenly became the fifth largest country in the western hemisphere. For Greenland, with its 850,000 square miles and 26,000 people, was now Denmark too.

Already Margrethe's new status has brought her both pleasure and pain. Pleasure—because it's fun to be liked, and no monarch could be more sure than she of popularity and approval. Still, she has given up certain joys. As crown princess she must stay home and be tutored privately for depth-knowledge in the suddenly important subjects of Danish history, economics, international law—while her sisters Benedikte, 13, and Anne-Marie, 11, continue to tear off on their bicycles every morning to Zahle's, the girls' school in downtown Copenhagen which Margrethe attended for eight years. These days, when her father and mother perform state functions, Margrethe must do more than accompany them: she must watch and listen intently, and gradually assume a more important part herself; one day these duties will be hers alone.

No longer are parties and dances quite so exciting. Boys who had lost their timidity before the warmth of a princess who smiled, was always friendly and was called "Daisy" by her family, suddenly were awe-struck all over again at the idea of holding a future queen in their arms. And Margrethe knows that she will never again dance with a boy and think ordinary girlish thoughts about how nice he is, and if he likes her, too, and will she see him soon. First she must consider his station. If he's a commoner—well, she might as well introduce him to her prettiest girl friend; she must marry a person of princely blood.

It's fun being crown princess when the crowd shouts with obvious love, "Margrethe! We want Margrethe!" It's not so much fun when boys who used to cut in at parties are awe-struck at the idea of dancing with their future queen.

The Suite

Sam did not know Constance, but because he lived in her apartment
he knew a great deal about her.
Did he have the right to use this knowledge?

By ANNE HOMER WARNER

"The real-estate agent phoned me yesterday," Gary said. "Apparently it belongs to one of those career girls. You know, the kind who want to live their own lives in the big city, and study interior decorating or something."

"Sure," Sam agreed, looking about him with interest. He'd been skeptical when Gary told him he'd heard of a place. But now he surveyed with approval the nice blue curtains in the living room, and the compact but spotless red-and-white kitchen. "We won't find anything better than this," he said. "Let's take it."

Gary nodded. "The sublet is for only six months," he said. "But later on we can probably renew."

They went back to the real-estate office and signed the lease, and the next day they moved in. It was a simple process. Shirts in one drawer, socks in another; a few personal possessions, but very few. Miraculously, they didn't have to buy anything, for the place was exceptionally complete. Foraging around the kitchenette, they found glasses, ice bucket, an efficient array of pots and pans. Sam felt warmly grateful to the unknown young woman who had provided for them so thoughtfully.

After a week or so, they gave a party, a sort of housewarming. Gary had a job with World News, Inc., and Sam was with an engineering firm, so between them they had quite an assortment of friends and acquaintances. The party was a success, and the apartment greatly admired.

"Where did you find it?" Bill Saunders asked. "I wish you could see the place I'm holed up in!"

And Ernie Blake said, "Let me know when they draft you, Sam, and I'll move right in."

Sam grinned. "I've already finished my job in the Army," he said. "I'm here to stay." And he meant it. Not for years had he felt so at home, so rooted, somehow. Whenever he walked through the door and saw this square-shaped room, with the big windows, and the ivy in green-and-white pots, something inside of him seemed to settle down in a nice little cocoon of contentment.

He knew quite a few girls in New York, whom he liked more or less equally. But he limited himself to about two dates a week, and often brought work home from the office. As a rule he worked in the living room, but one evening, when Gary had a couple of friends in, he retired to the bedroom. It was quiet there, and the lighting was good, but the desk was far too small. His knees hit the underside, and when he tried to straighten them there wasn't room for his feet. To remedy this, he pulled the drawer out altogether, and as he did so a piece of paper slid through the back and fell on the floor. Automatically he picked it up, and started to toss it into the wastebasket. But for some reason a line of writing at the top of the page caught his eye: "I wish I didn't have to write this, Peter. It is dawn now, and I've been awake all night. . . ."

Sam frowned, feeling vaguely puzzled. What did that mean, anyhow? It was certainly an odd way to start a letter. Yet apparently that's what this was. And who had written it? The girl who owned this apartment and had used this desk? After a moment's reflection, he sat down on the edge of the bed and read it through.

"I wish I didn't have to write this, Peter. It is dawn now, and I've been awake all night. It is very hard to know how to phrase it, but maybe that is the trouble. If you are to marry someone you must be able to communicate, with words, and without words also. And that is something we've never been able to do. I promised you a long time ago, and our families are so close that I'm not even sure I'll have the courage to send this. But lately a lot of things have changed for me. I've found a new awareness, a new understanding of what love can mean. If only you will try to understand, and not think I'm just a flighty, inconstant sort of person. Perhaps I'm too sensitive about hurting other people. I can imagine just how they will feel, almost as though I'm experiencing it myself. And I do value your friendship, Peter. That's why I'm so torn now, and why it's so hard to write this letter, and even harder to send it. And yet I've been awake all night. I can't sleep for thinking ——"

That was as far as the letter went. There was no signature. Sam read it a second time, even more confused now, bewildered by this intimate glimpse into an entirely unknown life. Had she sent another draft of this letter? And what was her name?

Later in the evening, when Gary's friends had left, he asked him. "What's the name of the girl we rent this apartment from?" he said. "Do you happen to know?"

But Gary shook his head. "Maybe it's on the lease," he suggested. "We can look."

And so they got out the lease and discovered that, though they were paying the rent direct to the real-estate agent, the owner was a Miss Constance Shipley.

Which told him exactly nothing.

And yet it was strange the way phrases from that letter kept cropping up. He took Alma Phillips out one evening. She had red curls and brown eyes and danced perfectly. But then he remembered that sentence: "If you are to marry someone you must be able to communicate, with words, and without words also." It was something he had never actually thought about before, and now it bothered him. Finally he tried explaining some of his feelings about life to Alma. But they didn't get across.

Then there was a girl at the office, Penny Duryea, whom he liked a lot. But the day he took her to lunch he found himself mentally repeating those words: "A new understanding of what love can mean." They were vague and inconclusive, certainly, yet it came to him suddenly that probably a good many people never did discover what love could mean. Yet you shouldn't settle for less. Not if you could help it.

And then one evening, toward the end of the month, he had an unexpected phone call from Greenwich, Connecticut. The voice on the other end of the line was commanding, in a modulated, well-bred sort of way. "This is Mrs. Shipley speaking," it said. "Are you Mr. Bixler, or Mr. Garrick?"

"Mr. Garrick," Sam said. "Mr. Bixler is out."

"Well, that will do, as long as you're one of the tenants. Mr. Garrick, my daughter left a few things she needs in a box in the back of the hall closet. She's being married next week, and I was wondering if you would be good enough to leave a key with the superintendent so we can stop by tomorrow and pick them up."

"Of course, Mrs. Shipley," Sam said. "I'll be glad to." He thought fast. "Come to think of it," he added, "I'm CONTINUED ON PAGE 144

She hesitated and Sam thought of a phrase from her letter:
"I've found a new awareness of what love can mean . . .

AMID MY

By BETTY LUSSIER

Betty Lussier soon learned that life on the Lukus farm included more than farming. To Arab and Spanish workers she was teacher, doctor, social worker, friend, guest, and el oum— their beloved "Little Mother."

The author spent much of her childhood on a farm in Maryland. She became interested in planting hybrid corn in Spanish Morocco while living, with her husband Ricardo and their four sons, in Madrid. Here is the true story of the three seasons she spent farming in the Lukus River valley—compressed, for convenience in telling, into one summer. ED.

Spanish Morocco is truly a foreign country. It is tall eucalyptus trees with spotted trunks casting a leprous shade over the roads and bringing a momentary relief from the burning of the sun into the sand; it is towering, fat-leaved cactus spreading out over miles and miles of desolate, unpopulated hills. It is thick-walled-against-the-heat villas, whitewashed and set into picture-card orange groves. It is the occasional camel harnessed with a burro to a wooden plow. It is the Arab man padding along a sandy road huddled inside his heavy brown hand-woven woolen jelab to protect him from the hot summer sun, followed at a respectful distance by his plodding, inferior fatima swathed from head to ankle in a white haik and veiled carefully so that all that is visible are her eyes and one gnarled, brown paw clutching the halter rope of the family burro. It is also the Spanish farmer, himself a foreigner in Morocco, but as a rule as poor as the native Arab and just as proud.

Yes, Morocco is foreign, unlike our United States in physiography and character. And yet, because I lived and worked there, an American woman alone with four small children among backward Arabs and crude Spanish laborers who were accustomed to treating a woman as a chattel on the same level with the burro, the very thought of returning to Morocco always gives me a great feeling of returning to a homeland.

I had farmed in Spanish Morocco only a short time when the enormous difference between man and woman, and the still more pronounced difference which exists between the native woman and the foreign woman, was thrust upon me.

I was out riding, accompanied by two of my Spanish foremen. Marron, Pepe and I were examining a new parcel of land we intended to plant for the first time that spring. It was late afternoon, with the sun dropping and the long shadow of the Rif Mountains lengthening across the vast Mehasen Valley, giving the flat part of the valley an eerie darkness, while farther away, toward the Mehasen River, out of the mountain's shadow, it was still relentless sunshine.

Our work was done. We three could start for home, across the river. I slapped the bridle reins gently across the neck of my mare, Quimera. Marron rode close beside me, but my tractor chief, Pepe, remained behind on the narrow path, engaged in serious conversation with a strange horseman who had come out of nowhere.

The new horseman was a lean and wiry Arab with a pock-marked, chocolate skin, set off handsomely by a beautiful white woolen jelab—the all-purpose Arab garment—and a yellow silk turban wound artfully around his head. His arms, sticking out of the jelab sleeves, were sinewy and his slender fingers clutched the reins like the best English jockey. His saddle was the bulky Moroccan type, lined with a whole crude sheepskin, and he was astride a small white Arab mare. In the Arab custom, her tail and mane had been left untrimmed and her tail swept the ground most dramatically. Now and then the rider removed a brown hand from the rein to gesticulate wildly in the air.

"What does he want, Pepe?" I asked.

"He wants to race," Pepe blurted out.

I hesitated. "It is not the best thing for your horse at the end of a long, hot day. But if you want to defend your reputation as the fastest rider in the valley, go ahead."

Pepe smiled slyly. "You don't understand, Señora Betty. It's not me he wants to race against. It's you."

"Me?" I echoed, startled. Why should this Arab want to race against me?

"Yes, you," insisted Pepe. "It's something about the honor of the Arab male—they cannot have a woman riding in their territory without knowing that they can better her."

The Arab jerked his mare closer to mine and peered curiously into my face, his black eyes snapping wickedly as he jostled up and down on his saddle. I smiled at him politely. I had no intention of racing across the plain like an insane one over some vague point of honor. I spoke to Pepe in Spanish: "This is silly. Who wins such a race depends upon which mare is better and which rider is more adept, not upon whether the rider is male or female. Explain that to our visitor in his language, will you, Pepe?"

Now Marron shook his head. "He would not understand it. He only understands that you are female and that you have invaded male territory, therefore you have to stand his challenge."

The Arab suddenly loosened his rein and let his mare flash directly across the path and the courage to make that dream come true.

past Quimera. At the same time, he flung one arm above his head and let out a terrifying high-pitched, enduring shriek—his challenge—which faded across the plain as he dashed away.

Before he was ten yards off, without realizing, I lashed Quimera with the loose ends of the reins, dug my heels into her belly and flattened my body along her neck.

"Go, go, go!" I yelled in her ear, and instantly we were plunging after the Arab. His little mare with her slim legs fairly skimmed over the rough ground, but Quimera was steadily gaining by right of her longer legs and more powerful body. She drew up, neck and neck, with the Arab horse. For a second or two the mares raced along together, no sound on the air except their labored breathing, the creaking of our saddles and the clink of the metal bits. The two swerved even closer and my ankle was caught in a painful crush against the heavy stirrup of the Arab saddle. Suddenly the Arab let out another of his wild screams and surged out in front in a cloud of dirt lumps and dust, the winner.

I came to a less spectacular stop beside him. His mouth spread into a gleeful grin, his black eyes sparkled happily, and in his exuberance he dropped his reins, stretched out both his hands and gripped my shoulders in brotherly fashion.

"You good, you very good," he said in broken Spanish, and with no further communications he yanked his mare around and raced back to his kabila—the local Arab village.

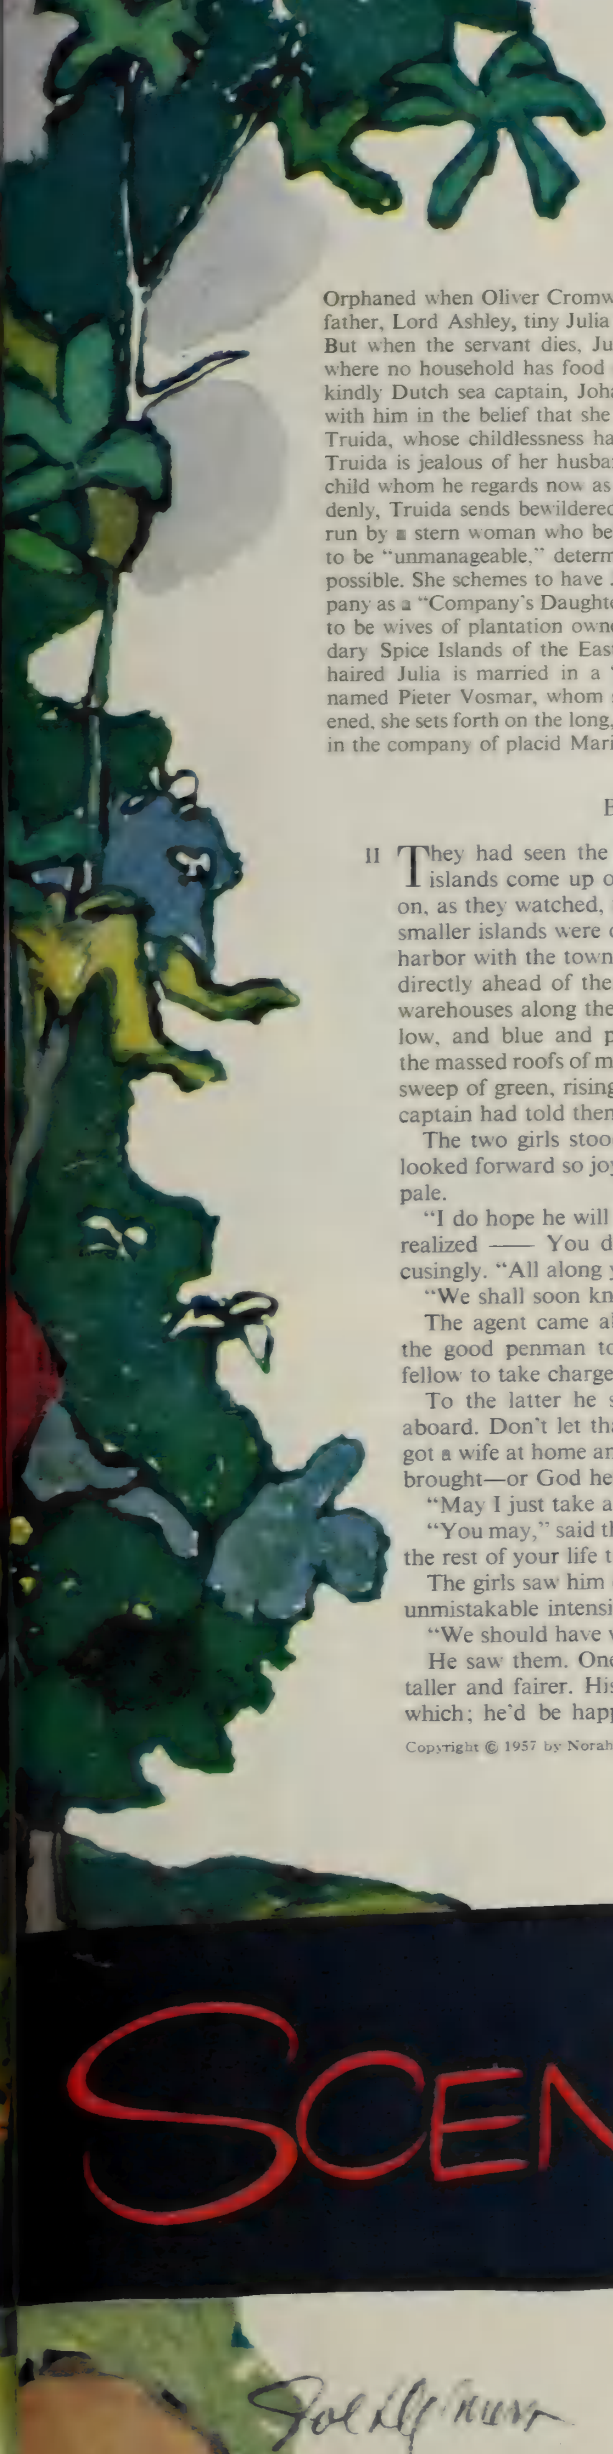
I sat there on Quimera, catching my breath. I looked off across the plain at the graceful billow of the white jelab whipping out behind the little Arab mare, as it burst from under the mountain shadow into the sunshine again. He was content, that Arab; he could tell all the village that this new foreign woman was only a woman after all, with no superpowers. He had defeated her in fair combat.

And suddenly it struck me that this race against a challenging Arab on a desolate plain in Spanish Morocco was a long way from the leisurely, social life I led in Madrid. What had brought me to this lonely African valley? What am I doing here, anyway? I asked myself.

Once one has farmed, one always misses a farm. Farmers have a way of setting aside their tools of trade for long periods and for various reasons—we get discouraged with the land, we get enthusiastic about something else, we get tired of being very poor. We go away for all these reasons, but at some time or other we come back again to farming. We come back sheepishly sometimes and we would rather not have to explain why, but we do come back.

I went away from farming for many of these same reasons; I needed to go back to farming because of the too comfortable life we led in Madrid. I had begun to feel I was not doing all that I could do, not using my capacities to their fullest. I am sure that no one else noticed this inner slackness, but I felt it strongly. The empty, getting-nowhere idleness of my life in Madrid weighed upon me. I wanted to do something with my hands and brains, I wanted to do something basic.

Farming is the most basic of all work and the work I knew best, and that is the real reason, under all the reasons I was to conjure up in my CONTINUED ON PAGE 146



"My sons accepted their new life without question. Arabs believe that children should be allowed to do whatever they want, and not be punished. This suited the boys fine."

Betty's Arab mare, here seen with Betty holding son Jay, took her through cornfields where station wagon could not go. Horses and burros were daily play companions for children.

She kissed him for luck,
for gratitude, for good-by,
with a kind of innocent passion.

Now she would know the worst—or the best—of all she had feared and hoped of this strange marriage.

SYNOPSIS OF PART I

Orphaned when Oliver Cromwell's army destroyed the castle of her father, Lord Ashley, tiny Julia is saved by a devoted family servant. But when the servant dies, Julia is left alone in a war-ruined land where no household has food or shelter to share. She is found by a kindly Dutch sea captain, Johannes Belderdik, who takes her home with him in the belief that she will be warmly welcomed by his wife Truida, whose childlessness had been a source of deep sorrow. But Truida is jealous of her husband's love for the pretty eight-year-old child whom he regards now as a daughter. When Johannes dies suddenly, Truida sends bewildered, grief-stricken Julia to an orphanage run by a stern woman who believes Truida when she claims the girl to be "unmanageable," determines to rid herself of Julia as soon as possible. She schemes to have Julia accepted by the East India Company as a "Company's Daughter"—girls who are trained and sent out to be wives of plantation owners and workers in the remote, legendary Spice Islands of the East Indies. So, at fifteen, lovely golden-haired Julia is married in a "glove marriage" ceremony to a man named Pieter Vosmar, whom she has never seen. Reluctant, frightened, she sets forth on the long, seven-month voyage to her new home in the company of placid Marie, another "glove marriage" bride.

SCENT of CLOVES

By NORAH LOFTS

II They had seen the island of Banda and its little satellite islands come up out of the water, blue blurs which took on, as they watched, the shape and substance of reality. The smaller islands were out of sight now; the ship lay in Banda harbor with the town of Banda Neira, Marie's future home, directly ahead of them. There was the circle of houses and warehouses along the water front, white and cream and yellow, and blue and pink and ocher-colored, and behind it the massed roofs of many houses, and behind them a climbing sweep of green, rising up to a sharp conical peak which, the captain had told them, was the Fire Mountain.

The two girls stood alone together, and Marie, who had looked forward so joyously to this moment, suddenly turned pale.

"I do hope he will like me—that I shall like him. I hadn't realized —— You did, didn't you?" she asked almost accusingly. "All along you knew how dreadful it would be."

"We shall soon know the worst," Julia said.

The agent came aboard. He had brought two assistants, the good penman to make the cargo lists and the strong fellow to take charge of boxes addressed to the agent's wife.

To the latter he said, "Yes, I know you've got a wife aboard. Don't let that take your mind off your duties; I've got a wife at home and she's waiting for what the captain has brought—or God help him!"

"May I just take a moment to look at her, Mynheer?"

"You may," said the agent, "but only a minute. You've got the rest of your life to look at her. God help you."

The girls saw him coming, shouldering his way along with unmistakable intensity of purpose.

"We should have worn our gloves," Marie said.

He saw them. One small and plump and dark; the other taller and fairer. His heart rose. He didn't care which was which; he'd be happy with either of the girls as his wife.

Just short of them he stopped and made a bow, clumsy to begin with and ruined by someone behind him brushing against his hindquarters. To keep his balance he had to take two steps forward, but as he straightened he smiled and said good-naturedly and somehow endearingly, "That would happen to me! May I bid you both welcome to Banda and ask which is Mevrouw Oltman?"

Marie said, "I am," and then he knew that she was the one he had favored all along. He threw his great arms round her. "Oh, I'm lucky," he said. "I never thought you'd be so pretty."

"And you're handsome," Marie said.

Julia had taken a step away and stood looking at them. It was just right; exactly what Marie had expected and exactly what Mevrouw Helmers had foretold. The good God had made men and women and put them together. He'd made Marie and Hendrik and had—with a little help from the East India Company—brought them together and for them all was well. But for me—the man isn't born to whom I could take so instant a fancy . . . and somewhere here a man is coming who will ——

She felt sick and turned away and looked over the rail.

Coming in toward the ship's side, very noticeable among the other boats, was one painted white with a yellow canopy. It was rowed by two brown men who wore short drawers of the same yellow and had metal collars around their necks. They brought the boat alongside, and one took hold of the ship's ladder. As he steadied the boat a small man, dressed entirely in pale gray, came out from under the awning and began to climb.

"That must be somebody very important. What a fine boat!"

Julia was surprised to find Marie beside her.

"Hendrik has some work to do, so I have to wait. Julia, don't you think he's nice? I do hope yours is too."

The small man in gray had gained the deck and now came toward them, and whereas Hendrik had had to push his way through, everybody stepped back to allow this man free passage.

"It must be the governor himself," said Marie, "and he's—yes, he is—coming to welcome us."

And it seemed so. He came straight toward them. He was, despite his short stature, an impressive figure, very upright and taut. His hair, worn long and elaborately curled, was as near as could be the color of his clothes; fine lace frothed whitely at his wrist and breast. He halted, looked at them both in a way only just saved from insolence by its seriousness, and then asked:

"Mevrouw Vosmar?"

"I am, Mynheer."

He bowed. "I am Simon Vosmar. My son was unable to meet you himself. I trust you had a pleasant voyage. And now, if you are ready ——" He turned and offered her his arm.

Why I like being

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor of the Journal

We asked thirteen outstanding women to express their feeling about the special rewards of womanhood. Straight from their hearts come the answers that will give you a lift—or a laugh!

Have you ever stopped to think of the special satisfactions in life that come to you because you are a woman? If you are like most of us, you are probably so busy just being a woman—doing a woman's work and delighting in a woman's pastimes—that it has never occurred to you to appraise your unique place in the world. Following are some thoughts on this fascinating subject from a variety of women whose names will be familiar to you. Just like a woman, though, we'll begin with what a famous man once said about a member of our sex:

> The reason firm, the temperate will,
> Endurance, foresight, strength, and skill;
> A perfect Woman, nobly planned,
> To warn, to comfort, and command.
> WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

Though Wordsworth's celebrated paragon may be no more than a "phantom of delight," her Creator endowed her with an immortal beauty that lives through the ages to enhance the ways of women, stir the hearts of men and grace the lives of children.

"Being just biologically a woman isn't enough," says MRS. NORMAN VINCENT PEALE, "but being a spiritually conditioned woman is a joyous experience. For then, certain built-in qualities may be used to invest life with extraordinary meaning. For example, at dinner one evening I was seated beside a famous psychologist. A plate was served and the man on the other side of me touched it. Finding it very hot, he drew back with an expression of pain. I reached forward, picked it up and held it for him. 'How can you hold a hot plate like that?' he asked. The psychologist overheard and answered, 'Don't you know that a woman is so constituted nervously that she can handle hot things better than men?' I like to think that as a woman I can handle the heatedness of life and bring serenity, quietness and emotional control into situations. A spiritually integrated woman can be a center of quietness in the family and a creative influence in the world about her."

All life is brightened by woman's special talent for creativeness. "I believe women are able to create beauty out of anything," says ARLENE DAHL LAMAS. "Examples of her feminine ingenuity are everywhere: in the gay curtains made from a scrap of cloth to cheer up her kitchen; in the tempting buffet supper concocted from leftovers; in the charm of her own appearance brought out by something as simple as a fun apron or a ribbon in her hair. With no more than a bouquet of field flowers, a few bright pillows or a bowl of polished fruit, a woman can turn a drab place into a haven of delight. I believe these are the kinds of things that glorify a woman, day by day, and prompt the man in her life to kiss her lovingly and sigh contentedly, 'It's good to be home!'"

The rich and intimate communication a woman has with her family and friends comforts her with warmth and stands her in good stead as time goes by. A woman never waits for a "right time or place" to cultivate friendships. It is part of her nature to be always "getting to know you": over the dinner dishes; across the yard, when you meet unexpectedly; in the hours she spends with you when you are ill or lonely and need her. All through the day a mother stops to share a "just-between-us" moment with her child—and in the quiet of their closeness, in the clasp of their hands, in the exchange of big and little ideas, new bonds of love and understanding are stored in both their minds and stamped on both their hearts.

"Enjoying the opportunities a woman has to receive and appreciate friendship is one of the biggest joys in life," says LILLIAN GILBRETH. "Perhaps a widow who tries to bring up a large family of small children and at the same time carry on her husband's work has special reason to be grateful for the generous and willing help she receives. A neighbor asks if she may not enter my daughters in the dancing class, see that they get there appropriately dressed, and are returned home. A man phones to ask if he might take one of my sons, along with his own child, to a father-son Boy Scout meeting. A whole community of people make a social life possible for a mother and her family who need it, but who have little to offer in return hospitality. I am deeply grateful for so many friends who have given this woman and her family a full, rich life."

A husband was asked, on the occasion of his twentieth wedding anniversary, what he considered to be his wife's most appealing qualities. Unhesitatingly, he answered, "Her femininity. Everything she does spells w-o-m-a-n. Her walk is light and graceful, her voice, too—and she uses her hands prettily. Her ideas are usually as sound and solid as a man's, but when she offers them she does it with the graciousness of a hostess serving tea. In a way, there's a selfish

a Woman

With the still unblemished heart, motive about my loving her femininity. You see, it sets me up—makes me feel important as a man!"

What woman doesn't delight in her ability to so charm a man? All we have to do is look at the clothes we choose, taste the food we cook, smell the perfume we wear, hear the way we talk, and feel the beat of our hearts, to know that it's the man who inspires us to flavor life by making the most of our senses!

"Being a woman makes it possible to enjoy men so much more!" says MAUREEN O'SULLIVAN FARROW. "In a house full of men—husband and three sons—I speak from experience! I enjoy the company of men. I like the way their minds work. Most of all, I like the way they treat us—as though they really believe we are the weaker sex, and at the same time as though we are a superior being. When I have looked into the little face of my newborn baby and found, in the tiny frown and fleeting expressions of this unbelievable little being, the spirit of the man I love, I know there could be no greater joy on earth. I am glad I am a woman! I am even glad it is a 'man's world'!"

The woman who is blessed with a good sense of humor—who makes up her mind to live on the sunny side of life despite its stormy intervals—is truly nobly planned. If you can cheerfully shrug off a disappointment, find the funny side of a maddening situation, laugh even when the world doesn't always laugh with you, chances are this special quality of personality has won you a life full of friends and good times.

"There are so many reasons why I like being a woman I don't know where to begin," says BETTY MacDONALD, whose sense of humor brings as much cheer into her own life as it does into her stories. "Of course I could start with the right to vote, but the fact that this is not one of woman's exclusive franchises is pretty obvious if you have ever been around at election time and heard, 'Jim, honey, is it Acheson or Dulles we despise?'

"No, I'm thinking in terms of more truly womanly things. For instance, take Mother's Day when we had a roundup. Was I out in the cool green dawn saddling and currying horses; was I riding over these beautiful hills; was I leaning against the fence drinking Corral de Tierras, and exchanging anecdotes pointing up my bravery, skill with animals and general quick-wittedness? Of course not. I spent the day in that cozy old-fashioned little groove between stove, sink and kitchen table, with occasional sorties to the freezer and garbage cans. And where am I after a dinner party when the door has shut at two A.M. on the last guest? Do I yawn out of my clothes and fall wearily to bed? I should say not. I limp right out to the kitchen where mountains of dirty dishes, a bottle of soy sauce spilled inside the refrigerator, and wilted salad await me. I look forlornly around—and then, almost overcome with my good fortune in having been born a female, I kick off my high heels, wipe my tears on a crumpled napkin marked 'Having fun with Betty and Don,' tie on a big apron and put the old coffeepot on to heat!"

For any of you who are sometimes tempted to think that "career women" live only for fame and self-centered glory or get more pleasure out of punching clocks than pinning diapers, listen to what these famous personalities have to say about the satisfactions of being a woman:

MARGARET MEAD underscores our own belief that children are the greatest source of pleasure in the world by saying, "More than anything else, I have cherished my close association with my daughter. I've loved teaching her the things I knew, reading to her the books I'd read. All through my own childhood I enjoyed younger children more than I did most adults, and a lifetime of studying children has therefore been a lifetime of delight. Though I sympathized with administrators who thought women were a nuisance on expeditions, still I felt comfortable in asking to go because what I wanted to do—study how children learned to be members of different cultures—needed to be done by a woman anthropologist. Primitive men frowned upon male intruders into the lives of their women. But I was also relieved when the former administrator of New Guinea said I might go anywhere I liked in the interior, 'because you have proved you don't get killed in New Guinea.'"

The following world-famous career woman might understandably pin her reasons for liking to be who she is on the fact of her personal popularity and the glamour it brings to her life. But ETHEL MERMAN SIX says quite simply, "I like being a woman because I like to have children. When I look at my two youngsters, Ethel and Bobby, and realize that they are a part of and belong to me, I can think of nothing in this world that is more important or precious."

THE Exe

FIRST OF TWO PARTS

By JOHN D. MACDONALD

Sam Bowden lay on his back under a high Saturday sun, eyes closed, aware of the nearness of Carol. Digestion of the picnic lunch was proceeding comfortably. Jamie and Bucky were thrashing around on the beach, and Sam knew that it would soon be time for eleven-year-old Jamie to send six-year-old Bucky to ask if it wasn't time they could go back into the water. On other years Nancy would have been racing and whooping with the younger kids.

But this year Nancy was fourteen, and this year she had brought a guest along, a fifteen-year-old boy named Pike Foster. Nancy and Pike lay baking in the sun on the foredeck of the Sweet Sioux III, with a portable radio tuned to the odd offerings of a progressive disk jockey. The Sweet Sioux was moored a hundred feet down the curve of beach, her bow ten feet off the sand, and the music was barely audible.

Sam Bowden lay with the sun coming red through his eyelids and tried, almost with desperation, to tell himself that all was right with his particular world. Everything was fine. This was the first expedition of the year to the island. The Bowdens would make three or four trips to it this year, the same as every year since 1950, when they had found it. It was a ridiculously small island twelve miles out into the lake, northwest of New Essex. It was too small to have a name. It merited a single dot on the charts and a warning of shoal waters for the benefit of wandering boatmen. It had a hill and a beach and reasonably deep water just off the beach.

Everything was under control. The marriage was of the very best variety. Everybody was healthy. He had been a partner in the law firm ever since 1948. Their house, just outside the village of Harper, thirteen miles from New Essex, was more house than he should have purchased, but he could console himself with the constantly increasing value of the ten acres of land. They had no savings to speak of, a very few shares of pale-blue-chip stocks. But his hefty insurance program gave him a feeling of security.

He told himself that there was absolutely no need to fret. No point in getting hysterical. Think of it as just another problem that could be taken care of neatly, quietly, with dispatch and efficiency.

"Hey!" Carol said, breaking in on his thought.

"Uh?"

"Wake up and look at me, you inert mass."

He rolled up onto one sharp elbow and squinted at her. "You look just fine," he said. And she did, indeed. The pale blue swim suit set off her dark coloring. Her hair was black and shiny, a heritage from the remote fraction of Indian blood that had provided the inevitable name for the three boats they had owned. Her eyes were fine and dark and large. Her thirty-seven years showed in the weather wrinkles at the corners of her eyes, and possibly in the veins on the backs of her hands, but not at all in the long lithe figure, the round and agile legs.

"I was not fishing," she said firmly. "This is a serious matter. Pay attention."

"Yes, ma'am."

"It started on Thursday when you came back from the office. You were physically present, but spiritually among the missing. And yesterday the same. And today, more of it. Fifteen years of marriage, my remote friend, gives a girl extrasensory equipment."

"That sounds provocative. The equipment looks good on you!"

"Hush! No smart talk, Samuel. No covering up. I want to know. Just now you were scowling more than the sun requires. I know when something is nibbling at you."

"In all of New Essex, I am known as Subtle Sam. Nobody knows what I'm thinking. They cannot probe my Gioconda smile. I can draw and fill an inside straight without a tremor. But you have an uncanny ——"

"Please," she said in an entirely different voice, and he knew that he would have to tell her.

"All right. But understand that I'm a natural-born worrier. Everything is so good that I'm superstitious. I want to keep this very precious applecart of ours standing on its wheels."

"I can help you worry."

"Or maybe laugh me out of it. I hope so. A weird thing happened when I came out of the office on Thursday. But that isn't the starting place. It starts on a certain trip overseas you might possibly remember."

He knew she could remember. There had been only the one trip, back in 1943, when First Lieut. Samuel B. Bowden, of the Judge Advocate General's Department, took a lengthy cruise on the old Comte de Biancamano, which was being operated by the U. S. Navy. He had embarked wearing his Pentagon pallor, and had eventually ended up in New Delhi in Theater Headquarters of the CBI.

"I'm not fixing to forget it, lover. You were gone a good chunk of time. A good chunk out of my life. A bad chunk, I should say."

"You haven't heard me go through the Bowden symposium of side-splitting war stories for some time, but do you happen to remember my anecdote about Melbourne? It wasn't very funny."

"Sort of. Let me see. You got off there and you got mixed up in something and the ship went on without you because you had to be a witness, and you never caught up with that foot locker we packed with such loving care."

"I was a key witness at a court-martial. Rape."

"Yes, I remember that. But I don't remember how you came to be a witness."

"It was a June night, and cold. I decided to walk back to the ship. It was two in the morning. As I was getting myself thoroughly lost, I heard a whimpering in an alley. I thought it was a puppy or a kitten. But it was the girl. She was fourteen."

He knew that that night would never leave his memory. The great stone city with its wide deserted streets, just a few lights burning. The sound of his heels echoing from the empty walls. He was humming Roll Out the Barrel. It became nicely resonant when he was opposite the mouths of the alleys.

He decided a puppy or a kitten could be smuggled onto the ship. And then he had stopped and stared without comprehension at the pale tumbled legs, the brute rhythm of the attacker, had heard the animal whining, heard the meaty crack of his fist against her face. With comprehension had come a high wild anger. He had pulled the soldier away from her, and as the man had scrambled up, had struck wildly and with all his strength, and had hit the hard shelf of jaw. The man had grappled with him weakly, then slid down, rolled onto his back and, to Sam's astonishment, had begun to snore. He ran out and a few moments later hailed a Shore Patrol jeep.

PATTERN WITH A FUTURE

EMMA GENE HALL

Yes, all seven of these suits have been made from the very same pattern. The jacket is designed to become all figures; and as for skirts, there are two—one straight and one with all-round pleats. Right now, you'll probably be thinking in terms of wool jersey like the blue one above. The paisley silk of the blouse (Vogue Design No. 9227) also lines the jacket. Or in tweed like our lavender one with jersey trim. Later, make it in dramatic white lamé or in an all-beige satin-and-chiffon combination, adding a mink collar. In the spring what could be prettier than this same suit in black silk faille; and for summer think of it in turquoise linen with shorter sleeves. ALL versions, Vogue Design No. S-4832, 10 to 20.

This slim, lovely silver-and-white lamé is a perfect theater costume. Sparkle with rhinestone buttons and crystal beads.

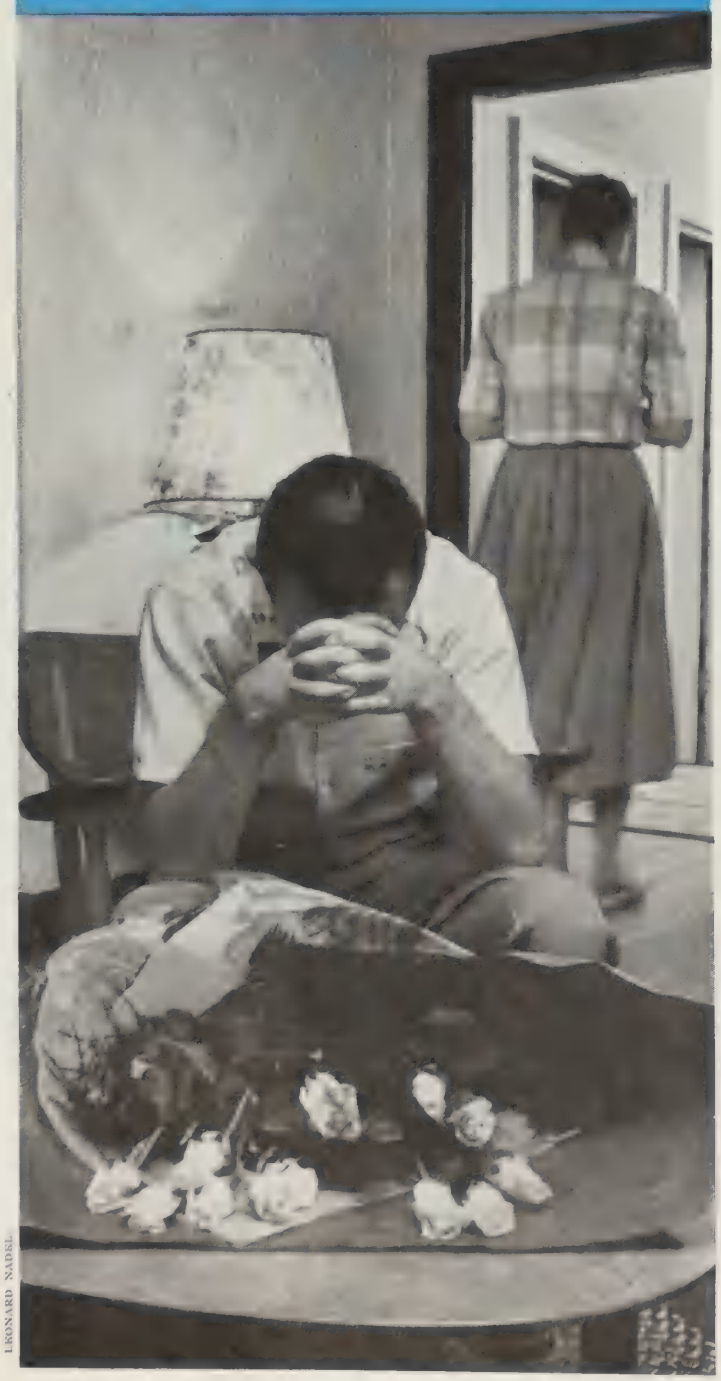
What could be lovelier than a combination of silk satin and chiffon in the same pale beige? We have added a detachable ranch-mink collar; and why not make a chiffon blouse to match the skirt?

FUR ACCESSORIES BY JULES LEITMAN

Black silk faille makes this "good little suit" all women long to own. We have added two ½" fabric bows at the waistline for detail.

Wide-wale corduroy comes in the most magnificent colors. Ours, in avocado green, is brightened by a red print blouse (Vogue Design No. 9318). Note that the fabric is cut cross grain for added interest.

This printed velveteen abstract plaid design in shades of pink and red is enhanced by a pink jersey blouse with a cowl neckline. Blouse, Vogue Design No. 9317, 12 to 42.



We like the look of this jacket worn open and easy without buttons and buttonholes. Could be belted too. Pick up the mauve of the tweed in the jersey blouse, collar, cuffs. Blouse, Vogue Design No. 9072, 10 to 18.

Can this Marriage be Saved?

The more two persons have in common, the easier they are likely to find the many adjustments of marriage. Yet everyone knows of marriages in which husband and wife started almost as far apart as the poles, in religion, culture, race, education—any important trait you can name—yet have had a happy and productive partnership. The secret of success lies not merely in accepting but in sympathizing with the differences, seeing the value in each one. The secret of failure lies in disparaging the differences and trying to force change; in continual assertion that "I'm better than you are," not in exactly those words but in many thousands of other words to the same effect. Marriage counselors have to help their clients to give themselves some re-education for this purpose, in most instances. Fortunately this is not too difficult, if two persons loved each other enough to marry in the first place. The counselor in this case was Mrs. Iris K. Richardson. PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director

LEONARD NADEL

SHE: "On the day Max returned from Korea our peace was ended. He was fiercely critical of the house my earnings had bought. He objected to my friends and my new clothes. He demanded that I quit work and I refused."

HE: "Jenny has become mercenary in spirit and intolerably penny-pinching. She took a job while I was overseas and now declares our boys need the money she earns. What they need is more of her company."

JENNY TELLS HER SIDE: "I don't know why I let you waste my time," Jenny said to the marriage counselor in the emphatic accents of Western Oklahoma. The year was 1954 and Jenny was then thirty years old. She had soft, dark hair, close-cropped, a robust but not-an-ounce-too-heavy figure, smoldering blue eyes that defied the world.

"At present I'm working twelve splits at the telephone company—splits are four-hour shifts scattered irregularly through the week—and I'm painting and papering my seven-room house. I'm keeping up with the weeds in a half-acre garden and I'm freezing and canning my produce to cut expenses and meet the payments on my house. In addition—and this I consider my real job—I'm cooking and doing the washing and looking after my three sons. I intend to see to it that Bill, Bob and Jack grow up to be fine, strong men.

"I don't want to learn how to polish up my personality and be a better wife. To be honest, I can't see I need improvement. And so far as my boys and I are concerned, it's too late for their father to improve. Six months ago I asked Max to move out of the house and allow his sons and me a little peace. Four months ago, after much turmoil, he did move. Our marriage is done for. It's his fault, not mine. For twelve years he bullied and abused me and the boys.

"By now you must be wondering why I came here to talk to you. I came solely to oblige Max. Last night he begged for another chance. He climbed down off his high horse, he crawled, he even shed tears. I have no love left for Max, not one particle. Still and all, I guess I have my share of common humanity. And more than my share of imagination. Words have always made pictures in my head that please or trouble me. Say 'summer' and I see a hot gold sun shining on a long road. Say 'autumn' and in my mind I hear rain splashing on the roof. I hate the word 'divorce,' really hate it. Possibly because my parents were divorced the word seems gray and ugly; glad as I am to be separated from Max, I shrink from the idea of being a 'divorced' woman.

"Max is a steady visitor in my house. When he stopped by last night he didn't bring a stick of candy to his sons, but he brought me a big bunch of flowers. Roses, hothouse roses. I'm fond of flowers, but my back yard is in full bloom and anyhow Max can't afford hothouse flowers. That made no never-mind to him. Max is Austrian-born—he escaped from Vienna just before World War Two—and apparently it's a European belief—anyway, it's his belief—that a bouquet or an extravagant gift will bedazzle a woman and bury years of insults and meanness. That type of reasoning doesn't go with me. A freight car loaded with orchids wouldn't take care of what I took from Max in the days before he went off to Korea and the boys and I learned the joys of freedom and I found out to my surprise how easy it was to stand on my own feet.

"Well, I declined the bouquet politely but firmly. My refusal infuriated Max. At once he and I became involved in one of our whing-ding disputes. Suddenly, in the midst of the uproar, Max leaned against the wall and his bouquet slipped to the floor. It was then he put his hand over his face and he cried. I saw my grandfather cry like that at my grandmother's funeral, and though I was only seven years old I still remember. I started toward Max. Perhaps it was in my heart to comfort him. The impulse was short-lived, I assure you. Before I took two steps Max straightened up and snarled at me. Immediately we were fighting again.

"Ordinarily Max is quiet-voiced—I'm the noisy one in the family—but he is a master of the taunting, sarcastic remark. Max is better educated than I am; he has a Ph.D. in European law; he has a degree in psychology CONTINUED ON PAGE 186

PHILOSOPHY OF A JOURNAL PORTFOLIO HOUSE

JOURNAL Portfolio Houses are designed to give our readers MAXIMUM VALUE AT MINIMUM COST. In value we include space, convenient livability, taste and beauty. Cost by our standards calls for prices that are reasonable and consistent for a growing family, with no sacrifice of quality or longevity of materials, with no innovations that add outrageously to cost. In keeping our main effort centered on the cost problem, sound inner structure and pure outer beauty stay paramount. If an innovation functions, and is in line with a practical budget, we include it. We do not include it unless it provides economy plus excellence.

A Portfolio House has to be tried, true and ready to stand the test of time—as does anything you recommend to a friend.

A HOUSE WITH ROOM TO GROW

What gives the house such livability and value
How landscaping frames the house like a picture
Why the living room is such a success
Things that make the dining room so special
Designing delightfulness into the kitchen
Plus features in large basement and bedrooms

● A hundred things about this house make it better and better as it goes along. ● Its cost is a fascinating feature in view of its looks, livability and lasting value. ● Construction estimates of the house itself—five bedrooms, two baths and a half, full basement, along with family dining room, living room, kitchen and lobby—range between $22,000 and $29,000, depending on your local prices. ● For 15 per cent less you can leave the second floor and basement unfinished until you need them, yet enjoy a generous small-family house. ● The house is a picture, and, like a picture, it is set off by its frame of JOURNAL fencing, which is fine for its outward appearance and for the feeling of privacy and security it provides. It multiplies the effectiveness of newly planted shrubbery and trees from the very start. ● Exterior walls are vertical tongue-and-groove siding, painted a soft turquoise. ● Attractive contrast is the slate-blue trim which emphasizes the horizontal ground-hugging lines of the house. ● White asphalt roof shingles work as well as they look—for a cooler house (they reflect the sun's heat), for a more carefree house (their built-in color never requires repainting). ● Aluminum sliding window sash is factory-finished, permanently bright. ● Frosted-glass skylights over stair well and second-floor bath give more light and air than old-fashioned dormers, cost less to build.

From its sheltered entry path to its expansive rear terrace, the outside is as livable as the house itself. ● Brick-paved entry path, front and rear terraces are utilitarian as well as attractive; they place the planting away from the house where it belongs, looks better, grows better. ● The paving—brick laid in sand over a gravel base—functions perfectly as an exterior floor in all weathers. ● Paved areas lead onto a fine lawn frame for the house, cool and quiet. ● Lawns of rougher grass beyond the boundaries of the fencing are for play, protection and easy maintenance. ● Weather-wise terrace furniture of rattan peel and woven willow is as practical as it is pretty; the hourglass stools separate at the center to become individual snack tables, or child-sized chairs. Legs of the willow-seated tripod stools detach and store within the basket-shaped seats; stools can stack on a basement shelf out of season.

These outdoor pleasures hint at the many features of livability to be found within. . . .

The patio is wrapped around with rhododendron and Journal fencing, planted for spring and summer with pansies and geraniums, made livable and lovely with furniture of rattan peel.

The patio grows out of the living room. The whole garden grows out of the house.

SECOND FLOOR

Plenty of space for studies and fun in large second-floor bedrooms.

MORE PLEASURES IN THE JOURNAL'S HOUSE WITH ROOM TO GROW

The dappled and secluded terrace you viewed from outdoors can now be seen from inside the house. Here you see how it actually adds to the guest capacity and beauty of the home.

THE LIVING ROOM

● Outdoors carries indoors from blossomed patio right into a flower-touched living room. Here the scheme is simple elegance. ● Wallpaper of petal pink is laced with a white design, subdued and charming for a room like this, and picked up boldly by twin couches and their vermilion flowers on cloud white. The advantage of these small sofas, beautifully scaled, is that they can be put together to form one long sofa or combined to make a corner grouping. The room stays versatile with a capacity for change and growth all through the years. ● Between sofas, a marble coffee table on an imaginative base is one of the handsomely lustrous and wearfree surfaces of the room. ● Background for the whole grouping is a fire in a slate-faced hearth against a fireplace wall of chalk-white random-board paneling. And note storage possibilities—above the paneled wood box set into the wall, game cabinets run almost to ceiling. The wall itself provides gallery space for an art collection added to over the years. ● Almost an echo of lawns outside are the green velvet armchairs, and they, with a nest of plastic-topped polished-wood stacking tables, form a conversational group all their own.

● Farther on toward the window you see an ebony-black, plastic-topped game table, a perfect spot to set a tray of cool drinks on its trip to the outer terrace. ● Beside it, geranium-painted chairs are part of a whole new genus of furniture that comes prepainted, harbinger of all our more colorful homes ahead. ● The colors, a joy in themselves, call for only the subtlest of framing to tie all their bouquet beauties together. ● And so the rug is a rosy-beige wool, moderate of price and buoyant of tuft underfoot. ● Draperies in slim beige-and-white stripe are a synthetic mix, of pearly translucence. ● For extra storage, far end of the room, not shown here, holds two commodious low chests of scarlet with brass fittings. ● And there you have it in a garden setting . . . a gemlike room that can seat at least ten, take an overflow of as many more outdoors, can beckon to an impromptu garden party or close out the world for a gentle evening around the fire. Create it with few and vivid furnishings at the beginning and it can be added to at ease later.

THE DINING ROOM

■ What most homes don't provide today, and what this one does, is a separate dining room. ■ As you see by the plan, it adjoins the kitchen, and across its 10′4″ width can hold a dinner party of eight with a long view of far horizons. The room itself could be highly formal, casual, or a combination of prized antiques and practical modern. ■ The table of glowing teakwood is a two-leaf extension at an astoundingly budget price as tables go, proof that judicious choice need not break the bank. ■ Around it go congenially two Louis XIII chairs upholstered in yellow-and-charcoal checkerboard that is actually sunproof and mildewproof sailcloth, and expansive contemporary tub chairs in natural beech lacquered a brilliant flame color. ■ Black-and-white wallpaper is a soothing repetition of Persian flowers. We see it framed by a flame-colored strip above and lit by curtains of sheer yellow linen with the cast-iron wearability for which linen has long been loved.

■ At the far end of the room we allowed for two storage closets to hold an entire stock of partyware and linens. Hidden hardware lets them open at a touch, click tightly closed, with no break in the white planking design. ■ Between them, serving cupboard can be built in, or, as here, be an antique buffet of polished pine with the patina of generations. A seventeenth-century still life goes above it. Taking part in twentieth-century not-so-still life below are an antique brass ladle, Limoges coffee set, flowered tureen. ■ If you close your eyes you can decorate the same nook a dozen other ways, from Shaker simplicity to modern brilliance and a Braque painting. ■ The convenient swinging door to the kitchen is about four steps to the left of the buffet.

WHAT KIND OF KITCHEN?

For our house we planned a kitchen to handle all the busy work the rest of the house is shielded from. Informal meals, breakfasts, afternoon snacks can be served at its counter to free the dining room from odd-hour traffic that would interfere with dinner plans. But that is only one of the kitchen's skills. . . .

For informality, there's a soup-and-cereal counter.

Directly behind it is laundry end of the room.

One action-packed side wall faces the big row of windows.

A ROOM WITH MANY TALENTS

A whole control center for family living, it channels so much action because of the precise way its centers are grouped in the 8′11″ x 19′ room. Count them—cooking, washing, serving snacks, laundering, ordering, home-business-agenting. The kitchen (see plan on facing page, photo at right) is strategically next to garage, delivery drive, service court and play area. A high-visibility row of windows views all entering trucks and cars. Back delivery door is a step past the washer-and-dryer corner. Pretend you moved in. Open the roomy row of honey-colored cupboards and see how they take everything in sight out of sight, tidy as a pin. Beneath them a one-piece sink plus drainboard holds pails of flowers or quantities of home-grown vegetables awaiting a rinsing, husking or shelling. Next sink, turn a switch and an automatic dishwasher hums at its work. Slide out its racks, top one turns lazy-Susan fashion, so dishes can be loaded by the time the grocery truck unloads. A cold-storage closet in itself is a big refrigerator double-decked inside, with a top that manufactures ice in crescents and keeps turning it out so the bin stays full. Everywhere in the base cabinets of sand-beige metal are hidden assets, shown, for example, in the small photo at far right. These are adjustable sliding trays you can set shallow or deep, high or low. The drawers directly above have no handles at all to hit a hip or catch an apron string—with smooth finger grips below, they pull out silently. Farther on in the honey-and-beige scheme, down at the cooking end of the room and under the wall clock, is a cooking top dropped into the counter. Of its four burners, one takes over on a chowder or stew or rarebit with automatic control while you move on at your work. You can check the browning of an apple pie in the eye-level glass-doored oven on the way to the phone, as you'll see at lower left. This is the side wall that faces the windows. At the phone counter, too, countless monthly chores check off. The counter of white satiny plastic here, as in the rest of the room, is soft to the eye and strong on wearability. Use it for gift wrapping, toy mending, party planning, cake decorating, or setting out desserts for service to the dining room. A swivel-wheeled table fits under the counter for wheeling late refreshments to the lamplit terraces outside. The family bulletin board above is cork that comes precolored, soft gray-blue for this room, with white shelves carpentered around it. Along same wall is a tall cleaning cupboard at right of the oven, and beyond that a garage for the mixer. This ingenious little home is a panel that swings right out of the wall when mixer is needed, swings it back out of the way and free of dust when its work is over.

● Even the two far ends of the room, near the garage entry, are put to use. ● Lined up on one wall is a complete laundry, a washer and dryer in soft glossy yellow with all dials out of children's reach, and above the appliances a soap shelf with its perforated panels enameled in blue, yellow and red. The washer can soothe even temperamental synthetics with cool waters and slow spinning time. The dryer is an extra-speed gas model. ● Across the room is the breakfast counter. Under it you see a wide clay-tile footrest for absolute comfort, scuff-free too. The same tiles, soft blue-gray, 2″x4″ size, make a basket-weave pattern for a long-wearing kitchen floor. Nothing was forgotten. There is even a file under the breakfast counter for the morning newspaper—just one reason why people enjoy themselves in this room.

Open cabinets show slide-out comfort.

and there are two more whole levels to grow on—

MORE PLEASURES IN THE JOURNAL'S HOUSE WITH ROOM TO GROW

While children are still too young for rooms of their own, whole space can be turned into a family room.

UPSTAIRS

Cork-floored rooms on the upper story are natural havens where teens or their adult relations can get away from it all. Good books and soft music are built into the walls. Plan takes complete advantage of knee walls on this level, which means that there is under-eave storage space accessible at either side of the room you see here. Both upstairs rooms are linked by a wide gallery hall and bath between, yet each can close off for complete privacy. Tall ceilings erase all stoop hazards, give imposing height for built-ins up and down the side walls.

Over the cork floor, inexpensive red cotton scatter rugs are the only carpeting needed, since noise is already baffled, a budget-saving note. Stanch plaid slip covers in marine white and blues can take teen buffeting and steady laundering without blanching. Matching curtains are brass-poled at the side window. Hanging lamps are frosted Venetian glass of tropical blue, make no demands on floor space and are safely out of way of games. For teen rooms, we like foamy floor cushions that tuck into plastic envelopes and withstand moccasin heel and toe marks. On studio beds that fit under bookshelves, smaller-cousin pillows of foam are covered in cottons and sailcloths. The big white circle table at center is plastic with all the durability of marble at a third the cost. At the far end of the room television and phonograph are built in under record racks, and consider here the excellent disguise possibilities for old sets the family below has outgrown. White wood storage wall gives a gleaming newness, can hide the motley souvenirs of high-school years, schoolbooks and diaries, sewing equipment, photograph albums, address and year books, and eliminate the whole problem of disordered student rooms. The privacy floor itself is an incentive to good order, serving as drawing room and entertaining center for its inhabitants. And both upstairs rooms have a steady future, doubling as guest rooms for family and friends.

DOWNSTAIRS

The full basement is a perfect under-cover spot for small children's play. And it safely houses the comfort-giving utility equipment of the home. A compact air conditioner stands in the background (its condenser unit is concealed in shrubbery out in the service court), supplies clean and filtered air, is controlled by thermostats that automatically set warmth in winter and coolness in summer. This installation can be used even in locations which limit use of water. And it's good news for home builders faced with budgets that the heating unit can go in first—cooling section can be added later with no major changes. (If you plan it this way, be sure to have original ducts sized for the future.) Automatic gas water heater is the tall cylinder in front of it, guaranteeing a steady supply for baths, dishwasher and laundry. The tall square unit beside it, a water softener, removes minerals that waste soap, clog pipes and make rings in tubs, and is another quiet work saver sending benefits upstairs all year. This tank has an electronic control that regenerates it when needed.

STUART-FOWLER

Basement holds all utility needs of house. Space remaining is big enough to build a boat in—or a dollhouse.

Once or twice a year, depending on how hard the water is originally, a fresh supply of salt will be needed. For a dustfree basement floor, we used cement enamel in grassy green. Walls were coated with white latex paint. Color coding makes ducts and pipes easier to identify.

The dollhouse, small-scale model of the house itself, was built for a toddler's rainy-day housekeeping play. Its size shows height and proportions of basement. All the rest of the room can grow with the family as woodworking area, hobby or game room, home-style gym, table-tennis-tournament center, garage for toys, vast storage for family treasures, or indoor dance and barbecue room. The final picture—yours.

If you counted with us, you'll find a hundred and more ways to enjoy life in a house plan like this.

Liane Waite's husband, Ralph, has cooked since his bachelor days. First home, he starts dinner. Who wouldn't want to sit down to Ralph's beef stew with "slumgum" noodles? Generous, tender nuggets of beef in a spicy tomato sauce and homemade noodles to sop up the succulent juices. Carrots and peas ring the platter, and avocado-and-grapefruit salad makes just the right finishing touch.

"We've always enjoyed cooking together. Ralph gets home earlier than I do and starts things rolling." LIANE WAITE

Ralph Waite is an all-out cook. "No short cuts for him," Liane reports. "Most of his specialties are of the long, slow-cooking variety—baked beans, stews, lasagne, and so on. One Saturday we devoted the entire day to making lasagne. First we shopped in all the Italian stores and brought home enough groceries to feed twenty people. The cooking took the rest of the day."

Like most men shoppers we know, Ralph frequently gets lost at the delicacy counter when he occasionally accompanies Liane. As Liane says, practically, "I buy the staples, the meat, vegetables and other important things, leaving Ralph free to poke around the rest of the market. I've often left the store to do other shopping, come back to find him still reading the sardine labels." As in many households where both husband and wife work, week-night dinners would be much later than they are if Ralph didn't enjoy cooking. He has things well started when Liane gets home at six. A favorite meal revolves around his delectable beef stew with homemade noodles which he calls "slumgums."

Slumgum Beef Stew ▪ Any Green Vegetable
Grapefruit-and-Avocado Salad • Coffee

Dessert is skipped with dinner. After the dishes are done—about ten in the evening—they enjoy a sweet nibble, cookies or cake with a second cup of coffee.

Slumgum Beef Stew. Dredge 3 pounds top round cut into ½″ cubes in well-seasoned flour. Brown in a heavy kettle on all sides in a little shortening or salad oil. Remove the meat from the pan and add 2 minced onions and ¼ cup minced green pepper. Cook until tender. Re-add the meat and 1 No. 2 can tomatoes, ½ cup condensed onion soup and ½ can tomato paste. Season with 1 clove garlic, crushed, and ½ teaspoon each salt, basil, orégano and chili powder. Add a pinch of crushed chili pepper. Cover and simmer for 3 hours or until the meat is tender. Thicken the stew if needed by adding a little flour paste. Makes 6–8 servings. Serve with "slumgums."

Slumgums. Mix together 1 egg, ⅔ cup flour and ½ teaspoon salt. Turn out onto a pastry cloth and knead until quite springy. Wrap well in aluminum foil and allow to stand ½ hour. Roll quite thin on a pastry cloth and let stand about an hour to dry slightly. Cut into 1″ strips about 2½″–3″ long. Cut a slit down the center of each and turn one end through the slit. Drop the noodles into a pot of boiling, salted water and cook until tender. Drain.

A recent survey of 700 men from all parts of the country turned up the evidence that 71 per cent of this number cook at one time or another. We discovered that husbands of three JOURNAL editors do all or most of the cooking. One male JOURNAL editor cooks on occasion.

There's a man

STUART

When Abbot Mills gets in the kitchen to make his sizzling-hot sauce and Hopped-Up Chicken, Jody moves out so he can be as lavish with seasonings as he pleases. Both blend into a divine dinner with a hot vegetable, salad and fresh fruit.

"Abbot is a soup, sauce and meat man. He is more the executive-type cook. He gives the orders and likes everything done just right—is really very neat and orderly when he cooks." JODY MILLS

Abbot and Jody have come a long way in matters culinary since they were married. Neither one had ever cooked before. "We learned together," Jody reports. "Scrambled eggs were our limit at first. I cook with the least amount of effort. Abbot likes to fuss."

"I prefer to be in the kitchen alone when I cook," Abbot confides. "I enjoy fussing around with herbs and spices—like to experiment with flavors. I go down the line on the spice shelf and keep adding things until it tastes just right. If Jody is in the kitchen, she is apt to stop me because the children don't care for such highly seasoned food. But if we are having company she lets me go to it." Two excellent results of Abbot's "fussing" are his sizzling-hot sauce and what he calls "hopped-up chicken." They fit into their favorite menu nicely.

Sizzling-Hot Sauce for Raw Vegetables ▪ Hopped-Up Chicken
Green Beans—Baked Potatoes ▪ Chocolate Lime Pie • Coffee

Sizzling-Hot Sauce. Mix together ⅔ cup catchup and 1 can anchovy fillets, chopped. Use the oil and all. Season with ⅛ teaspoon cayenne, ¼ teaspoon celery salt and ¼ teaspoon garlic powder. Stir until all is blended. Chill and serve with cooked shrimp, raw-vegetable sticks or hot sausages.

Hopped-Up Chicken. Remove skin from 4 chicken breasts and 4 thighs. (You may use the thawed, frozen kind.) Skinning the chicken permits the seasonings to get to the meat more thoroughly. Mix together 1 tablespoon salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper, 1 teaspoon each of the following herbs: rosemary, marjoram and orégano. Sprinkle over the pieces of chicken. Sauté the chicken in a little butter until golden brown. Add ¼ cup lemon juice, ⅔ cup canned chicken broth or, if you prefer, white wine. Cover and simmer until tender. Makes 6 servings. Serve hot or cold.

"Johnny's Shrimp Marinara is his best dish," Nora says, "though his curries are good too." Young Steve, just home from Scout meeting, watches with fascination as his father seasons his specialty, which he serves with rice and a salad. The fruit dessert is Nora's department.

"Johnny cooks the main dish—I help with sauces and desserts." NORA O'LEARY SMITH

Johnny and Nora Smith cook dinner more or less as a team. Nora gets the dinner for their three children when she gets home from the office. Johnny and Nora cook and dine later, after the three children are bedded down for the night. Johnny loves to try new recipes. Like Mary Lea, Nora comes in on the KP end of the meal. "Johnny uses many, many pots and pans when he cooks, but he likes a clean place to work—that's where I come in! Our best recipes," Nora explains, "have evolved from good things we have tasted in restaurants. Johnny has a way of wangling the know-how from either the chefs or the waiters. Our favorite meal is evidence of this. The cheese-pie appetizer came from a little Swiss restaurant—the shrimp marinara from an Italian one. I like fresh fruit for dessert—and since dessert is my department, that's what we have." Thus the pet Smith menu evolves into:

Cheese Tart as an Appetizer (only if there is to be company)
Shrimp Marinara with Rice • Green Salad with French Dressing
Fresh Fruit • Coffee

Cheese Tart. If guests are invited, Johnny makes his pie the night before so it may be served cold in slim wedges. Make enough pastry for a one-crust 9″ pie. Line piepan with pastry, crimp edges, and so on. Toss ¼ pound Swiss cheese, grated, and ¼ pound Gruyère cheese, grated, with 1 tablespoon flour. Sprinkle over the bottom of the pie shell. Peel and slice 2 medium onions thinly, separating them into rings. Arrange over the cheese. Mix 3 well-beaten eggs with ½ cup light cream, ½ cup milk, ¼ teaspoon each salt and pepper. Pour over cheese and onions. Sprinkle with ¼ teaspoon nutmeg and bake in a hot oven, 400° F., for 15 minutes. Reduce heat to moderately low, 325° F., and bake 30 minutes more. Serves 8–12.

Shrimp Marinara. Sauté 2 onions, minced, in 6 tablespoons olive oil. Olive oil is essential for the true Italian flavor. Add 1 No. 2½ can tomatoes. Johnny uses the canned, peeled Italian tomatoes and breaks them up with his fingers before adding to the pan. Add 1 cup tomato sauce. Season with 1¼ teaspoons salt, 2 teaspoons orégano, ½ teaspoon basil, ½ teaspoon monosodium glutamate and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Cover and simmer for 20 minutes. Add 1½ pounds cooked, cleaned shrimp (3 pounds unshelled), simmer another 10 minutes or so. Serve with rice. Makes 4 servings.

DI PIETRO

Tim Page is a meat cook par excellence. His roast beef is pink to the edges and gives tender, juicy slices every time. With it he serves a zesty horseradish sauce and a vegetable casserole of his own design—green beans in a mushroom sauce topped with crisp, French-fried onion rings.

"I'm the carrot scraper and the washer-upper. Tim does all the cooking." MARY LEA PAGE

Tim Page, Mary Lea's husband, has done the cooking ever since they were married Though he was never able to interest Mary Lea in the art, their married daughter is a fine cook, trained by her father.

Tim and Mary Lea's kitchen in their new home is a model of perfection—every detail planned just as they want it. Tim buys all the kitchen equipment. At Christmas he would rather have a kitchen gadget than a necktie. "We have a freezer so we can plan meals way ahead. But if we get up too high, we have to eat down." The Pages call their kind of eating, Mary Lea confides, "plain-elegant." Good-quality meat, fresh vegetables and a salad are the nucleus of their menus. They rarely have potatoes or a dessert, though Mary Lea occasionally makes an apricot or prune soufflé.

Mary Lea says she despairs of ever getting any of Tim's recipes on paper. "He fiddles with lots of little bottles. He cooks everything slowly, uses almost no water in cooking vegetables. People often drop in before dinner and it doesn't upset Tim a bit as things can easily wait.

"When we have guests we prefer to have a sit-down dinner. If we have over six I get in a helper, but she never has much to do before dinner other than make the butter balls. We've planned everything and Tim has everything started in the kitchen. He arranges the platters. At the end of the meal, I take over. We never let our guests in the kitchen."

So let's get on to Tim and Mary Lea's menu for a roast-beef dinner!

Tim's Roast Beef—Horse-Radish Sauce • Green-Bean Casserole
Salad Bowl—Croissants • Apricot Soufflé • Coffee

Tim's Roast Beef. Not all ovens go down as low as 200° F., but Tim likes to roast his at this temperature. Here's the way he does it: He buys a boned and rolled rib roast usually weighing anywhere from 4 to 8 pounds. Preheat oven to moderate, 350° F.; insert meat thermometer (he always uses one) in center of roast. Place roast in an open roasting pan. Season with salt and pepper. Add some chopped onion and ½ cup water to the pan. Turn down oven to 200° F. Put roast in oven. Allow 1 hour per pound. Keep your eye on the thermometer; toward the end of the roasting when the temperature reaches 135°–140° F. the meat is at the rare stage. The oven, at this point, if it is an electric one, as Tim's is, can be turned down to warm and the roast will remain hot for an hour or two. This allows plenty of time for delays.

Pan Gravy. Add a little water, steak sauce, salt and pepper and, if you like, red wine to taste to pan drippings. Bring to boil over direct heat. Skim off fat.

Horse-Radish Sauce. With the beef, Tim serves this sauce: Mix equal parts commercial sour cream and prepared horse-radish. Season with salt, pepper, chopped chives and Worcestershire sauce.

Green-Bean Casserole. For 6, cook 2 packages frozen green beans, French cut, according to package directions. Drain. Gently stir in 2 cans condensed cream-of-mushroom soup and, if you like, 2 tablespoons sherry. Pour into casserole. Sprinkle 1 can French-fried onions over the top. Bake, uncovered, in the oven with the roast about ½ hour. If you take the roast out ahead of time, turn oven up to 300° F. and bake 20 minutes.

The Hamburger, at Home, Abroad

FROM THE JOURNAL KITCHEN

STUART

Tiny meat balls sauced with sour cream and faintly flavored with herbs—the Swedish way.

The best things often come in little pieces as well as little packages, and beef—preferred stock in all the kitchens of the world—is no exception. As early as the eighth century, beef was being chopped by the fine Italian hand, and the medical men of that country were prescribing it as a sovereign remedy for the common cold. So popular has it been from that day on that it is to be marveled at that no one has recommended it for broken hearts.

Lasagne, or the Three Graces: In this dish, three choicest ingredients—cheese, pasta and hamburger—meet in a melting mood. Brown 1 pound crumbled hamburger in a skillet with 2 tablespoons salad oil and 2 cloves garlic, crushed. Add an 8-ounce can tomato sauce, a No. 2 can tomatoes, 1½ teaspoons salt, ½ teaspoon orégano and ¼ teaspoon pepper; cover and simmer 15 to 20 minutes. Meanwhile, cook ½ pound very broad—1½" wide—special lasagne noodles in boiling salted water until tender (about 15 minutes). Drain and rinse. Fill a rectangular casserole, if you have one—an oval one is almost as good—with alternate layers of the noodles, sliced Mozzarella cheese (you'll need about ½ pound), ricotta cheese (you'll need about ¾ pound), tomato-meat sauce, grated Parmesan (you'll need, in all, about ½ cup), ending with a layer of sauce and Parmesan. (These Italian cheeses are available in chain stores throughout the country, but if you can't get them, two other very mild cheeses, like Swiss Gruyère and cottage, for instance, will turn the trick.) Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 15 to 20 minutes. It might well have been of this the sirens sang.

Italian Risotto with Sausageburger Topping: Although beef and potatoes are almost as inseparable as Jack Benny and his violin, the possibilities of rice and hamburger are not to be ignored. Take 1 pound hamburger, add 1 hot Italian sausage, very finely chopped or ground, 1 egg, slightly beaten, 1 cup fresh bread crumbs soaked in ½ cup milk and squeezed dry, 1 clove garlic, crushed, 1 teaspoon salt and 1 small onion, chopped and sautéed in 2 tablespoons butter, and make into tiny meat balls. Brown quickly in olive oil, and serve atop your favorite risotto. Or, if you prefer, they will also grace the appetizer tray as hot hors d'oeuvres—with red, green and white tooth picks.

Flemish Carbonnade: In Flanders fields the poppies stood—and also, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the Spanish. This combination of cultures produced a distinguished stew. Forward! Take 1 pound ground round steak and brown in 3 tablespoons butter. Core and peel 2 tomatoes. Cut them into quarters and add to the meat along with 1 large onion, cut into rings, 1 clove garlic, crushed, and ½ cup canned, whole or sliced mushrooms. Brown and cook until the tomatoes are tender. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, ¾ teaspoon brown sugar, ½ teaspoon seasoned salt, ¼ teaspoon saffron, and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Add 1 cup cooked rice, a 10-ounce can whole-kernel corn, ½ cup finely sliced green pepper and a 10½-ounce can beef consommé. Cover and simmer about 10 minutes. Serve at once.

Spanish Picadillo a la Catalana: Not to be confused with peccadillo, or small fault, for this is a great Mediterranean dish. Take 1 pound ground round steak and brown it in 3 tablespoons butter. Add 1 onion, chopped, and brown this also. Coarsely chop ½ cup pitted ripe olives and add to the meat along with ½ cup canned or cooked garbanzos, or chick peas, ½ cup seedless raisins and 2 cups tomato juice. Season with 1 teaspoon each salt and monosodium glutamate, ¼ teaspoon each thyme and marjoram, and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Simmer gently until heated through. If it is not moist enough, add ¼ cup water.

Swedish Meat Balls in Sour Cream Sauce: If the sirens sang of lasagne, perhaps the Swedish nightingale had this dish in mind. (Why not? Caruso was inspired by spaghetti.) Soak 2 cups bread cubes in ½ cup milk. Squeeze dry and add to 1½ pounds ground beef. Add 1 onion, finely chopped and sautéed in 2 tablespoons butter, 2½ teaspoons salt, 2 teaspoons nutmeg, 2 teaspoons paprika, 1 teaspoon dried mixed herbs, 1 teaspoon dry mustard, ¼ teaspoon pepper and 3 beaten eggs. Mix well and form into 48 small balls. Brown in a skillet, using ¼ cup butter. Add ¼ teaspoon crushed garlic and 1 more tablespoon butter if needed. Blend in 4 tablespoons flour, 2 teaspoons tomato paste, 1 teaspoon beef concentrate, 2 cups bouillon made from 1 can bouillon with enough water added to measure 2 cups. Stir over low heat until sauce is thickened. Just before serving, stir in 1 cup thick commercial sour cream. Blend well, heat and serve with buttered noodles.

English Beef-and-Bacon Loaf: One beefeater at least has described bacon as "the food of kings"; together, washed with mushroom sauce, beef and bacon make a royal dish. Mix together in a large bowl 1½ pounds ground beef, ¼ cup milk, 1½ cups soft bread crumbs, ¼ cup chili sauce, 3 tablespoons Worcestershire sauce, 1 unbeaten egg, 5 slices bacon, cooked and crumbled, 3 tablespoons finely chopped onion, 1½ teaspoons salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper and ¼ teaspoon thyme. Pack into a 9"x5"x3" loaf pan. Lay raw bacon slices over the top. Bake 1 hour in a moderate oven, 350° F. Serve with mushroom sauce. Mushroom Sauce: Season 1 cup thin cream sauce with ½ teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon paprika, ½ small clove garlic, crushed, and 1 beef-bouillon cube dissolved in 2 tablespoons hot water. Add ¼ pound chopped mushrooms which have been sautéed in 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Simmer 5 minutes, stirring constantly. Lavish on the loaf.

Stuffed Mushrooms Italienne: "Mushrooms: capital thing!" says Dickens; and indeed their magical culinary properties are celebrated the world over. The zesty ground-beef filling makes these extra special. Wash and peel—if you must—about 3 dozen large, firm mushrooms, and separate the stems from the caps. Chop the stems and sauté them for 5 minutes in ⅓ cup butter. Add 1½ pounds finely ground raw beef, 7 fillets of anchovy, chopped, 3 cloves garlic, mashed to a pulp, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley, ¼ teaspoon Nepaul or red pepper and a little salt (the anchovies are very salty). Pile the mushroom caps high with this mixture, put a few drops of wine vinegar on each, sprinkle with bread crumbs and dot with butter. Into a shallow baking pan put 2 tablespoons each of water and olive oil and arrange the caps in it. Bake in a fairly hot oven, about 425° F., for 15 minutes, then brown a few minutes under the broiler.

Hungarian Stuffed Cabbage Rolls: "High deeds in Hungary to pass all men's believing": Parboil 8 to 10 large outer leaves of cabbage 5 minutes, just long enough to wilt them. Also cook ⅓ cup washed rice until tender. Drain. Mix ½ pound ground beef and ½ pound ground pork. Season with ½ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon thyme and a dash or two of pepper. Add the rice, 1 large onion, minced, and 1 beaten egg. Mix well. Shape into 8 to 10 small rolls. Wrap each in a cabbage leaf and tie securely with string. String holds them together better than toothpicks. Put in a skillet with 1 cup tomato juice, 1 cup water, 1 tablespoon meat paste or powder or 3 bouillon cubes. Add 1 tablespoon shortening, 1 onion, chopped, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley and a little salt. Cover and simmer 1 hour. Turn rolls occasionally. Taste sauce for seasoning, then thicken sauce slightly with a little flour-and-water paste—about 1½ tablespoons flour blended smooth with cold water. Remove strings. Serve rolls with gravy poured over them. A "famous harmony of leaves."

The final word on hamburger is yet to be written, for ingenious and dedicated cooks will always be tempted to experiment and perfect new combinations of this ubiquitous blessing. Words, in fact, cannot do justice; and we close with Samuel Johnson's preface to his famous dictionary: "I am not so lost in lexicography as to forget that words are the daughters of earth, and that things are the sons of heaven." A thought most appropriate to our subject. Onward, fair readers! To market!

Can you always believe your eyes?

When watching feats of magic, you're almost inclined to believe what your eyes seem to see. In another and far more important way, you can be misled by your eyes . . . and not know it.

For example, some eye disorders develop so slowly that they are often not noticed in the beginning. In fact, the eyes may seem perfectly all right at the very time they are misleading you.

So, the best safeguard you can take against eye trouble that you may not suspect is to have your eyes—and those of each member of your family—examined periodically by specialists.

A child's eyes should be checked early in the pre-school years, before eye disorders can seriously hamper personality development or interfere with educational progress when he starts to school. Today, authorities estimate that about 9 million school children need some form of eye care.

Adults, especially after age 40, should have their eyes carefully examined at least every two years by an eye specialist. This is the surest way to guard against glaucoma and cataract, the two major threats to the sight of older people.

These eye examinations have an added value. They may lead to early diagnosis and control of diabetes, high blood pressure and hardening of the arteries. These diseases often cause changes in the eye's tiny blood vessels which the doctor can readily detect.

If you have been giving scant attention to your own or your child's eyes, here are some sight-saving tips to follow:

For the child's eyes—If a youngster needs glasses, ask about shatterproof lenses. Teach the child never to rub the eyes with dirty hands or cloths. In case of "sore eyes," avoid using any medicine or eye drops unless prescribed by the doctor.

For the adult's eyes—Rest your eyes frequently when reading or doing close work. Read with a good clear light falling from above and behind you. Use goggles or other eye-safety devices while you are doing jobs which might be hazardous to the eyes.

Progress in sight-saving—The antibiotic drugs work wonders in many eye infections, and the new hormone compounds save sight in some eyes which would be doomed without them.

Moreover, glaucoma-blindness can be avoided in most cases when diagnosed early and treated properly. Sight lost due to cataracts can be restored by surgery in almost 90 percent of the cases.

Delicate surgical operations may also restore vision in some cases where the retina has become detached. It is now possible, too, to restore vision in certain kinds of cases, by transplanting the cornea from good to diseased eyes.

Medical progress in sight-saving is a great achievement. However, good sight throughout life depends largely on what you do to give your eyes the regular care they deserve.

Julia said, "Please, Mynheer," and turned to Marie. They embraced, with a warmth hitherto unknown in their relationship.

Mynheer Vosmar watched them with impatient tolerance and, as they exchanged some muddled promises about meeting soon, soon, he said, "Doubtless you will—unless this young lady is proceeding to Java."

They both spoke together: "I am—she is . . . Banda Neira."

"Then you will certainly meet—often," he said, but there was in his manner a contemptuous dismissal of Marie which Julia resented.

"There is my baggage, Mynheer," she said.

He dismissed that even more contemptuously. "That will be seen to."

The bone of his arm under her hand was sharp and frail, but his hand, as he helped her onto the ladder, had an astonishing strength and steadiness.

They took their places side by side on yellow silk cushions under the yellow awning; the boat's head swung round and they shot away over the silken water, leaving the curve of the harbor on their right.

"Well," said Mynheer Vosmar, and the single word had a note of accomplishment, of finality. After a moment's pause he began afresh. "I'm very glad to see you. I hope you'll be happy in Rua. My son—as I told you—was unable to meet you."

"I hope he is not ill," she told him. How perfunctorily polite it sounded in her ears.

"Thank you, no. His health is uniformly excellent. He had an accident a long time ago, and he is recovering, but slowly. He is . . . disabled. That is Rua," he said, pointing to what, at this distance, was no more than a flat dish, filled with feathery green.

"Rua," said Mynheer Vosmar, "is a small island, but a large plantation. My grandfather was producing nutmegs there when Banda was still in a state of chaos. And several times, when catastrophes of various kinds have befallen the Banda groves, they have been replenished by young stock from Rua. My grandfather had his own ships; but now that the Company is so—so active, I have given up the ships. Otherwise we remain a self-contained community. We even have cows in Rua."

"Is that very unusual?"

"Most. In fact, it is singular. Cows need pasture, you see. On Banda, Lonthoir and Api even gardens are rare and regarded as an extravagance. Why grow a rose where one could grow a nutmeg? My gardens are very beautiful."

He chatted on and seemed content with her brief responses. As he talked she had an opportunity to study his face and attempt to guess from it something of his nature. It was not a genial face: his pale lips were thin and closely folded, his nose delicate, sharply hooked, an arrogant nose; but it was his eyes which drew and held her attention. They were very large and set far forward between fleshy lids: the prominent eyeballs were yellowish and veined with red, the irises a light, glassy gray. She thought suddenly that with his thin legs, his spare figure and huge eyes he was like an insect.

Perhaps she regarded him a trifle too openly, for presently he broke off his talk and shifted a little in his seat and looked at her searchingly.

"You look to be a sensible girl," he said. "I must confess that I had a moment —— The girl who was on the ship with you, to whom is she married?"

"Hendrik Oltman."

"Oh, yes. A stupid young man, breaking his back with a view to being agent one day. He never will!" In three words he banished the young man to perpetual obscurity. "Look, you can see the house now."

She had seen a white building, enormously long, single-storied, some moments before he drew her attention to it, and thought that it was a row of sheds or warehouses; it was like no house that she had ever seen before.

"That also is singular," said Mynheer with great complacency. "It was my grandfather's most original idea. You will find, when you visit in Banda, that the stupid stubborn Dutchmen build, in this climate, houses exactly like the ones they lived in—or admired from a distance—in Holland. They have bedrooms just under the roof, where it is hottest, and then complain that they cannot sleep! My grandfather had traveled a great deal and, when he built, combined most sensibly the principles of a native hut and a Spanish-Moorish house. Above us, between roof and ceiling we have ten feet of cool space, and nowhere is the house more than one room deep, so what air there is can blow through. I think you will soon become accustomed to the climate."

The island seemed to rush forward, and soon she could see the house in detail. It was thatched and the thatch jutted out far beyond the walls and was supported by pillars covered with creeping, flowering plants. Urns, set between the pillars, brimmed with flowers.

"It's very beautiful," Julia said.

He gave her a glance of approval. "I'm glad you think so. I do," he said.

The best reason for democracy, and the best reason for having faith in the freedom of learning and teaching which it fosters, is that in the long history of civilization humanity has proved stronger than hate, and falsehood less enduring than truth.

The boat ran in alongside a little stone jetty jutting out from the shore. And now, in just a minute ——

"Welcome to Rua," said Mynheer as he helped her from the boat. "You are shivering. I do assure you, you have no cause for nervousness. None at all."

He took her elbow in his firm grasp and led her along the stone path, flanked with smooth greensward, and up the steps of the veranda.

"It faces west," he said, "and it is very pleasant to sit here and watch the sun set over the water."

The entrance to the house was through an archway, and there was no door in the ordinary sense; two gates of fine wrought-iron work which, when closed, would fill the archway were flung back against the walls. Within was a large, stone-paved hall, unfurnished save for a few silky rugs, some statues on pedestals and several small flowering trees growing in huge pots of gaily painted pottery. Later on she was to appreciate the beauty of it all, but at the moment apprehension filled her.

Mynheer Vosmar guided her across the hall and out into a kind of stone cloister overlooking a garden brilliant with color. They turned right and passed at least a dozen doors before he halted and opened one.

"These," he said, "will be your own apartments and of course they must be furnished to your taste. I have merely provided what I thought you would need, and a few things that I hoped would please you. But you must ask for anything you want, anything you fancy."

She looked, without seeing anything, about the two rooms.

Mynheer Vosmar said peevishly, "Where is that —— Oh, there you are. This is Juno, whose sole duty will be to look after you."

A handsome woman with a skin like brown silk had entered. She carried a tray. Mynheer Vosmar inspected it critically and nodded.

"At midday we eat very sparingly and take our main meal in the cool of the day. You will find it advisable to rest afterward—I invariably do myself. I will see you again at four o'clock." He turned away. "Juno understands Dutch," he said, "and she knows her duties, but she is incorrigibly idle. You must keep her up to the mark." He went away.

See how your thirsty skin responds

This cream cleanses deep down...

But more...it replaces the vitalizing oils modern living drains away

Today's stepped-up living, authorities say, is robbing your skin of its natural beauty oils. Your skin today needs more than just deep cleansing to keep it soft and smooth.

Pond's Cold Cream goes deep down—cleanses every tiny pore opening. But even more—the rich oils in Pond's replace the skin's own lost beauty oils. Pond's brings back the moisture your skin needs to stay soft, smooth, elastic.

How modern living robs your skin of oil

Doctors say your skin is a sensitive barometer of your emotions. Every little strain and frustration drains off your skin's natural beauty-giving fluids—leaves your skin dry and drawn. By evening, your skin needs Pond's to replace beauty oils and plump up skin tissues.

And there's a long list of other robbers that steal beauty oils. Today's low-fat slimming diets, sun, wind and drying liquid cleansers . . . each can take its toll. Each makes your skin more thirsty for the beauty that is waiting in Pond's Cold Cream.

Actually puts beauty in Pond's actually puts new beauty into your skin in 37 seconds. It acts so swiftly because your tired skin is literally waiting for it . . . thirsty for the oils it provides.

Can Pond's work this magic for you?

Fortunately, it's easy to find out for yourself. In just 37 seconds—the time it takes you to put it on—you can feel your skin's eager response—feel it smooth out and soften. And day after day as you use Pond's you'll see your skin become clearer, fresher, far lovelier than it's ever been. The sooner you start, the lovelier you'll look a week from today.

"Is hot now, Mevrouw, please," Juno said in a soft, sibilant voice, indicating a teapot that stood on the tray. "Why I am not here—see you come, go make tea hot."

"I should like some tea." She went toward the table and Juno pulled a chair a little way out, and poured the tea. The tray was laden; there were meat, sliced very thin, a green salad, some strange but delicious-looking fruit, tiny bread rolls, fresh butter. But she could eat nothing; even the tea, delicious and fragrant, went down with difficulty.

It was impossible to sit still. She put down the cup and stood up.

"You do not like?" Juno asked humbly. "Other things. Much other. I fetch?"

"Oh, no, thank you. It's all very nice. I'm not hungry now."

"Mevrouw wish to sleep?"

"I couldn't." Even the sense of being watched irked her and she walked restlessly from the sitting room to the bedroom beyond. The rooms communicated by an arch hung with silk curtains, yellow, with white dragons. Each room looked out upon one side to the veranda, upon the other to the cloister and the garden beyond; the windows had no glass, only screens of that same fine ironwork. Even at this, the hottest part of the day, the air flow and the white walls contributed to an impression of coolness.

Suddenly she noticed, standing alone and looking oddly out of place in the luxurious bedroom, her own small trunk. There was a job for Juno. She called her.

"You could unpack for me, and spread out my other dress to get rid of the creases."

"Mevrouw has many dresses."

"This and one other." And the other was her wedding dress.

"Many. Please, many dresses." Juno opened a door and showed a cupboard which might have held a rainbow; five or six dresses in different shades of color hung there.

"Not finished," Juno explained. "I make fit. Wear today."

Just for a moment her mood lightened. The provision of the dresses showed a kindly forethought—and her welcome, though strange, had been kindly too. She hadn't had a new dress since her twelfth birthday, except for the wedding dress, and that was now seven months old.

"Which one shall I try first?"

Juno put out a diffident finger and just touched a yellow dress. "Is Vosmar color. Mynheer has fondness that color."

It was a chance to slip in a question.

"And the young Mynheer, Mynheer Pieter; what color does he like?"

"Mynheer Pieter very sick."

"I know. How sick?"

Juno rolled her fine black eyes, moved her brown hands, alongside but not touching her own head. "Sick, all sick," she said.

"But he might like one color more than another."

Juno found the perfect answer. "Mynheer Pieter like what Mynheer like."

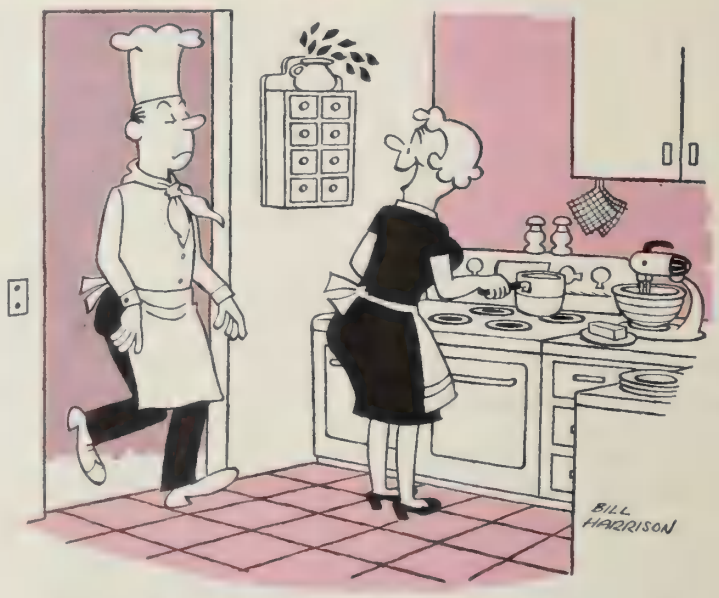
"Then I'll try that one," Julia said.

She always remembered that instance of her father-in-law's passion for detail. He had prepared a wardrobe for an unknown woman; how tall, how plump or slender she was and what her coloring would be, he could not know; so there they were, in many colorings, with the lace ruffles stitched in, the eyelet holes worked for the lacings, the embroidery bright on the skirts, but the hems were not turned up and the side seams not stitched. An hour's work would have made any one of those dresses fit any Company's Daughter.

When the dress was fitted, Juno said, "Mevrouw sleep now?"

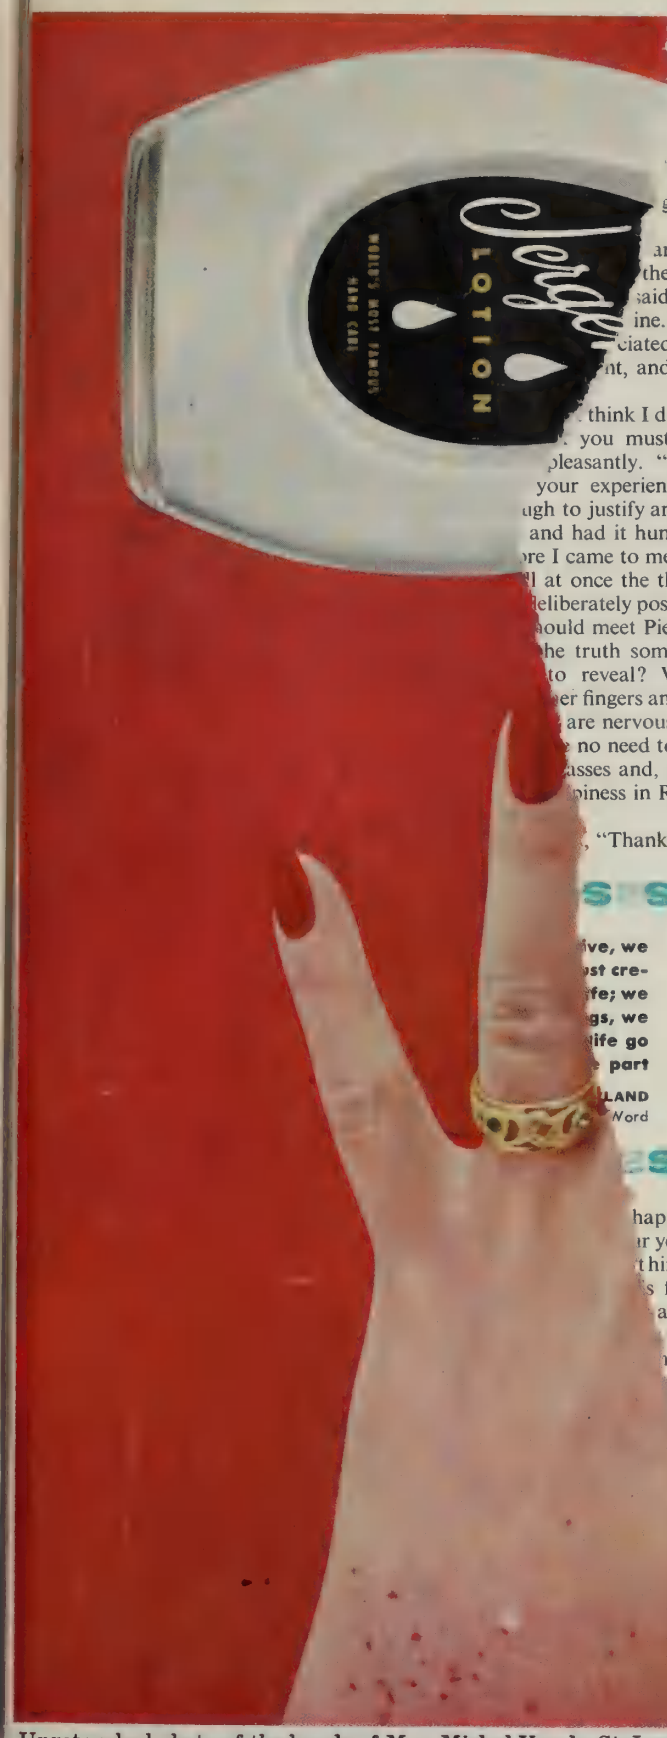
But it would be impossible to lie down and be still, and think, and wonder, and surmise.

"Mevrouw like bath?" Answering the questioning look, Juno laid the dress aside and opened another door. It opened onto a small square room lined entirely with marble, with an oblong bath sunk into its floor. Some tall white jars with double handles stood on its edge. "Mevrouw go there. I fetch water and pour," Juno explained.



"When the dress is ready," Julia said. "Now I'm going in the garden."

"Much hot. In shade, please, Mevrouw."



Mynheer's pride in his garden was justified: it had been carefully planned so as to seem larger than it was; bright, tough-foliaged native flowers, whose names Julia did not know, grew in open beds that looked like strips of embroidery; roses and lilies were cunningly placed so that they were tree-shaded at noon. In one corner a little artificial mound had been made: on its summit was a seat, shaded by a tree whose branches had been trained over it; when you sat there and looked straight ahead you saw nothing but a mass of shrubs and great clusters of blossoms in pink and purple, and beyond them the sea, intensely blue.

Julia sat on the seat and pondered the "disabled" of Mynheer, the "very sick" of Juno, and began to visualize a gentle invalid, confined to a chair, a man who might, perhaps, make no demand upon his wife except that she be a companion to him. She thought of Mevrouw Helmers' insistence that every girl who had the slightest capacity for it should learn to play chess and backgammon, and she thought how strange it would be if, after all her fears, she should find that there was nothing to fear at all. She knew, from the intimate talks which the long weeks aboard ship had forced upon them, that Marie—indeed, perhaps most girls—would little relish the idea of an invalid husband. But it would just suit me, she thought.

She had seen that face, or rather that kind of face, before: on a little girl who lived in the Hoogenstrasse, a beautifully dressed little girl who never played with other children and never went out alone. ("Fourteen years old, the poor creature, and her mind like a baby's," Anna had said.)

She remembered this as she looked at the red, puffy face, with its blunt nose and small raw-rimmed eyes and loose damp mouth. She tried not to show anything of what she felt.

"Stand up," Mynheer Vosmar said. "I've brought someone to see you."

Clumsily, laboriously Pieter rose, turned himself about and with the air of one who makes a tremendous effort held out his hand.

"Good morning," he said. He spoke indistinctly, in a thick, flannelly voice. But his face creased into the caricature of a smile, and taking his hand Julia felt her first revulsion melt into pity. She said:

"Good morning, Pieter. My name is Julia."

"Julie," he said; and again, trying it over, "Julie."

His hand seemed to have no bones, it lay in hers like a stuffed glove; yet it clung, and there was power in it. He pulled her to the table and pointed to a curious tangle of cane and dried grass with which he had been engaged.

"Oh, no, thank you. It's all very n not hungry now."

"Mevrouw wish to sleep?"

"I couldn't." Even the sense of be watched irked her and she walked restless from the sitting room to the bedroom beyond. The faint hope reawakened her apprehension and she could no longer sit still. She walked to the bounds of the garden on that side. It ended in a wall which curved round and made a kind of enclosure against the side of the house. Flowering trees lifted their heads above the wall, so there was evidently another garden within, but it was not to be reached from without. She turned back and went into the house.

At four o'clock she was ready, bathed and dressed, her hair smoothly curled by Juno's expert hands. She looked, she knew, her very best; and Mynheer Vosmar, coming for her punctually at the hour, surveyed her with grave approval.

"I am glad you chose that dress," he said. "It is my favorite color. Now, if you are ready ——" He offered her his arm again.

For the last time she braced herself. In a few minutes she would meet the man with whose life hers would be linked until death severed the bond; she would know the worst—or the best—of all she had feared and hoped.

But, once again, the critical moment was to be deferred. Instead of taking her directly to her husband, Mynheer Vosmar embarked upon a leisurely tour of the house, explaining its peculiarities and virtues as they moved from room to room.

The house covered a good deal of ground, being, as he had said, only one room deep anywhere; every room looked out onto the veranda at the front and onto the cloisterlike passage at the rear. Coolness and airiness had been the aim; all the walls were white, the floors of stone or tiles or bare polished wood.

"The folly of some settlers is quite unbelievable," Mynheer said. "You'll see houses made stifling with rugs and curtains and glass windows. And young women still arrive with feather beds and pillows as part of their dower. The resultant heat rash they blame upon the climate, poor fools!" He paused by a cushioned chair and thumped it. "Stuffed with raw cotton," he said complacently.

In order to stay young and active, we must find new interests, we must create within ourselves a love of life; we must be willing to try new things, we must not be content to watch life go by; we must be willing to take part in it.

CLARA MAY ROWLAND
Daily Word

He threw open another door and said, "This is the salon. A beautiful room, I think. Too little used, of late; but now we have a lady in the house again, things will be different."

Julia stared around, momentarily forgetful of everything save what she saw. The salon was beautiful—and it was magnificent too. The walls and the high-arched ceiling were white, the floor black and highly polished, and everything in the room was black and scarlet and gold. Facing each other from opposite sides were two identical pieces of furniture, the like of which she had never seen before, huge scarlet cupboards standing upon golden pillars, and topped by golden domes, and decorated, all over, with entrancing pictures in black and gold, pictures of birds and butterflies and flowers and twisted trees.

"You are admiring the cabinets," Mynheer Vosmar said in a satisfied voice. "They came from China. China is supposed to be the closed land, they boast that nothing goes in and nothing comes out—but my father obtained these, many years ago." He opened one of the doors and showed the arrangement of little drawers, all painted, and the arched recesses. "Do you play chess?" he asked.

"A little. Mevrouw Helmers taught us—just the rudiments. I'm not very good at it."

"You and I must play," he said. "I'm not very good either. I've had no one with whom to play . . . for many years."

Her latest mental image of Pieter quivered and vanished.

They came at last to a door at the end of the cloister. Ahead of them, just beyond the door, a wall ran out at right angles, ten or twelve feet high and thickly covered by masses of climbing flowers, pink and purple, rose-colored and white.

"Joshua's trumpet," said Mynheer, seeing her admiring stare. He opened the door. "This is my library," he said. One side of it was lined with shelves, filled with books. She had never imagined that there were so many books in the world, let alone in one man's possession. Under the window at the veranda end were a big desk and a chair. There were other chairs, more comfortable, and several low tables, upon one of which was a tray bearing a bottle and two tall fluted glasses.

Mynheer Vosmar pulled forward a chair. "At this time of the day I find a glass of wine agreeable," he said. "Well cooled, that is. I hope you like wine."

It was associated with Mynheer Dekker's announcement, and the gloves, and a feeling of nausea.

"I don't think I do, Mynheer."

"Then you must learn to," he said, but quite pleasantly. "I should hardly imagine that your experience of good wine is wide enough to justify an opinion. I chose this for you and had it hung down the well, to cool, before I came to meet you."

All at once the thought struck her that he was deliberately postponing the moment when she should meet Pieter. Was he nervous too? Was the truth something that even he hesitated to reveal? Without knowing it she linked her fingers and kneaded them.

"You are nervous," he said. "I assure you, you have no need to be." He handed her one of the glasses and, raising his own, said, "To your happiness in Rua." He took a little formal sip.

She said, "Thank you, Mynheer."

"One thing will be lacking," he said. "How much or how little that will matter to you I do not know." His bulging, glassy gray eyes looked over her speculatively, and to cover her embarrassment she lifted her glass. The wine was light and cool and fragrant, almost flowery. "I told you," he said, "that my son had an accident. It happened eighteen years ago, when he was four years old. He had a careless nurse, and she left him alone. He fell." A change took place in his face as he spoke; his eyes bulged even more and reddened, and she was suddenly conscious of his teeth behind his thin lips. "He bruised his brain, and it has never healed. You must understand that anything resembling normal married life is quite out of the question." He looked at her with a faintly challenging air and waited for her to speak.

For a moment she could not do so; she was so much relieved, and at the same time obscurely ashamed of her relief. Finally she said in a stiff, prim little voice, "You have my sympathy, Mynheer. And he—I am sorry for him too."

He looked at her sharply, and with some surprise. "You may well, in course of time, become sorry for yourself," he told her. "You may think that I have brought you here under false pretenses. In that case, of course, you have no redress. But if you choose to be helpful and amenable you will find me . . . not ungrateful. That being understood, we may as well go in."

He rose and, to Julia's astonishment, took a bunch of keys from his pocket and went to the door which stood in the center of the book-lined wall. Opening it, he gestured to her to pass ahead of him into the room beyond.

It was a large, well-lighted, sparsely furnished room; and at a long solid table in the center two men were sitting, one with his back to the door, the other in profile. The one who had his back to her was, she judged, young; he had light brown hair, and wore a bright blue jacket; the other man, who rose as they entered, was older, heavily built, and wore dark clothes. His face was pallid, much lined, and jowly.

Mynheer Vosmar, having closed the door, stepped forward and took Julia by the elbow. He then said "Pieter" in a voice of peculiar clarity, as though addressing someone slightly deaf. Very slowly and clumsily, Pieter Vosmar looked round.

She had seen that face, or rather that kind of face, before: on a little girl who lived in the Hoogenstrasse, a beautifully dressed little girl who never played with other children and never went out alone. ("Fourteen years old, the poor creature, and her mind like a baby's," Anna had said.)

She remembered this as she looked at the red, puffy face, with its blunt nose and small raw-rimmed eyes and loose damp mouth. She tried not to show anything of what she felt.

"Stand up," Mynheer Vosmar said. "I've brought someone to see you."

Clumsily, laboriously Pieter rose, turned himself about and with the air of one who makes a tremendous effort held out his hand.

"Good morning," he said. He spoke indistinctly, in a thick, flannelly voice. But his face creased into the caricature of a smile, and taking his hand Julia felt her first revulsion melt into pity. She said:

"Good morning, Pieter. My name is Julia."

"Julie," he said; and again, trying it over, "Julie."

His hand seemed to have no bones, it lay in hers like a stuffed glove; yet it clung, and there was power in it. He pulled her to the table and pointed to a curious tangle of cane and dried grass with which he had been engaged.

"Nice," he said, "nice basket."

"A very nice basket," she said. "Very nice indeed." A piteous expression of pleasure dawned on his face. He pulled at her hand again.

"He won't hurt you," Mynheer Vosmar said.

"Oh, no, I know that," she said and allowed herself to be led across the room to where a clavichord stood open.

"Music," Pieter said.

"I'm sorry. I can't play."

"Perhaps someday you can learn a simple tune," said Mynheer. "He is very fond of music."

"I'll try," she promised. She looked out the window and noticed that it opened onto neither the veranda nor the cloister, but directly into a small walled garden. She had just time to see that before Pieter tugged her away again; this time toward an archway opposite the door by which they had entered.

Again Mynheer, watchful, reassuring, said, "I think he wants to show you his garden."

"It's all right. I'm not afraid," she said.

Beyond the archway was a bedroom of monastic austerity; from it an open doorway led into the little garden. Once there, Pieter dropped her hand and, moving very purposefully, went to a bush which bore large clusters of pink flowers.

"Pretty," he said.

She said, "Very pretty." And her throat ached with sadness because he, so grotesque and ugly, yet recognized beauty when he saw it.

He began to tear at the bush, grunting, and breathing hard as he bent and broke the tough, leathery stems from which the pink flowers sprang. She was aware that Mynheer Vosmar and the man—keeper, tutor, what did he call himself?—had followed and were standing in the doorway.

At last Pieter succeeded in ripping away a bunch of the flowers and, turning, held it out to her.

"Pretty," he said. "Pretty for"—he breathed hard—"Julie."

"Thank you, Pieter. Thank you very much."

It was the first time in all her life that anyone had given her a flower. She tucked it into the lacing of her bodice. Pieter gave a kind of caper and then lumbered over to the bush again and tore off another cluster.

Again she accepted it, saying, "Thank you," but holding it in her hand.

"Pretty," he insisted, "pretty for Julie," and looked at her anxiously. She realized that he wanted her to wear this offering too. She tried to push the second cluster into place beside the first, and Pieter gave his dreadful, pathetic smile and capered and lurched off again toward the flowering bush. . . . How many more?

Mynheer came to her rescue. "I think that will do for today," he said. "Daan, if you were to play that would distract him and we could slip away."

The man disappeared and within a few seconds the music rang out, masterfully and beautifully played. Pieter ceased his mangling of the bush, turned, and without a glance at his father or his wife blundered toward the clavichord.

"Come," said Mynheer.

As soon as they were back in the library Mynheer turned from her and walked to the window. She saw him put his hand over his mouth and grip his lower jaw. All at once the pity which, half an hour earlier, had been merely a matter of words sprang up in her, overruling all the other mingled emotions of the moment. She said nothing, but walking over to the bookshelves, studied the titles attentively.

After a moment he said, in a far more warm and friendly tone than any he had so far used, "You will excuse me, my dear. God knows I have had time to accustom myself. It was the occasion which made it seem less than usually tolerable. My only son . . . meeting his wife . . . for the first time. It should have been very different."

She did not know, at that moment, the reach and vastness of his pride in his family, in his name. She saw a rather frail-seeming elderly man grieving over his son's affliction.

THANKS, ANYWAY

Bubble gum under the pillow,
Cracker crumbs under the sheets,
Down near the foot is a rifle
And melted assortment of sweets.
Soldiers parading the blanket
Atop every book from the shelf . . .
Next time your dad's out of town, son,
I'd rather sleep by myself!

HUSBAND'S HOME-COMING

I scrubbed the kitchen floor today,
And washed the woodwork too.
I refereed the children's play
Until I'm black and blue.

I washed the clothes and baked a cake,
And cleaned the linen chest,
And now I'll just lie down and take
A little, teeny rest. . . .

That's just when you walk in and say,
"So this is what you do all day!"

MAMMA PSYCHOLOGY

To spank or not to spank becomes the question;
Perhaps it's more than any child deserves,
But when things pass the power of suggestion
A good hard swat is easy on the nerves!

"I'm very sorry," she said, "more for you than for Pieter. He seems quite happy."

Mynheer said, a trifle harshly, "He has no reason to be otherwise. You did very well. It must have been a considerable shock for you. But you need never again enter that room. He is not, I realize, a pleasant sight."

"Sad, but not unpleasant," she said, with a degree of firmness. "Unless my presence upsets him in any way, I should like to help to amuse him. He is gentle, and means well. I found him rather . . . touching."

Mynheer looked at her with an expression which she did not recognize as distaste. This product of an Amsterdam orphanage, this virtually nameless nobody had looked upon the heir to Rua and found him "touching." Now, surely, he had drained the last dreg of his degradation.

He said, "I'm sure that if you care to devote a little time to the poor boy Doctor Hootman will be very grateful. But don't look upon it as a duty. You were not brought here for Doctor Hootman's benefit."

That enabled her to ask the question which, from the moment when Pieter turned his head, had been nagging at her.

"Why was I brought here? I mean, Mynheer, you must have known—all along—that Pieter did not need a wife."

He did not immediately answer. He had turned from the window, and she from the bookshelves, and now they were facing each other across the room.

"That is a thing that you must understand," he said. "I have managed to conceal from the world, even from other branches of my own family, the extent and the nature of the damage sustained by Pieter when he had his accident. It has not always been easy. I have let it be known that he was disabled and disfigured and has become, of his own choice, a recluse. Obviously my only son, whatever his appearance, would be expected to marry one day. You are a pretty girl, and, which matters more, a presentable one. I shall be very proud to say, 'This is my daughter-in-law.' That will confound the gossiping fools. And if you prop up my story and play your part well, you will find me very grateful."

"I understand, Mynheer." She was on the point of adding that she already had cause to be grateful to him. But something checked her tongue. Partly it was the selfish caution inculcated by the years in the Klopstock Home. Partly it was a flash of unselfish insight. After all, it was only by the merest accident of chance that she, who did not wish to be married at all, had come here to be part of a marriage that was no marriage. Suppose it had been Marie, or any one of dozens of girls who really wanted a husband and a normal married life. . . . Mynheer had, quite obviously, given no thought to how the girl would feel. Let him be grateful! She said, "I shall always do my best to try to please you."

"Yes. I think you will. I think we shall get on very well together."

She remembered suddenly, and with great clarity, her interview with Mevrouw Helmers, and the kind, easy voice saying that God never made mistakes. Could it be, dare one for a moment believe it to be, true?

Doctor Hootman dined with Julia and Mynheer, and by the end of the meal she had formed the opinion that he was a sulky and unfriendly person.

Mynheer sat at the head of the table in a high-backed chair which did not match the others; Julia sat on his right hand, Doctor Hootman on his left, so they were face to face across the table. He did not speak a word to her, nor did he once smile, and when addressed by Mynheer answered in a brusque way which dismissed her first impression that he was in great awe of his employer.

Mynheer seemed unaware of any discordant note. He talked easily and well, and encouraged her to talk. He was—she was to learn—always at his best at table.

He told her the name of the main dish—ritzplatzen.

"We have it very often, but it has so many variations that I never tire of it. If, after a time, you do, my dear, you must say so."

THE GROWNUP'S HOUR

Between the winter and summer
When the mercury's starting to climb
Comes a stir in the year's occupation
That is known as "House-cleaning time."

I roll up my sleeves with a fervor,
And round up the brushes and brooms,
And out of the clouds of confusion
Emerge the immaculate rooms.

Oh, let me survey for a moment
The fruits of my labors, and then
I'll give the house back to the family
To mess up all over again.

A fortnight far from all the daily grind!
The second honeymoon we'd dreamed about!

She thought she would never tire of it; not only was it delicious, it was so nice to look at. It was served in a great number of very delicate china bowls of varying sizes. The largest bowl was full of rice; the smaller ones held eggs, meat, fish, vegetables and spicy preserves in a bewildering number. You helped yourself, Mynheer explained, to a mound of rice and then added whatever you fancied.

"Some of the side dishes will taste strange to you, but you will become accustomed to them in time. At least I hope so."

They were waited upon by a brown man, who looked, to Julia's unaccustomed eye, exactly like Juno, but male. His name was Pluto.

"My grandfather," Mynheer explained, "instituted the custom of naming all his house slaves after characters in mythology, and I adhered to it."

"With some strange results," said Doctor Hootman. "Cupid, for example."

Mynheer gave him a sharp look, but said agreeably, "That is so, but they are named as babies and who can tell what their looks will be later on?"

Pluto removed the last plates and then the glistening white tablecloth. Mevrouw Helmers, discoursing upon behavior, had spoken of gentlemen sitting over their wine, and of ladies retiring with promptitude. But Mynheer was speaking and he went on composedly. Pluto set the table again, with plates and with huge bowls piled with fruit, and with small bowls with water in them. Flower petals floated on the water.

Mynheer finished speaking, and Julia, following Mevrouw Helmers' instructions, said, "Mynheer, I will leave you."

"Oh, no," he said. "No formality when we are alone. I want to introduce you to some of our Rua fruits." He leaned forward and studied the bowls. "Pears, of course, you know. These are mangoes—I think myself the most delicious of all fruit: the peach, the nectarine and the apricot, all in one, with something in addition. And these, in Malabar, are called pala, but the African name is banana—they, I contend, are an acquired taste; I have never, myself, acquired it. This curious-looking thing is a pine-apple. May I prepare you a piece? At least an inch of its outside must be cut away."

She tried everything, and everything was delicious. Copying Mynheer, she dipped her fingers now and then into the flower-strewn water, which was delicately scented. Her sense of having come to a beautiful, comfortable, wonderful place grew and grew. She thought of her own room, the wide, silk-covered bed where she would sleep, alone, untroubled—for the first time in many months—by the thought of another bed, to be shared by "your husband." Oh, how soundly she would sleep tonight! Suddenly and, she felt, with an appalling lack of manners, she yawned.

"How inconsiderate I am," Mynheer said instantly. "You must be very tired after such a day. Allow me to take you to your room."

"I can find it myself, Mynheer."

"Very well. Juno will be there. Good night—Julia."

"Good night, Mynheer." She hesitated, looking toward Doctor Hootman, but he was rather ostentatiously giving his attention to the peeling of his fourth banana. And Mynheer was waiting, holding the door for her.

As she passed him she smiled and he said, almost fondly, "Good night, my dear. Sleep well."

He closed the door and, turning back into the room, looked at Doctor Hootman's back with a scowl. It was gone, however, by the time he had reached the table, and his tone was genial as he refilled his glass and said:

"You're in a peculiar mood this evening, Daan. What's the matter?"

Doctor Hootman raised his heavy eyes and, speaking deliberately, said, "In the comparatively humble station in which I was reared it was thought desirable that a man should be introduced to a woman before he engaged her in conversation."

"Did I omit to do that?" Mynheer said. "I apologize. I must confess I was very much preoccupied. I fully expected a scene, you know."

"All the same, I think that the owner of the menagerie, bringing a visitor into the cage, would have said, 'This is Doctor Hootman, who has charge of the wild beast.'"

"I find that a very offensive comparison."

"I found your behavior this afternoon very offensive."

"Daan, don't be silly. It was remiss of me, I admit; but think of the situation. I should never have thought you were so touchy."

Doctor Hootman hunched a heavy shoulder. "No. Dealing as you do, exclusively with slaves and sycophants, you are bound to become insensitive to other people's feelings. I am not your slave or your sycophant; merely a hireling. Hired to attend, control and as far as possible train your idiot son."

Mynheer Vosmar was not a man given to impulsive words or gestures, but he brought his hand down on the table with a smack which slopped the wine from the glasses.

"I will not have him called that! Idiots are born, not made. Pieter was like anybody else until that pig of a woman let him fall."

Doctor Hootman swallowed the last piece of banana, dipped his fingers and wiped them. "It pleases you to think so. But it isn't true. He was a born idiot; but since in the first few years of a child's life no great demand is made upon the intelligence, that fact escaped your notice. When you could no longer ignore it you seized upon the nearest excuse—a timely, trivial bump on the head. But that isn't true and nothing you can say or do can make it so."

It was one of those speeches, stating a truth too unpalatable to be accepted, which, aimed at a wider target, have often taken the speaker a long step toward martyrdom. Had Mynheer Vosmar been at that moment a mob, with many mouths, every one of them would have been open, yelling, "To the stake." His eyes did bulge and redden, but although he was angry his anger was not pure; it had an alloy of curiosity.

"What makes you say this now? Is it just a retaliation for my lapse of manners this afternoon, or something more?"

Before answering, Doctor Hootman lifted glass and sipped, swallowed, and sipped in.

"I was," he said, "annoyed this afternoon. l"—he shrugged again—"let that go. I had other reason for frank speaking. I agree h you that providing Pieter with a wife was ery pleasing little touch to the façade. And were fortunate—she seems sensible. But s my duty at this point to warn you."

"To warn me? What do you mean?"

"Shove them into bed together," Doctor otman said brutally, "and you'll have an ot grandchild on your hands."

"You've been with me for eight years," nheer said solemnly. "It doesn't seem pos- le that you can so entirely misjudge me. I er dreamed—I should no more think of oving them into bed together, as you term than I should think of—of . . . well, taking o into my own bed. You will never make believe that Pieter was a born idiot, but he n idiot now. The very idea is obscene. No, at I have in mind is something quite ferent. Shall I tell you?"

Doctor Hootman's expression, which had axed into relief, tightened again. He looked wn at his plate, and then up again, with a refully blank face which matched his care- s, "If you like."

"You've been in my confidence from the st," Mynheer said, "and you've done mar- ls for Pieter. Perhaps you should know what propose; it may make you feel a little less e a piece of furniture." His eyes twinkled. Listen," he said.

Around her, day by day, the new life fell to pattern. It was a life of unimaginable ease d luxury.

The day began early. At dawn the great ass tong-tong in the compound sounded the all to begin work. Mynheer always rose then nd went to the plantation. Julia, who often ipped out of bed and looked out the window o enjoy the sight of the dew-drenched garden, riped with sunshine and long shadows, ould see the spare, trim figure stepping cross the lawn.

Almost immediately Juno would come with beaker of cool sweet fruit juice and a pot of ea. In her soft velvet voice she would wish ulia good morning and inquire if she had slept ell, and what she would like for breakfast. hen she would vanish, to return with freshly undered linen, a smoothly ironed dress, lean shoes.

On most mornings, by the time she was ressed and had had breakfast, Mynheer was ack. During his first week on Rua he devoted what remained of the cool morning hours to howing her over the island.

The nutmeg trees grew in orderly groves all ver the island, and paths ran this way and hat through the green gloom.

"It's hardly likely that you would ever lose ourself," said Mynheer, "but if you should, lon't keep taking side turnings; keep straight n. Eventually all the main paths run out at the hore."

He enjoyed showing her things and explain- ng how the "nuts" were gathered, and dried n racks over slow fires, turned at regular inter- vals until the outer shells could be broken and stripped away; how every nutmeg must be plunged into a lime bath to be made sterile: the whole wealth and importance of the is- lands depended upon the monopoly, so no fer- tile nut must ever be shipped out. Julia watched and listened, hoping in time to know enough to be an acceptable companion to him.

Everywhere they went the slaves were work- ing and there was never any flurry when Myn- heer appeared. Rua was a well-run plantation. The slaves were of all colors, from dark black- ish brown to pale coffee color. There were, Mynheer explained, no Bandanese among them. The natives of this island group, having put up a fierce and bloody resistance to the white men, had then taken flight; what re- mained of them now lived on two small islands, keeping to their old tongue, plying their old crafts. "They were very fine people, the aristo- crats of the islands," said Mynheer; "they would not have made good slaves."

In one of the drying sheds Julia was sur- prised to see a white man armed with the overseers' cane. He was out of earshot, so she mentioned him and her surprise to Mynheer.

"If you were nearer to him you would see that he is not quite white, my dear. Very nearly, yes. His mother, I should say, had some white blood, and his father, I know, was a Dutchman. These things happen, you know." He gave her a little sideways glance. "Most regrettable, I agree. Such a thing has never happened in Rua."

"Why is he a slave, if his father was Dutch?"

"The child of a slave is a slave, my dear, whatever his color. This one—his name is Mercury—was one of a batch I bought some years ago. I tried him as a house slave—that is why he has a house slave's name—but it didn't do at all. His manners were bad, and he actually used to try on my clothes. I caught him at it, preening in front of my looking glass."

"What did you do?"

"Burned the clothes, of course, and de- graded him to plantation work. When he'd learned his lesson I made him overseer, and he is excellent. He hates everybody—which is a splendid thing for one in his position."

Despite the heat in the drying shed she was conscious of a little chill. In a few words, neither callous nor sentimental, Mynheer had told a tragic story. She cast another discreet glance at the subject of it. He had a fine pro- file, with a nose as arrogant as Mynheer's.

"What a sad story," she said.

"Yes. The least his father could have done—in my opinion—was to free him and have him taught a trade. But he shuffled off his responsibility and we can't alter that, can we? Come along, it is very warm here."

On another morning Mynheer said, "Now I will show you the compound. That is one place which I should wish you to avoid. Oh, not that there's any danger; but they are primitive and one has to allow them a certain freedom there. You might see some unedifying sights."

The compound lay, as nearly as she could judge, in the very center of the island. It consisted of a circle of small, low huts ringing a space of bare stamped earth in the middle of which was a well. A few immensely old or pregnant women were cooking on little fires outside the doors of the huts; a number of children, too small yet for work, were playing rather listlessly in the dust. Here, unlike other places which they had visited, their arrival did cause some disturbance. The women left their fires and stood up, the children ceased playing and huddled together.

"I don't often come here," Mynheer explained. "Fifteen years ago I had every hut burned, the whole compound dug over, tons of sand from the beach spread, two feet thick and stamped down, and these huts erected. But look at it now. Smell it!"

It reeked of too many people, too closely pressed together; wood smoke, the stink of the pan of rice that had boiled dry, the fat that had flamed, the dough that had gone sour, the sick baby, the burned rag—it was all there, intermingled with the overwhelming, main odor of human excreta. It was the smell of defeat too.

She looked at the children. All but one of them looked healthy enough, and some were quite beautiful. The one was a little boy, three, four years old, with sore eyes.

She said, "Mynheer, that little boy—Mevrouw Helmers, at the Company's Daughters' Home, told us how to make an ointment which she said would cure all sores. I have the recipe for it written in my book. May I try it on him?"

"Just a minute, my dear," he said. "Now that I am here, I must look in on Toeg. He was once one of my boatmen, and when we capsized in a sudden storm he saved my life. If he knew that I had been in the compound and not visited him I think his heart would break." He moved purposefully toward a hut and she went with him. "I think perhaps you had better stay outside," he said. "I don't know how far you are capable —— Toeg suffers, you see, from a very rare and—if you are capable of detachment—a very interesting disease; but it isn't pretty."

"What is the disease?"

"Nobody knows. It is called, for obvious reasons, elephantiasis," he told her. "Of course, if you could face it, a visit from you would be . . . I can hardly explain what it would mean to Toeg."

"Then I can face it," she said.

Ducking his head at the low doorway, Mynheer entered the hut and she followed him. Inside, seated on a wooden bench, was a tiny, shriveled brown man with gray-speckled hair. Laid out on a kind of low table in front of him was one enormous leg, larger, thicker, bigger round than the whole of his body.

As though from a great way off she heard Mynheer say, "Toeg, I've brought the young Mevrouw, Mynheer Pieter's Mevrouw, to see you."

A voice, so small, so thready as to be almost inaudible, said, "Greetings, Mevrouw. God is kind to let me see this day."

A small brown hand came out, and she put her own to it—just touching her finger tips, Toeg lifted it to his brow.

"They're looking after you properly?" Mynheer asked.

"In every way, Mynheer, your orders are obeyed."

"You get your meat?"

"Three times in every week."

"Splendid," said Mynheer briskly. "Keep that daughter-in-law of yours up to the mark, Toeg; and if you want anything, let me know." He smiled at the old man affectionately and they took their leave.

Outside, Mynheer said, "Now what were you saying? Oh, I remember. Sore eyes and ointment. The suggestion does you credit, my dear, but I'm afraid there's nothing you can do. Your ointment would do more harm than good."

"Mevrouw Helmers had great faith in it."

"Mevrouw Helmers probably knew more about ointment than about slaves. All these people are very mixed, races, religions, nonsensical observances." His voice hardened and his glassy eyes reddened. "I'll give you an example: that child may be Hindu, we have a few here; you put something greasy on his eyes—fat from a cow, sacred animal; his eyes may get better, they probably would, but his grandmother would fall and break both legs; his mother would miscarry and his father go blind; and who would be to blame? You and your ointment. Or he may be a Moslem; then your ointment would be suspected of being made from lard, untouchable pig. Again, his eyes might get better, but he would be unclean for the rest of his life, his aunts would all go crazy and his children be born dumb!" He paused. "You think I exaggerate? I do not, I assure you. The amount of superstition in this one compound is unbelievable. They're best left entirely alone."

"With their sore eyes?"

"Now you're not to fret about that," he said in a kinder voice. "When the moon is right and all the other auguries auspicious, they'll daub on some cure of their own—and it'll work. They'll have faith in it, which they wouldn't in your ointment, you see. And faith will move mountains."

"Even superstitious faith?"

"Any sort of faith. Even—no, not even—most of all faith in oneself."

After the morning walks, and again after her rest in the afternoon, she would go along to Pieter's room and help to amuse him. He always greeted her with every sign of affection and pleasure. Very soon she was hardly aware of his appearance, conscious only of his gentleness, his pathetic anxiety to please. She had known so little affection since Johannes' death that even that of an idiot boy was not to be despised. She developed a corresponding fondness for him, as for an ugly but good-natured dog. Now, as he completed each piece of fumbled handiwork he would present it to her: "Pretty for Julie." He knitted her a scarf of bright purple wool, wide at one end, narrow at the other; and little as a scarf was needed in Rua at that season, she wore it often when she visited him.

Sometimes they went into his little garden, and there she would play ball with him. His movements were too clumsy and unpredictable to allow him to catch a thrown ball, but he loved to retrieve it when it was thrown and bring it back to her to throw again. When she tired he would scrawl on the ground with a stick, or gather flowers—"Pretty for Julie"—until her lap was full.

manner, which she now attributed to shyness, had changed into one of formal civility. He seemed neither to encourage nor to resent her visits. As soon as she arrived he would turn away and busy himself, tidying cupboards and drawers, or simply reading his book. Sometimes he would say, "Don't let him tire you, Mevrouw"; and occasionally, "I think that will do; it does him no good to get excited." His manner toward his charge was unvarying: kindly, authoritative, oddly impersonal. He had two words of rebuke: "dirty" and "naughty"; he used them sparingly, but when he did Pieter would hang his head and seem to wilt like a scolded dog.

The late afternoons usually found her with Mynheer on the veranda to watch the swift, dramatic going down of the sun over the sea; and often, while the sky flowered and faded, from the compound there would come the sound of music, played on the gamelang; strange, rather mournful, muted by distance, it would come to them and weave a kind of spell, so that to speak, or move, demanded a definite effort.

Sometimes Mynheer would touch her hand, or her shoulder: "It's pleasant here, is it not? I hope you are happy?"

"Very happy, Mynheer."

"Not lonely? Not sorry you came?"

She could truthfully say no to such questions.

"All the same," he would say, "I must not be selfish. We must entertain; go visiting; you must make a call on your little friend."

She grew fond of him, too; there was nothing intimidating about him when you came to know him. He was an easy, undemanding companion, and if, now and then, his conversation had a cynical flavor, she reminded herself that he was old, ripe in experience, and that she was young.

And so the golden sun-drenched, scented days went by.

The weather grew warmer or, if not warmer, more oppressive. The days were not invariably fine; it rained, she thought, quite often, sudden showers falling from what was virtually a clear sky. The rain would cease as abruptly as it had begun, and all the wet leaves and flowers would sparkle for a moment, and the ground would steam. But Mynheer and Doctor Hootman and Juno were beginning to talk of the rainy season which was coming. The real rain, upon which the crop and everything else depended; the rain which would soak in and cool the earth.

Mynheer produced, from some hidden treasure chest, a shawl of fine lace, silky, not quite white, white which had lost its purity from being laid away, for a long time, in darkness. "When the rains come, my dear, you may be glad of this in the evenings. Tell Juno to hang it out in the sun."

There came an afternoon when, rising from her rest, she was aware of a change, something missing. The light had altered. It was just as hot—even hotter—but there was no sunshine, and the slight movement of the air, too slight to be called a breeze, had ceased. Pushing her damp hair from her forehead, she went to the window and looked out at the garden. Every leaf, every flower looked limp, their vitality drained away. Something threatened and they cowered under the threat.

Inside the room it was gloomy and stifling. She went, moving listlessly, to her favorite place in the garden, the seat on the little mound by the bank of flowers—azaleas, as she now knew. The mention of impending rain suggested clouds, but there were none, just a sullen, dark purple-gray pall drawn over the sun and the blueness; under it the sea lay flat leaden-colored, and the pink-and-rose color and scarlet of the bank of flowers had not so much faded as been drowned in the general gloom.

It was very depressing, and after a few minutes she began, for the first time, to feel homesick and lonely. She jumped up and decided to go for a walk. In the groves, between the tall trees, it was always shady, and there, she imagined, the change in the light would be less noticeable. She would not, she decided, go far, in case the rain began.

The main path, the one Mynheer took each morning on his way through the compound, began at the edge of the garden, behind a pergola of carefully trained roses. It ran straight, but branching off from it were many paths, well used by the slaves who gathered the nutmegs. Julia knew them all by this time, and knew that by taking any left-hand turn she came through the groves and out at the shore. Ordinarily, she pursued the main path until she was almost at the forbidden compound and then turned off. Today, on account of the threatening rain, she took the first turning.

She had been wrong, she realized, to imagine that in the groves the change in the weather would be less noticeable; the purplish gloom, with the strange sense of foreboding which it conveyed, was thick in the narrow path, and the heat was stifling. It was stupid to have come for a walk; the house would have been much cooler. She came to a standstill and stood hesitant. The gloom seemed to deepen as she stood there. And then she heard the sound, a low, miserable moaning, the sound of someone in pain. She imagined that the sound came from ahead of her along the path, but not directly, slightly to the left, she thought. She moved forward and the noise seemed to come more clearly, but she could see nothing that would account for it. Then she saw, on her left, the opening of a path much more narrow than any of the others which intersected the groves. This was a mere track and not, by the look of it, much used.

In the purple, ominous gloom it had an uninviting, almost a sinister look and she hesitated before entering it. But she was certain now that the moaning came from somewhere along it. A few steps brought her to a length of fencing, made of roughly hewn tree trunks placed close together. The fence ran parallel with the path, was about ten feet high, and had no opening; but it was a mere façade, one had only to step into the grove to get behind it. The agonized sound came from its other side.

Again she stood hesitant. She had a very clear feeling that behind the fence might be something that she would not wish to see, perhaps should not see. But someone, or something—for the moaning noise sounded sometimes human and sometimes not—was behind that fence and in trouble. Also, she herself was curious. She stepped into the grove and rounded the fence.

At the back of it some trees had been hacked down, and in the space stood a square cage. The bars were five or six inches apart and behind them she could see something which moved and moaned and rattled a chain. A stout post stood in the center of the cage and attached to it by a length of chain linked about its waist was . . . what? For a moment Julia thought it was some kind of monkey; it was bent over, very brown, shriveled, and had its back to her as it strained against the chain and toward the bars on the farther side of the cage. And all the time it moaned and whimpered.

As she watched it turned, ran back and then lunged forward again, rattling the chain. With a slow, draining sense of horror Julia realized that it was a woman, skeleton-thin and stark naked.

Moving almost unwillingly, she went around the cage to the side where the woman was scrabbling at the bars. Then she understood. Just outside, just out of reach, stood a bucket with some water in and two little wooden bowls, one empty and one containing a handful of rice. She looked from them to the face of the woman behind the bars and was so shocked that she turned dizzy and found herself suddenly addressing God: Don't let me faint, keep me up so I can do something.

She kept up, and she did something. She took the empty bowl, dipped it in the bucket and pushed it between the bars. The woman seized it, drained it, thrust it out again. There was just enough water in the bucket to fill the little bowl three times; the last time Julia set the bowl down and tipped the bucket to pour out the very last drop. When the bowl was returned she said, "I'm sorry, there isn't any more," and her voice sounded as though she had been crying for a long time.

She handed in the rice bowl. The woman took the bowl and held it under her chin with one hand while with the other she scooped and shoveled the rice into her mouth. She did not chew, she swallowed, just as a dog, watched by another, would swallow food. Four dips, four gulps and the bowl was empty. She handed it back and retreated toward the post in the center of the cage, squatted down on the heap of filth which lay there, put her elbows on her knees and her head between her hands and from under the curtain of matted black hair regarded Julia with a dull, incurious, animal stare.

People did go mad, of course; there were people so mad they tore off their clothes, so mad that for their own safety and the safety of others they had to be very strictly confined. It was possible that this was a madwoman, and that today whoever had the duty of looking after her had forgotten. One mustn't go jumping to hasty conclusions, imagining the worst. There might be some perfectly reasonable explanation for the woman's condition.

She gathered her skirt, a handful on each side, and began to run, but running meant drawing quick breaths and today there seemed to be nothing to breathe.

Breathless and quite distraught, she came to the rose pergola. It was with the utmost relief that she saw, coming toward her, wiping his neck with his handkerchief, Mynheer.

"My dear Julia," he said, "I have been worried about you. I should have warned you not to go far today. The rains are about to begin." A low, long-drawn-out rumble of thunder shook the dark pall that hid the sky. "You might have been caught and drenched. Or frightened by the early darkness."

She could not speak. She took his arm gratefully and he hurried her across the lawn toward the house. Another clap of thunder shook the very air and a few large drops of water showered down.

"I should have prepared you. I do blame myself," Mynheer said, as they reached the steps of the cloister. "It came very suddenly. My dear, it is only thunder, there is no reason to be alarmed. You are trembling. Come and sit down." He led her to the salon.

She sat down, mastered her breath, and said, "It isn't the thunder. I've just seen something horrible!"

"In the compound?" he asked sharply.

"No. In a cage. A woman . . . on a chain . . . in a cage . . . starving."

"Oh." The single word rang out as it might have done had she hit him in the face. "She isn't starving. She is keeping Ramadan—a Moslem fast."

Horror receded. If the torment were self-inflicted, part of some strange creed, then it was different. She steadied herself, brushed back her damp hair and wiped her hands on her handkerchief.

"She looked so awful. I thought she might be mad."

"She may be, now. She was sane enough once," said Mynheer, and his voice was cold, cruel. Julia, looking at him, startled, curious, saw the exact expression which had been on his face when, on her first day, he had mentioned Pieter's fall.

"Is she —— Oh, no!" she said, putting her hand to her mouth.

"She is Psyche. She was Pieter's nurse. She was a Moslem, so she must keep the fast of Ramadan; that means that for a full lunar month nothing, no food or water, may pass the lips between the moment in the morning when a white thread can be distinguished from a black one and the same moment in the evening. One evening, at the end of a parching day, she left him, to fetch herself a cup of water, and he fell. So, since Ramadan meant much to her, more than her duty or my ld's well-being, I decreed that she should p it for the rest of her life." The disturbance is face had not invaded his voice; he spoke mly and with great simplicity.

"How cruel!" she said.

"That I can hardly deny. What I can deny that her suffering has matched mine, or ild, if she stayed there a thousand years."

There was something frightening about his olute calm, his imperviousness. It denied friendly, almost fond relationship which d built up between them. Sensing the fuy, even the unwisdom of saying anything re, she yet felt compelled to attack.

"You can't even be sure that she was to me. I knew a girl who looked exactly like ter, in Amsterdam. She hadn't had a fall!"

"How can you be sure of that? In any case, t is quite irrelevant. Pieter fell and is as he and Psyche is where she is. And think"—voice lightened, became sardonic—"of the rit she is acquiring. In the next life she will ubtless be Mahomet's plumpest houri—or tter still, his favorite camel."

She thought of the cage, of the woman uatting on the heaped filth, and her soul kened.

"You see, you must be careful never to voke me," Mynheer said. "I had no idea at you would penetrate so far, or I should ve warned you. I'm warning you now, dear. Don't walk that way again."

The silence that folved his words was oken by the sudden ar and hiss of the n.

The finding of yche had ruined lia's sense of being rfectly happy in a rfectly beautiful ace. The emotional sturbance, coincidg as it did with the ason of heavy, alost persistent rain, when exercise outors was impossible, resulted in wakeful ghts, haunted by the thought of the woman the cage, and also by worrying thoughts out herself and Mynheer. He had dismissed e matter entirely, and although for some ys her manner to him had been stilted, his to r remained exactly the same—indulgent, aternal.

Lying awake, listening to the drip and patr of the rain, she tried to think, coolly, reasonably, and finally came to the conclusion at merely feeling sickened, sorry, disgusted as not enough. She must do something. She cided that as soon as the rain stopped she ould visit the cage every day and take some od and some water. She could do it in the ternoon when Mynheer invariably slept.

Once that was decided, she felt better about syche. She turned her thoughts to Mynheer. e believed—sincerely, she thought—that the oman had ruined the whole life of his son nd heir; he was angry, and he was, in Rua, mpletely powerful. In his place mightn't she, ightn't anyone act with similar ferocity? She membered how willingly she would have illed Juffrouw Hoorne that night in the lopstock Home.

So, carefully, deliberately, as one might end a precious, broken piece of china, she ndeavored to repair her mental image of Mynheer. The mended thing seemed much he same, but it had lost something.

There came a day when the rain fell less eavily and less persistently and another when he fair periods outnumbered the showers; and hen it was sunny again, the world washed lean and everything springing into lush new fe.

"Now," said Mynheer, "we must set about ome entertaining. We've led a quiet life far oo long. Not, I must warn you, that the comany will be very lively. The men have one ubject of conversation—the nutmeg; and the vomen discourse, I think exclusively, upon he peccadilloes of their house slaves. However, it will divert you to see the dresses and oiffures, and the gentlemen will pay you compliments. And as you listen to the stories you may reflect—as I do—how much better we do in Rua."

Their first guests were to be the governor, his wife and a visiting niece, and Captain Kraemer, who was in command of the soldiers at the fort.

"That," said Mynheer, "will make six, with us, which I think the perfect number for dinner. It will also come to the notice of the agent, and he will feel rebuffed. Nowadays the commercial element has become so overrated that many people rank the agent with the governor. I do not."

He asked her which dress she proposed to wear, and when she said she had not yet decided, he asked:

"Is there not one, a rather dull, slaty blue?"

"Yes. I've never yet worn it. I thought it the least attractive of them all."

"I consider it suitable for this occasion. Will you allow me to be judge, or do you resent my interference?"

"I'll wear it," she said.

That evening, when the dress was on, and fastened, she regretted having been so weak-willed; the dress, of beautiful, heavy silk, had no decoration at all. It made her look old, and staring at her reflection she wondered whether that might be the reason why Mynheer had suggested it.

"I don't like it," she said, turning her head to Juno. "Do you think we could pin in a lace collar or—or something to brighten it up a little?"

As she spoke a gentle tapping sounded on the sitting-room door—the entry from the cloister. Juno padded away and in a second or two Julia heard Mynheer's voice. She rose, and with a rustling of silk skirts went into the sitting room.

Mynheer had not chosen himself a dull and unbecoming outfit; of a paler gray than usual, his jacket and breeches had the smoothness and gloss of polished silver and the lace at his breast and wrists was particularly fine. He carried a flat square box, covered in leather.

He looked her over with critical attention.

"It is ugly, isn't it?" she asked. "Shall I change?"

"Not immediately. Try this first." He opened the box and held it out toward her. Lying on a bed of faded blue velvet was a necklace, diamonds and sapphires set in very pale gold. The chain was formed by the stones, set alternately, every one as large as a pea, and hanging from it were seven pendants, each made of one large sapphire surrounded by a ring of diamonds.

As she stared at it, he tilted the box slightly so that the light of a nearby candle shone in the perfect, unfathomable blue and struck sparks of scarlet, green, purple and yellow from the whiteness.

"It's pretty, isn't it?" She knew that his choice of the slight, the faintly derogatory word was deliberate.

"It's beautiful."

He put the box on the table and lifted the necklace from it, shimmering and glittering.

"Permit me," he said, and laid it around her neck and fastened it under her hair. The stones fell into place, icily, against her skin.

Stepping back, he regarded her gravely.

"Yes," he said. "Yes—but see what you think, my dear."

She ran to the glass. The dress, she herself, utterly transformed; the blue and the sparkle seemed to have invaded her eyes.

"I am sometimes right," said Mynheer modestly. "When I ordered that dress I bore in mind that my daughter-in-law might be someone whom I could bear to see wearing that necklace. It suits you very well."

"I don't know what to say, Mynheer."

"There is no need to say anything. What there is need of ——" He lowered his voice a little. "Julia, this evening I'm afraid you must be prepared for a mild form of inquisition. The ladies will hardly miss such an opportunity of satisfying their curiosity. So imagine that Mevrouw van de Lijn has you in a corner and asks you about Pieter's disfigurement. What will you say?"

She thought for a moment, and then looking straight at him said, "Mynheer, I shall tell her that Pieter's disfigurement is grossly exaggerated by everybody, including himself."

Behind the bulging, clear, glassy gray eyes something popped up and looked out for a moment; something surprised, uneasy, vaguely respectful. It gave her the look which an expert might give a novice who had proved astonishingly adept at some game. It was not altogether pleased.

Then he smiled. "A beautifully ambiguous answer, my dear. I couldn't have thought of a better myself. Stick to that and you will do well."

She experienced, that evening, something she had never known before: a feeling of pride; pride in the place which she now called home, pride in the family of which she was now a member. It was so plain that these people—the most important members of Banda's society—regarded Mynheer with a respect that was little short of awe; even the governor deferred to him, saying, "With your long experience ——" saying, "Now on this Homemaking is no longer belittled. It commands respect as a career requiring high intelligence plus devotion and especial sensitivity to the social and emotional needs of others.

I should value your opinion ——" And Mynheer was at his very best. Here at this table, bright with flowers and the best service of silver gilt, watching the skill with which he directed the conversation, everyone included, everyone provoked to animation, feeling about her throat the cold clasp of the necklace, being praised, displayed, smiled upon—was it narrow-minded, she wondered, to withhold something, to resist the appeal of his personality, to remember Psyche in her prison?

Halfway through the meal something happened for which Julia was not prepared.

Every evening, just before the candles were lighted, screens of the finest gauze, stretched tight over wooden battens, were placed inside the iron grillwork of the windows to keep out the night-flying things which might be attracted by the light. The veranda outside was ordinarily left in darkness, but this evening—she had imagined for the convenience of the guests arriving and departing—lanterns had been placed at intervals between the flower-brimming urns.

Suddenly Mynheer broke off in mid-sentence and looked fixedly at one window, thus drawing everyone's attention to it. Blocked darkly against the lanternlight, filling the window, was the whole of one human figure and half another, a jutting hatbrim, one shoulder. The one seen fully Julia recognized as Doctor Hootman; the other? Pieter? Even she could not be quite certain. Doctor Hootman turned his head and seemed to address his companion, and lifted his hand and laid it on the other's shoulder, and they moved away in such a direction that the man who was half glimpsed was never fully seen.

"Pieter and his friend have resumed their walks now that the rain is ended. That is something to be thankful for," said Mynheer.

There was a moment of slightly embarrassed silence; then the governor said, "Such a pity—to take it so hard." He turned to Julia and said, "I suppose, Mevrouw, you hardly notice anything amiss now. I am sure that, given the same opportunity, we should all become equally accustomed."

"Only today ——" she said, and tried out the neat little speech.

Even the inquisition for which Mynheer had prepared Julia did not take place. Mevrouw van de Lijn was engrossed with anxiety about her own child, a daughter, living in Holland, and due about now to have a baby.

"And whether things go well with her or not, whether I have a grandson or a granddaughter, I can't possibly know for another seven months. That is what I find so hard. I don't mind the climate, but I do mind, very much, these separations and the feeling of being at the world's end, so entirely cut off."

At the evening's end, however, attention was drawn to Pieter again. As the guests were leaving, about to make their way from the house to the little jetty where the governor's proa with a lighted lantern at its prow bobbed and looked like a dancing firefly, the sound of the clavichord, played in a masterly manner, came from the end of the house where Pieter's apartments lay. It was far from being the pleasant, tinkling tune produced by the average performer. In the wild, stormy music there seemed to sound the cry of a soul unsatisfied, lonely and searching. Exactly so might the legendary Pieter have played.

"Ah," said Captain Kraemer in a voice of awed appreciation.

"Poor boy! So gifted too," said the governor.

His wife gave a little shiver. The music spoke to her of the miles of tossing, perpetually discontented sea which lay between her and Holland, where her heart was this night.

Turning back into the house, Mynheer laid his hand on Julia's arm. "My dear, you did splendidly. I was very proud of you."

After that there were other dinner parties, and several times Mynheer and Julia went to dine in one or another of the big houses in Banda. There was never time on these occasions to visit Marie, he said, and Julia was glad; she had no wish to appear before Marie finely gowned and bejeweled.

One day Mynheer returned from a visit to Banda and said that he had made an appointment there for the morning, two days ahead; his business would take about two hours and he thought it would be a convenient time for Julia to make her visit.

"I took the liberty of sending word so that she may expect you. You must take her some flowers; they have no garden, I believe."

Marie lived in a narrow house squeezed between two taller, larger buildings. It was faded pink in color and except that it had shutters might have been any house in any humble street in Holland.

She opened the door herself and Julia had difficulty in suppressing an exclamation of surprise. Marie had greatly changed, grown so fat that she almost filled the doorway. Behind her, in the narrow passage, stood another woman with two children peering from behind her skirts.

The population of Banda Neira had grown rapidly and there was a shortage of houses. Marie and Hendrik shared a house with his brother, his wife and two children and an unmarried clerk from the agent's office.

"—— and now he wants to get married too," said Marie, explaining the situation, "and we haven't the heart to say he can't; so where we shall be then, I don't know."

She had lost none of her cheerfulness. Chattering gaily, she led the way into a hot, cluttered sitting room, called her sister-in-law and introduced her and asked her to put the flowers in water, and shooed away the children.

"Now," she said, "let me look at you! And tell me quickly, while we're alone, which we shan't be for long, are you all right, Julia?"

"I'm very well. Are you?" But surely it was wrong to have grown so very stout, so pale and puffy of face, in so short . . . how long? Good heavens, six whole months.

"I'm as you see," said Marie, looking down at her bulging figure with pride. "Hendrik is so pleased. He wants a girl to look like me; and I want a boy to look like him. And it could be twins, couldn't it, the size I am."

So that was it! "I'm so glad for you."

"I'm glad too. Mind, I shall be more glad when it or they have arrived. I look so awful. The odd thing is, Hendrik doesn't think so. He says that I'm prettier now than ever. Do you think something comes over men who are going to be fathers, a sort of blindness?"

Deep in Julia's mind something stirred. Men and women were made and put together by the good God . . . no mistake . . . even such a veiling of a man's sight. That, she thought, must be real love.

"I wanted to come and see you," Marie ran on. "But the Vosmars are so rich and important, it didn't seem quite right for me to come to you first. And then this happened. And you didn't come and didn't come. I have been worried about you."

"Why?"

Marie looked away and a little color crept into her cheeks. "Well—such tales go round. Is it true that your husband had a terrible accident and is dreadful to look at?"

Once again the neat little sentence served.

"And then there's that frightening old man. Oh, when I saw you go off with him, Julia—I did pity you."

"But he's very kind to me. I'm not frightened of him." But that is a lie; every afternoon when I steal out of the house to visit Psyche I can hardly breathe for fear.

"If he's kind, his looks belie him. But I'm glad he is. And what about your husband, apart from his looks?"

"Pieter and I get on very well. He's very fond of me. He'd do anything he could to please me." That at least was true.

"Well, that just shows. They say he's surly, never sees anybody, never speaks. They even say he's a bit ——" She tapped her head with her finger and laughed; then, leaning forward, took Julia by the hand. "They're vastly rich, aren't they? I expected you to walk in all silk and satins and covered with diamonds."

"But I had to come in a proa. I have a silk dress ——" She could see that Marie was so happy, so contented with her lot that she was safe from envy, so she described one or two of her dresses.

"Have you one of those native things? You know, a sarong and little jacket? Hendrik and I were asked to the agent's once—I don't like her, nose-in-the-air, but that's by the way—and she was wearing one, pink and purple. I meant to make myself one—you only have to do straight hemming on the sarong—but then this happened and it didn't seem worth it for a while. But I shall after—if I ever get back to my right size, that is."

In such girlish chatter the time passed swiftly. The sister-in-law came in, carrying Mynheer's offering of lilies and roses and orchids which she had crammed into an ugly brass bowl; she went out again and returned bringing strong black coffee and some rather stale little cakes. The children stole into the room, soon forgot their shyness and began squabbling and had to be sent out; the lack of garden was deplored. Soon it was time to go.

At the moment of parting, Marie had a resurgence of anxiety.

"You really are all right, Julia? Happy?"

"Of course. You must come and see for yourself."

"I can't take a boat trip just now. I will afterward—if you invite me."

"I am inviting you," Julia said. How would Mynheer take that?

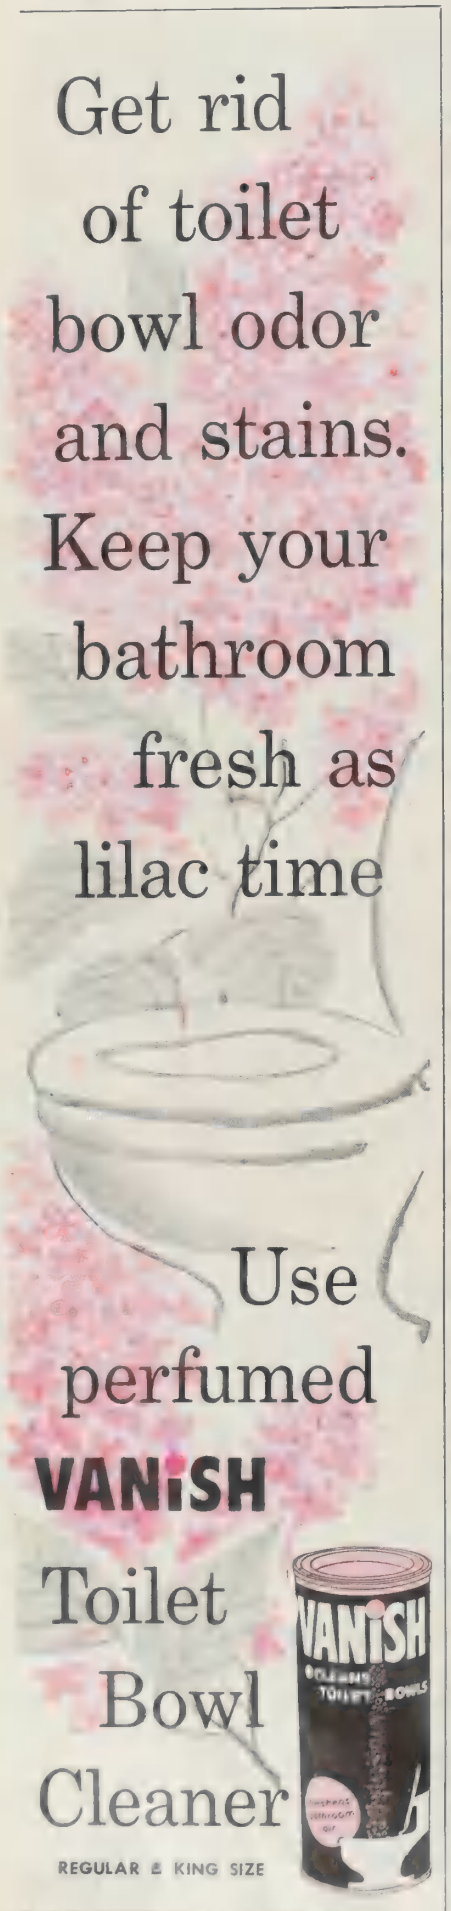
The proa swung out of the harbor and headed for Rua.

"Well, and how did you enjoy your visit?" Mynheer asked.

"Very much, thank you. We had such a lot to talk about."

"Your little friend is enjoying her new life?"

"Oh, very much. She was delighted with the flowers and sent you messages of gratitude." That was not true. Marie had handed the flowers to Rita and hardly looked at them. Save for a flash or two in Julia's direction, Marie's eyes were turned inward, self-absorbed.



"I expect she told you all the gossip of the town."

"No. I don't think we gossiped at all," she told him. "We talked mainly about ourselves, I'm afraid."

She could feel, without turning her head, that he was looking at her closely. He was waiting, waiting for her to tell him something more. What? Oh, of course ——

"She did ask me a few questions about Pieter. My answers satisfied her, and I think would have satisfied you."

"I'm sure of that. I rely upon your discretion absolutely."

He seemed to wait again. Then he said:

"Well, perhaps it is true—as some ladies aver—that men are the real gossips. It seems that my business talk has provided me with a titbit that you missed. Unless you saw fit not to mention it to me."

"You mean about Marie—that she is going to have a baby?"

"Yes. Is it true? Then was it modesty that kept you silent on the subject? Or envy?"

She had a sudden, strange, utterly unwarranted suspicion that he had known all along; that he had deliberately postponed taking her to visit Marie until he had, somehow, on his previous trip, heard that she was pregnant. But that was stupid; why should he? And why this sudden probing?

"Neither. I just felt that, in the circumstances, it was a matter better not mentioned between us. That was all."

"Now why?" he asked. "Between us there should be complete understanding. We two are alone as few people are. My dear, you do, despite the poor little house, the lack of prospects and everything, envy her, do you not?"

What did he want her to say?

"I suppose every woman, if she could, would like to have a child of her own, but ——"

"Exactly," he broke in. "And every woman should. It is her right!"

In the circumstances an astonishing, a challenging thing to say. But I can't, she thought, go into it with him now; once I might have. But I must answer. She said, "Many women remain unmarried, Mynheer. What about them?"

"This is an imperfect world, my dear. The rules are made, hit or miss; often by knaves. I never pay heed to the rules, I never have. I still say that any woman, married or single, should have a child if she wanted one."

It all seemed to be leading somewhere, but where?

"That is a very original idea," she said.

He laughed. "I'm sure somebody said just those words to the man who first thought of harnessing a horse, or setting the wind to work a mill or sail a ship. Where would the world be if no one had ever had an original idea? I feel very strongly ——"

She waited, feeling that the next words would reveal his purpose, make everything plain.

"I talk too much," he said. "And for that you are partly to blame. You're very easy to talk to. I often forget that you are so young, and a female. Never mind. One day ——"

He left that sentence unfinished, too, and reached out and patted her hand.

The next week Mynheer made another visit to Banda Neira, this time alone.

"I will not ask you to come with me today, my dear, because my business will take longer. Also, I may bring two guests back for dinner and I want you, if you will be so kind, to do a job for me." He took out his keys and removed one from the chain and handed it to her. "That is the key of the plate cupboard. Pluto knows what to get out, but I would like you to be there. He will overload a tray and then things fall and are dented. Make him bring out one piece at a time." He smiled at her. "It is very pleasant for me to have someone to whom I can entrust these domestic details. And of course you must begin to take charge. One day you will rule this house; rule all Rua, in fact."

She said, with sincerity, "I hope that day will be long in coming, Mynheer."

"Thank you, my dear. But it will come. That is a fact to be faced. However, I have made every possible provision."

The vision of the future, thus conjured up, cast a slight gloom over the bright morning. Day-to-day living in Rua was—apart from the ever-nagging memory of the woman in the cage—very pleasant and carefree, but to look ahead was to see a time and a situation curiously shapeless, empty of the landmarks which ordinary people saw along the years.

She tried to throw off her bewildering and foreboding thoughts by being busy, but Pluto suggested that the removal of the silver should take place in the afternoon. When afternoon came he was so exaggeratedly careful in the handling of the many pieces of the silver-gilt dinner service which was to be used that evening that the afternoon was well advanced before Julia could relock the cupboard and go away.

On any ordinary afternoon this would have worried her, but today, with Mynheer safe in Banda, it did not matter. She went calmly to her room, picked up a rather large bag of pale pink brocade with a piece of embroidery sticking out of it, and set off to pay her daily visit to Psyche. Concealed under the embroidery were some food saved from her own midday meal and an old wine bottle full of water.

Psyche now knew her, and watched for her coming; every afternoon she was at the bars of the cage on the side from which Julia appeared. Apart from this, their relationship had remained static and Julia was not even sure whether the woman was fully sane or not. On the first few occasions when she had brought the extra food and water, she had tried to talk to her, calling her by name. There was no response; eighteen years of slow torture and solitary confinement had reduced Psyche to something less than human, and eventually Julia could see that this was merciful. Sometimes on her way back she cried a little; and sometimes she felt a renewed upsurge of dislike for Mynheer.

This afternoon Psyche was waiting as usual at the corner nearest the point where Julia entered the little clearing. An extra meal every day for some weeks had done nothing to change her dreadful appearance; under the filthy scaly skin every bone, every ligament showed plainly. Her eyes, under the shadow of the mat of hair, flickered with recognition and avidity, and Julia was glad to think that today there was meat in the bag.

Ordinarily, as soon as Julia arrived, Psyche, after that single, human-seeming glance, would run, with a clanking of the chain, to the other side of the cage where the water and rice were displayed in their Tantalus inaccessibility. Today, however, she stayed where she was, pushing her clawlike hands through the bars and whimpering. She was more thirsty than usual, Julia thought, because of the delay.

She walked around to the side where the bowls and the bucket stood. Psyche ran across with a clanking of the chain. Julia put the bag on the ground, removed the piece of embroidery and the packet of food and revealed the bottle, standing upright with the pink folds of the brocade bag collapsed around its base. She reached out for the bowl into which she always poured the water. As she did so Psyche's hand shot through the bars and snatched at the bottle, drawing it into the cage. Poor thing, she is thirsty, Julia thought; and, despite all evidence to the contrary, she can still reason. It is quicker to drink from the bottle than to have a bowl filled.

Psyche, bottle in hand, was retreating toward the center of the cage with exactly the look of a cat that has made off with a piece of fish.

"It's all right," Julia said. "Drink out of the bottle if you like. But you must give it back to me." She heard a certain shrillness in her voice, and thought, I mustn't frighten her, I must keep calm.

Psyche made no attempt to take out the cork. Perhaps she had forgotten. She wasn't even handling the bottle as though she intended to drink out of it. She held it by its neck.

She is mad, after all, Julia thought.

Holding the bottle by the neck and swinging it as though it were a club, Psyche hit it against the post. It broke, the water splashed out and pieces of glass fell down onto the heap of filth. The neck of the bottle, with the cork still in it, remained in her hand until she dropped it among the other fragments. Then she bent down, looked at the pieces of glass and quite deliberately chose one. With it in her hand she stood up, and then, with that same deliberation, drew the edge of it across her stringy throat.

It made, to begin with, a cut, like a little mouth with red lips; then, in a flash, the wound, Psyche's hand, the piece of glass which it held were all lost in a gush of blood.

It all happened so suddenly that there wasn't time even to close one's eyes, or look away.

Psyche did not fall down immediately; the arching fountain of blood had slackened before she fell to her knees and then forward from the waist until her face touched the ground. In this prayerful attitude her body gave one or two convulsive twitches which jerked it slightly sideways; then it was still.

It had all happened so suddenly, and been so unexpected, that it was difficult to believe that it had happened at all. But it had happened. There lay Psyche, dead, with the bits of broken glass around her, and there was Julia, sick and dizzy, clinging to the bars of the cage for support.

Psyche was dead; she was glad of that: her troubles were over. Mynheer would come, at feeding time, see the corpse and the bits of glass. He would instantly suspect Julia, because she had once shown interest in the dead woman. He would be furiously angry. Balked of the rest of his vengeance, what would his vengeance be? There was only one answer to that. He would put her in the cage. She would spend the rest of her life there, naked, chained to a post by a heap of filth.

She began to tremble, so violently that her hands could no longer clasp the bars, so violently that her head jerked and shook like that of an old person with palsy. I must get away, she thought, away from this place of horror. The idea of drowning herself slipped into her mind. Yes, death in the cool, crystal-clear blue water would be better than facing Mynheer in his rage.

She staggered out of the clearing and onto the path, turning away from the house and toward the shore. She had taken only a few steps when she stopped to listen, thinking that she heard other steps coming toward her. It was so. Mynheer, back from Banda earlier than he had expected and coming from that direction toward the cage.

She would have turned and run the other way, or darted off and hidden in the nutmeg grove, but she now could not move at all except to shudder and tremble. She could only stand in the middle of the narrow path and wait.

It was not Mynheer. It was nobody she had ever seen before. A man, giving, at that slight distance, an impression of youth unconfirmed, she was to learn, by a closer view. She even noticed that he looked surprised, a little startled at the sight of her.

He came close enough to touch her, looking at the path behind her and into the grove on either side.

"Have you had a fright? What's the matter?" he asked.

She tried to speak, but she had no more control of her jaw and tongue than of her legs; her teeth chattered and that was the only sound.

"I didn't frighten you, did I?" he went on. "I'm harmless."

He saw the splashes of fresh blood on the front of her dress, the state of her hands where she had clutched the blood-splashed bars. He tried again.

"Have you had an accident?"

Almost unwillingly then he touched her, put his hand under her arm and turned her slightly.

"Sit down," he said, and helped her down and propped her back against the trunk of a tree.

The man carried a brown jacket over his left arm. He searched for and found the pocket and brought out a small, dented silver flask. He removed its top and held it toward her.

"Take a sip of that," he told her. "It'll pull you together."

She tried to lift a shaking hand, then tried to shake her jerking head to indicate inability.

"Poor girl," he said, "you are in a state."

He threw down the jacket, knelt beside her, put an arm round her shoulders and with his other hand held the flask to her lips, exactly as though she were a baby.

Whatever it was he had given her ran warmly down from her throat to the pit of her stomach and after a minute or two from there it began to spread out. Presently she tried to move her hand again, and this time it came up at her bidding; she took her lower jaw between her finger and thumb, held it for a few seconds and then managed to say, "Thank you."

"Now," he said, with an air of getting down to business, "are you hurt?" She shook her head. "Then where does all this blood come from?"

"Psyche . . . she killed herself." The radiating warmth had now reached the very core of her mind; she burst into tears. "It was awful," she gulped out between two sobs. "I was glad for her, but it was . . . an awful way to die." She found her handkerchief and used it, and gasped out, "Unless I drown myself I think he'll put me in the cage instead. Oh, I know it all sounds crazy, but this is a crazy place. You don't know!"

Now the extreme, painful clarity of mind which had enabled her to observe everything so minutely—even to the fact that his shirt had once been fine, and that now its frill was in tatters—had given way to emotional confusion. She hardly noticed that he had slipped his arm around her again and was holding her close to his shoulder and urging her to have her cry out because then she would be able to tell him what was the matter and he would see if there was anything he could do.

With her mind she was hardly aware of all this; but her body remembered that in just this way Uncle Johannes had held her and comforted her when something had gone wrong with her childish world. Since his death nobody had held her with intent to comfort or sustain. Despite everything, she was comforted.

At last she was able to say, "Are you a friend of Mynheer Vosmar's?"

"Let's say an acquaintance. I'll tell you this: if it's trouble between you and him, I'm on your side."

"Why?" she asked, lifting her head from his shoulder and mopping her eyes.

"Because I'm always on the side of ladies in distress. No, seriously, you're safe with me. If there's anything I can do to help, tell me."

"I don't see that anyone could help me. Mynheer kept a poor woman in a cage and slowly starved her—kept her short of water, too, so every day I took her some and just now she snatched the bottle and cut her throat. He'll know it was me. She's been there for eighteen years and nobody else ever bothered. He'll put me in the cage instead—unless I drown myself."

"Or I said I gave her the bottle."

She moved her head a little so that she could look into his face. "Could you do that? Would you?" she asked in an awed voice.

"I don't see why not. He can't do anything to me."

His eyes, she noticed with some part of her mind which had disengaged itself from the main problem, were blue; and they were narrow, wrinkled at the outer corners as though he were always screwing them against the glare of the sun.

"I don't know," she said doubtfully. "He'll be very angry, and he's a ruthless man."

"The most ruthless man I know, and I have known a few. But his anger wouldn't hurt me. Don't you fret about that. Let's work it out. I'm coming along this path, carrying a bottle of wine, nothing extraordinary about that. What draws my attention? I've walked this path before and never noticed anything. Where is this cage? How did you find it?"

"Behind that fence," she said, looking in that direction and then quickly away again. "I heard her moaning."

"All right. I heard her moaning. I gave her the bottle of wine. That is, I might say, and will seem so to Mynheer, quite out of keeping with my character, but then the circumstances are somewhat unusual. Will that do?"

She said slowly, "I don't know what to say. I should be so deeply, so everlastingly gr——" She began to cry again.

"Ah, don't!" he said. "It's over now. You'll just puff up your face and that will look suspicious. And you've got a lot of cleaning up to do. So that shall be our story, eh?"

"If you're sure you don't mind the risk."

"All I risk is that he should burst with fury, and I don't think he will. Tell me," he said in a different voice, "what hold has he on you that you should be frightened of him?"

DAYS

He's my father-in-law."
Your what?"
My father-in-law."
Great God in heaven! You don't tell me
're married to that idiot boy!"
For the first time she felt something shame-about her situation. Her face grew hot and looked down as she said:
I didn't know; it was a glove marriage.
d of course it is in name only."
He said nothing for a moment.
Are they kind to you?"
Oh, yes, very kind. Today, of course, was erent. I did disobey him." That was a render. "Mynheer, if you do take the blame for what I did, when can you tell him? I think he comes to feed . . . her at sunset every day. If he came before he heard your story he would think of me, and if he spoke of it, or questioned or accused me, I'm afraid I should give myself away."

"He shall know that I am waiting to see him, on most urgent business, the moment he sets foot on the jetty. Make your mind easy. All you have to do is to clean up, and forget all about it. Especially forget that you ever saw me."

"Oh, I couldn't do that. I shall remember you and what you've done for me every day of my life."

"No, just forget it." His voice changed again. "Do you see much of Daan Hootman?"

"Every day, several times."

"He's a good chap. If ever you need a friend, he'd stand by."

"I'll remember that. But I shall be all right. I've learned my lesson. I shall never interfere with anything again."

"That's right," he said. He rose lightly to his feet and reached down a hand to help her to hers. "How do you feel?"

"A little shaky, but all right, thank you."

"Just forget all about it and be careful in future. I hope everything will work out all right for you."

She realized that now she must go one way and he another; that she would never see him again, and must even try to forget that she had ever seen him.

"I haven't thanked you properly—but then I never could. And now we have to say good-by." Tears rushed to her eyes again. She held out her hand and he took it. Suddenly, on impulse, he gave it a little pull, drawing her nearer, and, bending his head, kissed her on the forehead, just where the hair grew in a little peak.

"That's for luck," he said lightly. "You're the sweetest thing I've seen for many a long day."

She threw her arms round his neck and kissed him on the mouth, for luck, for gratitude, for good-by, with a kind of innocent passion. He stood rigid and unresponsive for a second; then, under hers, his lips moved, once. Instantly he reached up his hands and caught hers.

"You really must go, it's getting late," he said stiffly.

She knew that if she tried to speak again she would cry, her throat ached and her eyes were swimming. She began to walk quickly away; but at the path's end she turned and looked back. He was standing where she had left him, his shabby old jacket slung over his arm. He raised a hand and she waved back, taking a last look at him with her heart in her eyes.

As she hurried along the rose pergola she saw Doctor Hootman on the other side of the garden, but he entered the grove from that side by a less frequented path, and she was able to reach the house unobserved.

Beneath his stolid appearance, Doctor Hootman concealed a lively and sensitive perception and an imagination more than averagely facile. The instant the man he had come to meet was within sight, before a word or glance had been exchanged, he sensed that something had happened and that this meeting was in some way different from their former ones.

Philosophically he reminded himself that those who play with fire must expect sooner or later to burn their fingers; he congratulated himself that his connection with the dangerous element had been more or less a vicarious one.

They met, shook hands; and in the doing of it Doctor Hootman asked, "What's the matter, Charles? You look perturbed."

"Do I?" Charles rubbed his hand over his face as though to right his expression "And well I may," he said, a faint grin coming and going and leaving his look unchanged.

"Is something wrong?"

"Oh, with the job? No. All safe in Madagascar by now, or should be, and the money lodged. I wasn't thinking about that. It's what has been happening here, that's what I want to know, my boy."

"Here? Everything here is as usual."

"You're an old oyster. You've got an addition to the family, I understand."

"Oh, that," said Doctor Hootman with an air of relief, dismissing Julia as of no importance. "The jungle drums don't miss much, do they? Yes, in addition to all the other trappings of normality, Pieter has now been provided with a wife."

"I've just seen her."

"Did she see you?"

"We had a long conversation."

"Most unwise," Doctor Hootman said. "Suppose she mentions you."

"She won't. She can keep a secret." Charles flung himself down on the crisp, aromatic leaves that had drifted beside the path. "She's had one of her own which I bet even you never ferreted out."

Lowering himself more awkwardly, Doctor Hootman also sat down.

"I must confess it had never occurred to me to look into her activities."

"Well, listen to this." Doctor Hootman did listen, intently while Charles told him, briefly, the story of Julia's visits to Psyche and how the last one had ended.

"Next thing I know I shall have a case of apoplexy on my hands," Doctor Hootman said, speaking as though he relished the prospect. "He'll be so mad with anger, and the conflict between his fury and the paternal attitude he must preserve will be enough to make him burst a blood vessel." He hugged his knees and looked pleased.

"He won't be angry with her. Me. I'm the scapegoat. We worked it all out. I was walking along, found the poor wretch and gave her the bottle of wine which I was bringing up as a present for himself. That'll burst all his blood vessels, eh?"

Charles laughed outright, and Doctor Hootman's pleased look warmed for a moment into a smile. They were men of entirely dissimilar character, breeding and experience, with nothing in common except the furtive bit of business they carried on behind Mynheer's back, but that was in itself a strong link.

Doctor Hootman's smile soon vanished. "I don't call that a good move at all. You're not supposed to be here today."

"I've got a story to explain that too. Don't you worry."

"I don't think he'll believe you."

"What else can he believe? I've even checked on the bottle. Lovely bottle of Rhenish it was!" His face hardened. "I shan't give him time for doubts, Daan. I shan't walk in and say, 'So sorry, Mynheer, I had the slight misfortune to finish off your victim.' I shall tell him straight out that he's a filthy swine and that I don't think I can do business with him any more."

"Yes," said Doctor Hootman thoughtfully, "that does lend a ring of conviction. And it will set him thinking. That's the line to take."

"It's not a line. It's how I feel. I shall have a hard job to keep my hands off him."

Doctor Hootman looked with mild interest at the harsh-lined face, now scored with angry disgust.

"I shouldn't have thought that Psyche's plight ——" he began.

"I'm not thinking of Psyche—though that was bad enough. It's the girl. Of all the vile things to do, to fetch out that poor innocent child and marry her off to —— I'm tough-bellied, but when she said 'father-in-law' I did feel bloody sick."

One of Doctor Hootman's eyebrows moved a little. "You needn't concern yourself about that, Charles. They live quite separately. And theirs is really rather a touching relationship. She plays with him as though he were about four years old and just a little backward."

As he spoke, something deeply buried, most intricately coiled at the very roots of his mind, moved, cold and sluggish, a snake stirring from its winter sleep.

"She seems to have made quite an impression on you, Charles. Was she equally taken with you?"

"She probably wouldn't recognize me again if she saw me. Poor girl, she was half out of her mind with terror. She'd got an idea that he might put her in his cage. What's her name?"

"Julia."

"Julia." He tried it over; he liked it; it suited her. He turned his attention to more immediate matters.

"Get hold of Mynheer, Daan, as soon as he lands, and tell him a man—you can say a rough-looking character, if you like—came to see him and you shut him in the library. Then from your lair you can listen to the explosion."

"I'd like to know what excuse you'll give for being here today—unbidden by him."

"Stern business—and it happens to be true. London seems to have tapped another source and the price dropped by two shillings a pound. So he probably will burst, and I'll have killed the goose that laid the golden egg. For once I don't care. There's always the nutmeg. Your gleanings are in the same place, I take it. Good. I think this time we really must make an effort to get some to America. It's amazing, isn't it, how they don't grow. You and I alone have shipped out enough to start a forest, and we're not the only ones. And the demand goes on."

"We should be grateful for that. Now, a regards the patrols."

"I'd clean forgotten."

"You are not yourself this afternoon. Th seventeenth; the twenty-third; the first of nex month. But the Lonthoir run, on the fifteenth is full moon. So have a care then."

"Thank you, Daan," Charles said warmly "It's due to you we've eluded them so long, do verily believe. He's a mean swine abou that too. He has all the information, but neve another word or hint that a poor strugglin chap could take advantage of. I'd be interested to know who supplies his information."

"I don't think anybody does," said Docto Hootman, rising and brushing, with scrupulou care, every bit of clinging leaf from his dar clothes. "A patrol officer, in his cups, one eve ning dropped a hint abou general principle of routine, varied by tide and the moon; an after that, clever fellow, he could work it ou for himself. On the first of the lunar month, a regularly as it comes round, he sits down an makes his little chart; at which I look nex time I pass. Well, I'll go ahead; wait ten min utes and then follow. I'll be on the lookout. hope your luck holds."

"Thanks. And Daan ——"

"Yes?"

"Keep an eye on . . . Julia."

"I can promise to do that. I also admir courage. I have my human side, you know."

He walked, unhurried and ponderous through the grove where the twilight wa thickening. As he walked he snapped his fin gers coaxingly at the snake which had ju moved in his mind. Come out, little snake, l me inspect you and see whether you are what wish, what I hope you might be. Are you just harmless little grass snake, or a deadly viper?

He could remember every word, every in flection of voice used on the evening of Julia arrival when Mynheer had said, "Listen —— and then unfolded his audacious, incredibl scheme. Every word had been a blow to hi own plans and hopes. But now, after what ha happened this afternoon, it was just possibl that Julia might be a weapon snatched fro Mynheer's hand and fitted to his own.

Doctor Hootman was neither religiousl nor mystically inclined. Ignoring Providenc and Destiny, he was therefore forced to bend superstitious knee in the worship of anothe controller of human lives, the great goddes Coincidence. Coincidence was responsible fo the fact that the ship on which he had sailed a doctor-surgeon and spy for the owners shoul sink in the Banda straits and that he should b without a job, awaiting a passage, at the ver moment when Mynheer Vosmar was search ing for new medical attention for Pieter. Agai it was Coincidence which had ordained hi meeting with Charles Youngman; they ha founded a partnership which had been ver profitable. So far, so good. Had Coincidenc now stretched out her long arm and simply b throwing a man and a girl together offere him the ghost of a chance of defeating My heer's scheme and prospering his own?

Pondering these things, Doctor Hootma plodded back to his place of imprisonmen while Charles lay in the dusk on the scente leaves and thought of Julia and how she ha kissed him.

He kept coming back to that. He thought c the patrol boats making their futile, regula prowls on the lookout for smugglers. H thought of his fellow outlaws, the disillu sioned, dispossessed, risking their lives for te guilders, living in squalor and daily danger but gallantly and cheerfully. He thought c Mynheer. He thought of Psyche. And h thought of a long avenue of elms, noisy wit rooks, that led to what had been a gracious house, tawny-pink in the English sunshine now a heap of blackened rubble. But alway his thoughts came back to Julia, to the mem ory of that sweetly innocent and yet passion ate kiss and the way it had stirred him.

Ten minutes. So many of his jobs called fo perfect timing that he could gauge a given pe riod to a few seconds without the aid of timepiece. He rose, brushed himself down.

He might never see her again. There was n room in his life for sentiment.

WHY I LIKE BEING A WOMAN

College and wartime director of the WAVES, says, "Being a woman has given me tremendous opportunities, thanks to men! It was only when men thought 'There ought to be a woman' that I was able to join many organizations which provided stimulating experiences. In my vast and pleasurable association with women, I have met a great many I admire and I am glad to be able to associate with them as a fellow woman can. Of course my first reason for being glad I am a woman is that I like being my husband's wife!"

ROSALIND RUSSELL tells us, "Someone once said 'Man goes direct to God—woman goes through saints.' We may often be roundabout in the way we get things done, but we get them done, and usually come up smiling! Through our seemingly frivolous pursuits—country auctions, county fairs, afternoon teas and Christmas bazaars—we manage to raise the money to build a new school wing or balance the church budget; and what's more, everybody has fun while we do it. I enjoy our womanly occupations—and I'm glad to be a member of the club."

GLADYS ROCKMORE DAVIS attributes the beauty of her paintings to "the many things in life I have loved and experienced as a woman." She says, "Being able to give birth to two children, having a vital role in their education and development, having a woman's pleasure in creating my different homes, planning the family meals and enjoying pretty clothes are the things I have most enjoyed through the years—and the things that have most influenced my work as an artist."

DOROTHY THOMPSON and IVY BAKER PRIEST agree that the special satisfactions in life that come to women are bound by, as well as distinguished from, man's place in the world. In their personal lives, both of these wives and mothers are admired for their generous hearts and warmly feminine qualities.

Says Dorothy Thompson: "Men and women share a common humanity and are more alike than they are different. In the very greatest men there is a sensibility usually associated with the feminine, and in the greatest women a power that we associate with the masculine. The highest satisfactions are happily open to persons of both sexes, provided they have the instinct, will and a yearning greater than mere 'ambition' to seek and find them. These are the satisfactions of mind and soul that reward the search for truth and understanding and concentrated engagement in creative work. The realization of an ambition is usually tied to public recognition and applause. Satisfaction in achieving understanding is in the achievement itself. But I cannot draw a line here, between the sexes."

Mrs. Priest adds, "Liking to be alive is what is important. I feel we should all be happy we are on this earth and enjoy to the fullest the compensations and rewards of a good life."

ISAK DINESEN's philosophy gives us all something pleasant to think about now—and for the future. This author says, "As a little girl I often wished to be a boy, and I think that most little girls will have wished the same, but from the age of about fifteen I have, I believe, enjoyed being a female as thoroughly as any of my sex. At my present time of life I feel the preference even more strongly. I am convinced it is easier and more pleasant to be an old woman than to be an old man. Why? I feel that woman is freer than man. Not freer in regard to the laws of the community, but freer in regard to the laws of life. I believe that the idea of law itself, deeply rooted in the nature of man, with woman is replaced by the idea of way. I have often in the company of my male friends felt in my bones that their being was hampered by a great many laws or rules which, with me and my whole sex, had been happily and inexplicably converted into ways and had thereby become more alive and easier to deal with. I feel that men very often, for this very reason, seek the company of women—as of somebody who is capable of liberating them from the annoying constraint of laws." END

THE THINGS WE NEVER HAD, REMAIN

By DOROTHY LEE RICHARDSON

Many times, oh many times since the day of my cruelty
When I sent you away,
I have wished that I might see you before I die
To enchant you again with the luster of my eye,
Which was only the gleam of your own fire lit in me.

But too many years have crawled past;
I have missed that meeting
Too many times. Though, yes,
My eye might brighten, what is around it is old.
You are the only person for whom gold
Still means my hair, the only one for whom my face
Is still a magic pool in a moonlit place
Hiding the secret which was never told.

DI PIETRO

"We usually cling to the old custom of men and women guests' separating after dinner for coffee," says slim, blue-eyed Mrs. Pusey.

"When I entertain"

Mrs. Nathan Pusey tells her philosophy of entertaining to Nancy Crawford Wood.

"For parties, I like to depend on dishes that I've used before, and that I know are going to be good, rather than trying at the last minute to be more imaginative but less successful," says Mrs. Nathan Pusey, wife of the president of Harvard. "This is the most basic point about our entertaining."

The Puseys live in a beautiful ivy-covered brick house built over forty years ago by President Lowell of Harvard; its sunny, high-ceilinged rooms, decorated by Mrs. Pusey in blues and yellows—her favorite colors—are perfect for all kinds of entertaining, from a large tea for fifty or sixty people to a small luncheon or dinner for six or eight. A recent party in honor of Field Marshal Montgomery, for instance, began with a delicious scallop chowder, subtly flavored with bacon crumbles; then came a hearty mixed grill—small steaks with grilled tomatoes, sausages and mushroom caps—and string beans in a wonderful sour-cream sauce. Dessert was a big apricot tart.

"We give several men's dinners a month," says Mrs. Pusey—"all men, that is—and I guess I am getting to be something of a specialist in foods men like. When everything is ready—the flowers arranged, and the food well under way—the children and I go across the street to the Faculty Club for dinner and watch through the window as people ring our doorbell and go in!"

A dinner menu which has proved to be a great favorite with men might start with small cups of fresh grapefruit sections, lightly sugared, and flavored with fresh lime juice; then a delicious lobster thermidor, served with buttered asparagus or Lima beans. Dessert might be either a chocolate roll (a fluffy cake and whipped-cream mixture); or a feather-light chocolate mousse; or meringues filled with pistachio ice cream, served with chocolate sauce.

"For a big buffet party," says Mrs. Pusey, "I like to serve two hot main dishes; one of our favorites is curried eggs and mushrooms. With this, a spicy lamb casserole and hot buttered rice. My favorite salad of all is endive and water cress with a plain French dressing—oil, vinegar, pepper and salt. For dessert, lemon sherbet with fresh fruit—whatever is in season."

Hors d'oeuvres at the Puseys' are usually simple but delicious. "We like a mixture of red caviar and sour cream on dark pumpernickel bread," says Mrs. Pusey. "Chopped cooked shrimp, mixed with mayonnaise, onion and seasonings, and spread on toast, is another favorite. We love olives, green and ripe, and often serve a mixture of chopped eggs, olives, cream cheese and mayonnaise, seasoned with Worcestershire sauce."

Here are recipes from three of Mrs. Pusey's favorite party menus:

SCALLOP CHOWDER

Cook 1 pint scallops in small amount of water. Put through food chopper. Make a cream sauce by blending 3 tablespoons flour with 3 tablespoons melted butter. Add 3 cups light cream, scallops and water in which the scallops were cooked, plus 1 tablespoon minced onion sautéed in a little butter. Season lightly with salt and pepper; and if you like, add 3 or 4 tablespoons sherry. Garnish on top with crumbled crisp bacon. Makes 6 servings.

GREEN BEANS IN SOUR-CREAM SAUCE

Cook 1½ pounds fresh green beans, cut in French style, in salted water until tender; or use 6 cups cooked frozen or canned green beans. Drain, reserving the liquid. Cover the beans and keep warm while you quickly prepare your sauce. In a small pan, sauté 1 large onion, finely chopped, and 3 tablespoons chopped parsley in 3 tablespoons butter. Stir in 1½ tablespoons flour. Add ¾ cup liquid from beans and cook until thick. Add ¾ cup sour cream, 1½ teaspoons salt, ⅜ teaspoon pepper, 1½ teaspoons sugar and 1½ teaspoons vinegar. Pour over beans. Serve immediately. Makes 6 servings.

APRICOT TART

Mix 2½ cups cooked dried apricots with 1 cup of their juice (you will need about 2 cups dried apricots to start with), 1½ cups granulated sugar, 2 tablespoons melted butter and 3 tablespoons quick-cooking tapioca. Boil 5 minutes. Line an 8" piepan with pastry, pour in hot filling, cover with crust, and bake in a hot oven, 425°F., for 30–40 minutes. Makes 6 pieces.

LOBSTER THERMIDOR

Split two 1½-pound boiled lobsters lengthwise. Remove lobster meat and cut into good bite-sized pieces. Clean the shells and wash well. Simmer 2 cups cooked lobster meat and ½ cup sliced mushrooms in 2 tablespoons butter. Add ¼ teaspoon paprika and 5 tablespoons chicken stock plus 3 tablespoons lemon juice or, if you prefer, ½ cup sherry. Cook 2 minutes. Sprinkle with 2 tablespoons flour. Mix lightly. Beat 2 egg yolks with 2 cups light cream, and stir into the lobster mixture. Cook gently until smooth and thickened. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Put mixture into the half shells, packing well. Sprinkle with grated Cheddar cheese. Brown under broiler. Makes 4 servings.

CHOCOLATE ROLL

Beat 4 eggs well. Gradually add ¾ cup sugar. Beat until thick and light. Then fold in ½ cup flour and ½ teaspoon baking powder. Fold in 2 squares unsweetened chocolate, melted, 2 tablespoons sugar, 3 tablespoons cold water, ¼ teaspoon baking soda and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Butter a deep cooky sheet, about 16" x 10". Then line with buttered wax paper. Spread mixture evenly in pan and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., 25–30 minutes. Remove from pan. Dust with confectioners' sugar and turn out on towel sprinkled with confectioners' sugar. Roll up immediately in towel and leave until cool. Unroll and spread with whipped cream to which a level tablespoon sugar and a few drops of almond flavoring have been added. Roll immediately, before cake dries and edges break. Makes 6–8 servings.

CHOCOLATE MOUSSE

Scald 1 cup milk with 2 squares unsweetened chocolate, ¼ cup sugar and 1 teaspoon unflavored gelatin. When chocolate and gelatin are dissolved, beat until smooth and well blended. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla. Strain into refrigerator tray or bowl. Chill until mixture thickens, beat until light, then fold in 2 cups heavy cream which has been beaten until stiff, and to which ½ cup sugar has been added. Freeze in refrigerator tray. Makes 1 quart.

CURRIED EGGS AND MUSHROOMS WITH CHEESE

Peel and cut 15 hard-cooked eggs into quarters. Sauté 1½ pounds sliced mushrooms in 2–3 tablespoons butter. Prepare 6 cups light cream sauce. Season with ¾ cup grated Parmesan cheese, 4½ teaspoons curry powder, 6 tablespoons chopped pimiento, 6 tablespoons chili sauce, and salt and pepper to taste. Bring the sauce to a boil and add the mushrooms, eggs and 6 tablespoons sliced canned water chestnuts. Pour mixture into baking dish and top with bread crumbs. Dot with butter and place under broiler until the crumbs brown. Makes 12 servings.

SPICY BARBECUED LAMB

Sauté 1 cup sliced onions and 2 cups finely diced celery in 6 tablespoons butter. Add 2 teaspoons dry mustard, 6 tablespoons brown sugar, 5 teaspoons salt and 2 teaspoons chili powder. Stir in 4 cups tomato juice, 1 small can tomato paste, 1½ cups water and ½ cup plus 1 tablespoon vinegar. Simmer for about 20 minutes. Add 6 cups lean lamb cut into good-sized chunks, and 18 peeled pearl onions. Simmer for 40 minutes or until the sauce has thickened and the lamb is tender. Makes 12 servings.

CHOSEN TO BE QUEEN

As one of the world's most eligible girls, her name already has been linked romantically with that of the young Prince Harald of Norway and England's party-loving Duke of Kent. Undoubtedly there will be others, for Margrethe—vividly blond in contrast to her mother's pale gold—gives promise of real beauty; she is only now emerging from youthful coltishness into slim grace. Last year she wore her hair almost like a boy's, because it was easier to manage that way. This year she has let it grow. She admits now (since suddenly she cares) that soft curls are more feminine, and much prettier with hats. Tall (5′10″) and supple from skiing, swimming and horseback riding, she selects her clothes with new care to minimize height and emphasize a small waist and slender legs.

Margrethe's growing interest in her appearance is natural; she is immensely interested in and curious about practically everything—but especially about all of nature. She has a special rapport with animals. Horses respond to her lightest touch; sea gulls, as abundant in her sea-girt country as pigeons in inland cities, fly to her feet. When she was nine she smuggled a chicken into her room, kept it and fed it for a week before it was discovered. On her thirteenth Christmas she told her parents, "Most of all I would like a membership card for the Society of Ornithology." It was under the tree on Christmas Eve. She has been an active watching and reporting member ever since.

Though Margrethe always liked school, she could never become immersed in purely scholastic work—an attitude her father, once one of Europe's noted playboys, does not condone but understands quite well. Early in her years at Zahle's he asked her how school was going. "Oh, wonderful!" she told him. Encouraged at this sign of scholarship, Frederik probed further. Was it mathematics she liked best? Geography? None of these. Margrethe, whose contacts with other people had been pleasant but hardly intimate, explained enthusiastically, "The best thing of all is milling around and pushing and shoving in the corridors."

But if scholarship for its own sake fails to set her afire, knowledge applied to life excites her. When her grandfather, Sweden's King Gustav VI, told her about his interest in archaeology and in the mysterious civilization of the ancient Etruscans, Margrethe went home and devoured hitherto uninteresting books on history and geology. Then she went back to the old king. "I've thought about it," she told him, "and I'd like to go with you." She joined him for a week at his villa at San Giovannale di Berra near Rome, and every day the two of them went out in sneakers and pants and short-sleeved shirts and grubbed in the earth around the Roman Cassia Way—eventually uncovering an Etruscan tomb filled with burial equipment, terra-cotta vases, and cooking utensils.

When the proposal was first made to change the rules of succession, King Frederik and Ingrid worried about their daughter's reaction to the idea of being queen. Margrethe was a normally happy girl—but of the three daughters she tended most to be serious and introspective, and had been quite shy as a child, partly because of an early eye ailment later corrected by surgery. Her responses were more often emotional than reasonable or practical. A dead bird in the garden might prompt her sisters to brief dismay—and enthusiastic plans for its funeral; Margrethe, in tears, would hold the stiff little body in her hand, and wonder about its soul.

The girls had grown up with a minimum of "royal" atmosphere about them; Margrethe had been in school several years before any of them knew they were princesses. Even then the discovery made little difference in their lives.

Margrethe first read about the proposed constitutional change in a newspaper. She asked about it—but her father answered vaguely. A few months later she and her mother and sisters were visiting a British playground, and while the younger girls rode the merry-go-round the queen had a quiet talk with her eldest daughter. She explained to Margrethe that she might someday be queen, told her of the responsibilities of sovereignty, and of its deep satisfactions.

Apparently she explained it well. Through accepting new responsibilities Margrethe has grown in poise and assurance; she truly seems to enjoy her new role. In May she filled her first important official royal function when she joined her parents in greeting Britain's Queen Elizabeth II and Prince Philip as they stepped ashore in Copenhagen harbor from the royal yacht Britannia. She rode with her mother and Philip in an open car behind her father and Elizabeth, and later in the colorful cortege of royal state coaches to the state reception and banquet. At the ballet, Margrethe sat in the "cavaliers' box" adjoining the royal box while the crowd cheered her mother and father and Elizabeth and Philip. Then they shouted, "Margrethe! Margrethe!" until her father brought her into the royal box to stand beside them, proudly acknowledging her own cheers.

Most of the time, though, Margrethe's life is calmer. She is studying Latin, history, geography, mathematics, natural science, and the mythology that so pervades Danish literature and art. Since the royal family, like most of Denmark, is Lutheran, she is also taught the basic principles of the Christian religion. Margrethe is quick at languages, reading and speaking fluently five besides her own—Swedish, Norwegian, English, French and German. She rides horseback several times a week, and receives swimming instruction at the State Institute for Gymnastics, where many of Denmark's leading athletes train.

Next year she will get her certificate corresponding to the American high-school diploma. Then she may take work at Copen-agen University—both her father and grand-ther took university degrees—or stay home o be tutored further in international law, con-itutional law and national economy.

In liking to do things herself—as well as get ff occasionally by herself—Margrethe is like er mother, a pale slender blonde who looks elpless and fragile. It is the queen to whom Margrethe probably confides her most per-onal worries and hopes, whose counsel she ollows in such matters as cosmetics, clothes nd manners, and who guides her basic think-ng in the gradual growth from girl to woman.

The women of the House of Glücksburg ccasionally go off together, leaving Frederik o fend for himself. For the past several win-ers they have gone to Norway for a week or wo of skiing, at which the queen excels. While till a Swedish princess, Ingrid learned to cook nd won an award for her skill; she has taught his art to her daughters. She also knits and ews, and during the occupation made many f her daughters' clothes. She is thrifty: not ong ago she overestimated the amount of arn she needed for a sweater—and returned he extra to the Copenhagen department store or credit!

Actually, both the king and queen are in-dependently wealthy through inheritance and nvestments, of which a large amount is in ousing and real estate in Copenhagen. But hey prefer to leave most of this untouched and ive on the king's income.

Much of the queen's time is spent at meet-ngs of various women's organizations, visit-ng, speaking or advising on projects, and in philanthropic work. She especially enjoys working among children. Every Christmas she travels to North Slesvig—an area returned to Denmark by Germany after World War I—with clothing and gifts collected from the rest of the country, and the king joins her there for a few days before the holidays. Last year Margrethe went, too, to help sort gifts and fit the coats and dresses on the children.

At first glance, the queen's physical likeness to former ambassador Clare Boothe Luce is striking—the clear, cameo complexion, the pale hair springing softly from a center part around perfectly even features. Ingrid has excellent taste in clothes, and a special flair for dressing for royal appearances: to avoid looking like a mushroom beside her 6′ 4″ husband and her statuesque daughter, she chooses slim coats and skirts for daytime; only in the evening, with the added height of a tiara, can she afford the great sweeping skirts she loves, in creamy brocaded satins.

Ingrid, gentle and exquisitely mannered, has had a gentling effect on her husband. In his youth Frederik was regarded throughout Europe as a gay blade—perhaps rather too gay. Copenhagen was known then as now as the "Paris of the North," and Frederik took full advantage of its twenty-four-hour night life. He enlisted in the navy in 1917, attended the Danish naval academy, went on to serve as commander of fishery-protection vessels, torpedo boats and warships.

He took little interest in royal responsibilities; on shore leave he liked to have fun and see people, especially attractive young women. His subjects and his father, Christian X, despaired of his ever settling down. His one quiet interest was music—and it was music which led him to marriage. For in 1934 when his friend Georg Hoeberg, late conductor of the Copenhagen Royal Opera, went to fill a guest spot in Stockholm, Frederik went too—and stayed to be charmed by Princess Ingrid. Their engagement was announced a month later. Next year Frederik left the navy, and—except for a brief return during World War II—has since devoted his energy to being prince and, since 1947, king.

Frederik still loves music. He keeps grand pianos in all the royal residences and on the royal yacht; and should a guest be so careless as to leave a damp glass on one of these, Frederik is likely to rush over, remove the glass, and if necessary dry off the surface. He plays competently, composes, and has frequently conducted such noted orchestras as the Royal Guards, the National Symphony and the National Radio Symphony Orchestra.

At least once a week Frederik and Ingrid see a play, opera or ballet at Copenhagen's Royal Theater or at some other theater. Often Margrethe and her sisters go too. Actually the family seems to prefer the smaller houses where they can slip in unobserved; at the cream-and-gold Royal, with its royal box, no one can miss their arrival—at which signal the entire audience stands to cheer, gives cries of "Long live the king," and nine rousing shouts of "Hurrah!" Often the Danish national anthem is played and sung for good measure, before the audience, with much bowing and smiling and waving of hands, settles down again and the play can go on. It is understandable that a nonroyal theater might occasionally seem a royal relief.

Copenhageners commonly say that their king is a man one likes without even knowing. However, every Copenhagener can know his king: according to a time-honored tradition that a Danish citizen shall always have free access to the monarch, Frederik makes no appointments on the first and third Mondays of every month—and often visitors are lined up outside the palace from all over the kingdom. Some of these merely want to thank the king personally for a job appointment or decoration. Others want to invite him to local festivities and jubilees. He is asked for advice on local community problems; he listens patiently to someone's new suggestion on solving the world crisis. Occasionally a visitor badly needs money, and if he seems deserving Frederik probably helps him out of his own pocket. As often as possible, Margrethe slips over from Amalienborg to sit in on these visits—they constitute a fascinating lesson in the tact and diplomacy required of a sovereign.

The king is all action, decision; his face reflects his every reaction; his unusually warm smile seems intimate even when directed toward a crowd of 40,000. Utterly unself-conscious, he is particularly appealing when he shows affection for his family in public—scooping up a daughter to kiss her, gently guiding Ingrid through a crowded room, smiling at something she tells him.

If Ingrid has softened him, he has helped her relax and enjoy royal living. She smiles more readily and no longer worries over a last-minute lapse in protocol. And a good thing, too—because Frederik cannot always contain his restless energy, his impatience at events that move too slowly. When he and Ingrid inspect a public institution, he likes to look it over and get on with other business. At a sanitarium recently Frederik made a quick round of the wards and then went out to talk with hospital officials and committee members. Ingrid lingered with patients in the wards. The king waited. And he waited. And he waited. Finally, in full-dress admiral's uniform, he flung himself down on the grass and demanded, "Where is she?"

It was the king who nicknamed Margrethe "Daisy" when she was a baby. Now, as she learns how to be queen, it is he who will be her chief mentor. For some, the idea of quick, impatient Frederik as teacher might seem appalling; for Margrethe, he should prove ideal. The two enjoy each other's company immensely, whether jesting lightly or discussing a serious topic, plotting the course of the royal yacht or trying to hold onto a squealing piglet at the Bellahoej National Fair. They react identically, and their expressive faces change constantly; watching them on the same platform is like watching two people with the same central nervous system—both solemn one moment, then without a glance both breaking into smiles that warm and illuminate those about them. Frederik's advisers think he will find teaching Margrethe his job the most fun he's had as king.

One trait Frederik shares with no member of his family is early rising. He is up, full of energy, as soon as it is rightfully day and long before the family breakfasts at eight; Margrethe and her mother would skip breakfast with pleasure for a little extra sleep. Last spring, during preparations for the visit of England's royal couple, Frederik decided they should run through the harbor welcoming ceremony just once more, so he got everyone out to the docks early Sunday morning. The Royal Guards flawlessly (if sleepily) executed God Save the King, but the king found fault with the line-up of dignitaries. They switched about, and all went through their paces again while the king strode about briskly taking snapshots—and Ingrid and Margrethe stifled yawns.

Amalienborg Castle—where Margrethe studies from breakfast until shortly before five, when Benedikte and Anne-Marie return from school and the family gathers for tea in the Knights' Hall—is the center of the royal family's activities. It is the palace they think of as home, although during the year they may live in a number of other places. The Copenhagen palace, a huge baroque building considered one of Europe's finest examples of rococo architecture, contrasts sharply with the pretty pastel houses of Denmark, and its more typical castles—usually unreal as fairy tales or as mysterious and gloomy as Hamlet's Elsinore. Through the years, Ingrid has brightened up the interior of Amalienborg with clean modern touches; but the outside remains unchanged—heavily ornate, grandly formal.

From her window at Amalienborg, Margrethe can see the ocean and the ships moving into and out of the harbor; can almost see the touching statue of Hans Christian Andersen's Little Mermaid gazing wistfully out to sea from a rock near shore. The Little Mermaid was her favorite childhood story, and a sketch she drew to illustrate the tale once won her a prize in a school competition.

Margrethe began her education at Amalienborg when she was five, in a kindergarten her mother formed at the palace, with twelve other boys and girls attending. At seven she entered Zahle's, the school her sisters attend now—they are treated with informality but always addressed formally as Princess Benedikte and Princess Anne-Marie. After eight years at Zahle's Margrethe spent a year in an English boarding school, North Foreland Lodge, near Basingstoke. The king and queen wanted her to meet middle-to-upper-class girls her own age, and live a community life away from her family for a while; they made it crystal-clear to school authorities that they wanted no royal welcome or royal treatment for their daughter. For the first time last fall Margrethe's education was entirely in the hands of private tutors (in contrast to the British queen and her sister, who were taught exclusively by tutors); but her curriculum is still planned and supervised by her old mentor at Zahle's, Miss August Margrethe Friis.

All the little blond princesses have taken dancing lessons at Miss Inge Dam's Dancing Institute in a suburb of Copenhagen. Every year Margrethe gives a dinner dance for three or four dozen young people, including old friends from Zahle's and sons and daughters of her parents' friends from all over the country. For dinner, which lasts about two hours, Margrethe plans several courses—perhaps orange salad and roast pork, veal in cream sauce served with dry red wine, and an ice. Afterward there is dancing in the Knights' Hall, and except for the grandeur of the gray-and-gold mirror-paneled room, the party might be for teen-agers anywhere. The boys, whose average height is just beginning to top the girls', wear dinner jackets; the girls, in swirling off-shoulder ball gowns colored like flowers and stiffened by layers of fluffy petticoats, are reflected dazzlingly in mirrors on all four sides of the room. While the young people dance and sip a light punch, the king and queen entertain friends in an adjoining salon.

Margrethe has been attending dances for about four years. One of the earliest and most exciting (at a boys' school, Herlufsholm) was also memorable for its lesson in royal humility. Margrethe and her mother had planned her dress for weeks—it was perfect. Her hair curled beautifully. Her date was the eighteen-year-old Count Ulrik Ahlefeldt-Laurvig. Margrethe felt so poised, so pleased with her appearance that she was neither surprised nor impressed when the handsomest boy in the room asked her to dance—and she accepted, although they had not been introduced. As they danced, she attributed his nervousness to awe, and kindly tried to help him relax. She succeeded—too well. Within minutes he had confessed his real reason in asking her to dance—to win a week's allowance from his roommate!

That incident happened long ago. Now Margrethe is concerned with more serious matters. For next April she begins her official apprenticeship. She will act as regent in her father's absence, a duty now assigned to her uncle, Prince Knud.

When she becomes crown princess, Margrethe will be assigned her own income, or appanage, and her own lady in waiting, who will act as her secretary and go shopping with her to pay for all her purchases and arrange for their delivery—since such details are not supposed to concern royalty. The amount of her appanage, however, will not be determined until next spring.

After Margrethe is queen, her signature will be required to put into effect any council decisions or measures passed by parliament, with ministers countersigning. She will have the power to break a parliamentary tie, and to call up troops without waiting for parliamentary approval in case of aggression against the homeland—although any extension beyond the initial call would have to be authorized by parliament. As sovereign she will be Grand Master of the Royal Orders of the Elephant and the Dannebrog, which means "flag of the Danes" and is also the name of the royal yacht. (President Eisenhower, awarded the Order of the Elephant after the Allied victory in World War II, is one of the few non-royal persons ever so honored.)

Margrethe's appanage as queen will be determined by parliament, as it is each time a new ruler is crowned, according to the country's cost-of-living index. Frederik receives 2,500,000 kroner a year (about $325,000), which seems a sizable amount, but from which must be subtracted incomes for other members of the royal house, salaries of lesser court officials, and salaries of the staffs in their various residences. Members of the royal family also make large philanthropic contributions, and are expected to live in a manner suitable to their station, both at home and abroad.

Eventually Margrethe will move into her own palace across the square from Amalienborg—which actually is not one but four castles built about the square. One of the others is the ruling monarch's guesthouse, where England's Elizabeth and Philip stayed last spring; the other is now at the disposal of Prince Knud.

Of all their castles, Fredensborg looks most the way a royal castle in Denmark should look—classic, shining white, with brilliant dark blue tile roofs. Its 422 rooms are said to have 20,000 windowpanes, one of which bears the signature "Winston Churchill"—scratched by the Prime Minister with his diamond ring during a visit in 1950. Fredensborg is surrounded by spacious lawns and tall elms and beeches that turn gold during the royal family's autumn visits. Here Frederik's great-grandfather Christian IX—known as the father-in-law of Europe because he supplied so many daughters for her scattered thrones—entertained the Czar of Russia and the Empress Dagmar, the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alexandra, and other royal relatives of European courts.

The palace at Marselisborg on Aarhus Bay was the favorite summer residence of Frederik's parents. Frederik and Ingrid, however, prefer the cooler, prettier one at Graasten, in southern Jutland. With its bell tower and light plaster finish outside, it looks like an old New England church; and inside, Ingrid's skillful redecoration has resulted in a light, uncluttered atmosphere.

But the favorite home-away-from-home is Trend, the gift of 80,000 Danish citizens to Ingrid and Frederik shortly after their marriage. Trend is a one-story brown wooden house on a small lake fringed with rushes and surrounded by 1200 acres of pine forest and moor, well stocked with game. Here they spend Christmas, Easter and Whitsuntide; here they can be utterly alone. The household staff is one maid—on her day off, the boy delivering groceries to the back door is likely to be told, "Come right in!" by a queen elbow deep in soapsuds and three princesses standing by with dish towels.

Their other lodges are Eremitagen, at the famous deer park at Klampenborg seven miles north of Copenhagen, where the king often holds large state luncheons; and another on the Fredensborg estate.

Yachting on the Dannebrog—a superb 244-foot, 1200-ton vessel with a dining room that can seat 40 guests—the king and queen and their daughters have become personally acquainted with as many of their subjects as any royal family in history. They spend about six weeks a year on the Dannebrog, liking best to cruise at random, anchor, and turn up unexpectedly in a community to meet the people. In the past seven years they have been in almost every fiord and on every island in the Danish archipelago, and the princesses have met children in every part of the country, in places where residents have never before seen royalty and are so isolated that they still wear the old provincial folk costumes—long gathered skirts in hand-woven designs, hats decorated with colorful ribbons.

It was during Elizabeth and Philip's visit that talk started of a possible match between Margrethe and the Duke of Kent, whose reputation for wild driving, unconventional companions and abandoned party behavior—pitching friends in full evening dress off a yacht into the Thames, sprinkling passers-by with pink champagne from a Mayfair rooftop—caused Philip to take him aside for a lecture on royal behavior. The duke's antics might conceivably find a core of sympathetic understanding in King Frederik—but it is doubtful that such pranks would appeal to Queen Ingrid. As for the Danes in general, most chose not to believe the rumors. "It can't be true," people said. "She's so young." And so far there is no strong evidence that it is true. Sources "close to the palace" are said to describe the reports as "premature."

When Margrethe becomes Queen of Denmark, of the Wends and the Goths, Duchess of Slesvig, Holstein, Stormarn, Ditmarken, Lauenborn and Oldenborg—the fiftieth ruler in 1000 years' unbroken rule of Gorm the Old's descendants, and sovereign of the oldest continuous kingdom in the world—she will be the Danes' second queen—and their second Queen Margrethe.

The first Margrethe was daughter of King Valdemar Atterdag. She was not born to be ruling queen either—but she had inherited the fierce drive and courage of such vivid nobles as Sven Forkbeard and Harald Bluetooth, who Christianized the Danes in ways that were not always Christian and who used the church to strengthen the authority of the monarchy.

In 1363, when Margrethe I was ten, she was given in marriage to Prince Haakon Magnussoen, who became ruler of Norway. Haakon was unremarkable as king, but Margrethe was a strong woman undeterred by the inferior position women held in those days; together they reigned successfully over the Norwegians. When Margrethe's father died, she had her son Oluf put on the throne of Denmark—and dominated him as she dominated her husband. Then Haakon died. Too clever to seek the crown for herself, Margrethe bided her time while Oluf added his father's Norwegian throne to his own Danish one, and contented herself with behind-the-scene manipulation of both kingdoms. She made her influence felt so profitably by the nobles through her shrewd reorganization of crown lands and revenues that when Oluf died suddenly she had little trouble establishing herself as rightful queen.

Then she turned her eyes to Sweden. For years Sweden had been wearing herself out in her efforts to resist the political, military and economic offenses of the Germans. Margrethe sympathized, offered to help, and began helping before her offer was even accepted. The grateful Swedes felt that they should repay her in some way. Margrethe thought of the way. In 1397 nobles of Denmark, Norway and Sweden signed the Kalmar Union uniting the three countries under one crown—hers.

She went on to gain control of Jutland, and was encroaching on other castles when she died in 1412. No other ruler was able to match her reckless courage or inspire her loyalties; after a few hundred years of less dynamic leadership, the countries fell apart again. The medieval Chronicle of Lubeck records: "When men saw the wisdom and strength that were in this royal lady—wonder and fear filled their hearts."

The modern Margrethe knows this story, as does every Danish school child. She thinks it fascinating—but more like the legends and mythology of her country than a true story of a real woman. For, despite the fact that she herself has caused an age-old tradition to be abandoned, the second Margrethe is still hardly more than a child, with a sense of unreality about her future. The crown is a long, long distance away. She sees little similarity between herself and her fiery progenitor. END

Gran'ma used to say,
"You'll rue the day. . . .
Why won't you learn to sew?
And speak when spoken to
But not talk back; instead of reading books
Why can't you learn to cook?"

"You'll be sorry, miss,"
She said. "You'll wish
That you'd been kinder to the Jones boy.
That one's a comer, and bound to get ahead.
It's just as easy to love a man with money," Speaking as one who hadn't, this gran'ma said.

"There's sorrow meant for you,"
She warned. "And pain. You'll rue
This walking in the rain, when you've rheumatics!
Why can't you stay when people come to call
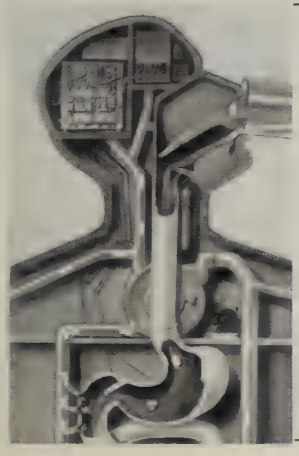
And talk awhile? There's lonely days Ahead for you, unless you mend your ways."



And gran'ma, if you're listening . . .
It all came true.
I never learned to cook, nor love the Jones boy;
My bones have ached with walking in the rain
And I've been lonely. But I'm a stubborn girl.
I cannot rue!

When you can't take time out...take BUFFERIN®

BUFFERIN acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve pain

Won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does

1. Medical science knows that a pain reliever must get into the blood stream to relieve pain.

2. Bufferin combines aspirin with two antacid ingredients. These speed the pain reliever out of the stomach and into the blood stream twice as fast as aspirin. So . . .

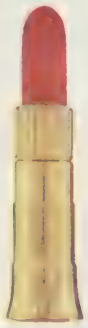
3. Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve pain. And it won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does.

When pain makes you feel that you can't possibly go on, remember this:

Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin . . . to relieve headaches, painful cold miseries, muscular pains and other discomforts. (Diagram, left, shows why.)

What's more, Bufferin won't upset your stomach as other aspirin pain relievers often do. You can even take it in the large, continuous doses often needed for temporary relief of minor arthritic pain with no ill effects.

Ask your doctor about faster, safer Bufferin for your aches and pains. Many doctors recommend it.



If you suffer from the pain of arthritis or rheumatism, ask your physician about Bufferin.

Studies are being made of the mental and emotional states of women going through childbirth. Doctors are recognizing that a woman is human, even while bearing a baby.

What causes Third-Day Blues?

By GLADYS DENNY SHULTZ

Many women experience an attack of apparently causeless depression soon after childbirth. No one is sure why, but one doctor speculates that it is caused by the clash between the new mother's need for intimate care and the impersonal handling provided by modern hospitals.

You may hear young mothers refer to the third-day blues casually and matter-of-factly, as a part of childbirth lore.

"They hit me as a sudden, terrible fear for my baby's safety," says one. "I just knew something dreadful was happening to him in the hospital nursery. Yet nothing could have been more ridiculous. The hospital was top-ranking, the nursery was beautifully conducted. I realized that, underneath. Just the same, I badgered the head nurse until finally she had my baby brought to me to prove that he was all right."

"It was my husband who got the scare from my third-day blues," laughs another. "The minute he stepped inside my hospital room that day I began to cry, though I hadn't the least idea why. Poor Bill thought he had done something awful. What a relief when the doctor happened to come by and say, 'It's only the third-day blues!'"

These young women seem to take it for granted that a period of depression or of groundless anxiety is to be expected after a baby's birth, even though the birth has been normal and the baby perfect. A large number of doctors and nurses do too. In many preparation-for-labor classes, expectant mothers are told about this phenomenon, so that they—and their husbands—will not be alarmed if it makes its appearance.

But what is it? What causes it? What proportion of new mothers experience it? There are bewilderingly contradictory answers.

Some authorities attribute the third-day, or baby, blues to exhaustion after labor, others to hormonal changes in the mother's body. Either theory would make them almost universal. But a prominent obstetrician says, "The third-day blues? We don't see them in our hospital any more, now that the mothers are up and about soon after delivery and going home on the fourth or fifth day." An obstetrical nurse counters his statement with, "The obstetricians often aren't aware of the mothers' depression, for the blues come and go. You would have to be around all the time to know." While a pediatrician comments, "Many of my mothers get them on the fifth or sixth day, after they are home from the hospital. They call me up in utter despair." Dr. Grantly Dick Read confirms that the depression may strike on the fifth or sixth day after childbirth instead of the classic third.

On one point all experts agree. The third- or fifth- or sixth-day blues, as the case may be, must be distinguished sharply from the psychoses which attack some women after delivery. The most normal woman may experience the third-day blues, though the more neurotic and those with real troubles are likely to feel them most. The deep, unreasoning depression vanishes after a siege of weeping or of unfounded fears. But is it natural and unavoidable?

One of the very few authorities to study women undergoing the third-day blues is Dr. James Clarke Moloney, famous Detroit psychiatrist. He denies that the baby blues are due to physical causes. In many instances the new mother has been calm and cheerful up to this point, as would hardly be the case if her trouble were physiological.

"If you question the mother carefully," states Doctor Moloney in an article in the Child-Parent Digest, "you will find that she is moody, despondent, gloomy. She feels hopeless, helpless and inadequate, unloved and unlovable. She may have a feeling of thickness in the head, she may be unable to think and concentrate, her reactions may be sluggish. The foregoing are symptoms of mental depression, whether they appear after childbirth or under any other set of circumstances. And at the center of every case of mental depression is a core of anger, bitterness or frustration."

Why should a new mother, who has been delivered successfully, who is rapturous over her baby, suffer from anger, bitterness, frustration? When a woman is normal, with normal maternal instincts, says Doctor Moloney, it is due in large measure to things that have been done to her in the course of the usual hospital delivery.

At the top of his list of these things, Doctor Moloney puts the fact that the hospitalized mother bears her baby in a place associated in many minds with the death of a loved one, or pain experienced in a severe illness or operation. The very smell of ether as the expectant mother enters may revive long-buried memories and fears. There follows a succession of events, any one of which may stir the woman up emotionally or add to her apprehension about the ordeal.

After being "processed," in many hospitals she is put in a drab labor room. Her own doctor may not show up until it is time to go to the delivery room, occasionally not then. While undergoing labor pains, she may have an unfortunate interchange with a nurse or nurses, maybe an intern or two, or perhaps be ignored entirely.

The usual practice of barring the husband from the "Stepping out tonight?" asked Teddy when he saw my new plaid Carter's sleeper. "My, you have lots of evening clothes!" "That's because," I said, "everyone knows Carter's soft cotton knit sleepers make smart gifts for me—timesaving, no-iron gifts for Mother, too." Teddy twirled in front of the mirror, "I'd love to go to Dreamland, too, but I haven't a thing to wear! How do you get there?" "On my Safety-Step feet, of course! They'll get me there in a snap." Teddy counted the snaps on my Gro-Feature waist and laughed. "I think you'll get there in four snaps!" Isn't he a clever bear?

delivery room at the very time when a wife needs him most can be a strong frustration. And according to Doctor Moloney, it is very frustrating for the normally constituted woman to have her baby taken away from her when she is unconscious from sedatives or anesthetics. On these points, Doctor Moloney is backed up by considerable psychiatric and psychoanalytical opinion.

When she wakens, the new mother is in a high hospital bed, designed for the comfort of doctors and nurses rather than for that of the patient. She fears she may slip if she tries to get out of bed, that the baby may fall from the bed and be hurt.

Hospital schedules, also, are devised for the convenience of the staff, rather than the patient. Often these do violence to the natural rhythms of mother and baby for eating, sleeping and other processes.

All the foregoing are routine in perhaps the majority of hospitals today. In addition, the mother may feel frustration because of the attitudes of certain nurses, or the hospital authorities, or maybe her own doctor. This is particularly true where a mother wants to breast-feed her baby, for in many places she feels there is almost a concerted effort to keep her from doing so.

She may be talked into bottle feedings until her milk comes in, spoiling the baby for suckling at the breast, denying the mother's breasts the stimulation of the baby's suckling. Declares Doctor Moloney, "There are many instances—and I assure you they are not rare—in which the babies, unknown to the mothers, have been fed in the nursery before they are taken to the mother's room, by nurses who were hostile to breast feeding." The mother is told her milk is insufficient, or no good. She thinks she has failed her baby, is inadequate as a woman and a mother. According to Doctor Moloney, subtle sabotage of breast feeding by personnel who don't believe in it may take place even in rooming-in units and in hospitals which profess to encourage breast feeding.

The great advantage which women have in the world is that most women understand men a vast deal better than any man understands women. Since knowledge is power, woman has a control over man which man never has over her. To man she is always in the last resort untamable and unintelligible, whereas to her man is a simple, if massive, creature whose subtleties, when occasionally he is subtle, are much more intelligible to her than to other men. There is no complexity of the male character which the woman does not understand, and there are scarcely any complications of the feminine character which the man can really unravel. This accounts for the good humor with which the vast majority of women accept the crude mechanical power which man exercises by his laws and political tendencies.

J. A. SPENDER
Comments of Bagshot

The foregoing are some of the ways in which a usual hospital delivery may provoke feelings of anger, resentment or frustration in normal women. Yet many are not aware, on the conscious level, that they are angry or bitter or frustrated. Modern women have been taught that a hospital is the place to have a baby. They must accept whatever is done. They have no right to complain. The well-bred woman swallows her anger, thrusts resentments or frustration reactions way down deep. The result, says this psychiatrist, is the third-day blues. Doctors and hospitals, he adds, may fail quite honestly to see a connection between their procedures and the third-day blues. For they don't realize that what to them is all part of the day's work may be acutely distressing to a woman who is going through labor or childbirth.

Many women, as it happens, have testified to this effect. Here is a mother who had only recently moved to the city where her first baby was born, knew no one, was dependent for information on her doctor, who gave it grudgingly:

"My husband was allowed in the labor room part of the time, but was chased out whenever the intern or nurse came in, which was just when I wanted him most. He wasn't allowed in the delivery room at all, though I begged for him constantly.

"I told my doctor I didn't want gas, that I wanted to be conscious when my baby was born. He had said that would be all right, provided everything went well. But my doctor hadn't shown up by the time they took me to the delivery room. As soon as I was put on the table, they strapped my arms and legs down. When the anesthetist started to put the mask over my face, I broke loose and knocked him flat on the floor. It took two interns and a nurse to strap me back on the table again. The intern said, 'I'm going to put you under if it's the last thing I do.' Down went the mask over my face. I heard someone say, 'I can see two blue eyes!' just before I slipped into unconsciousness, fighting to the last to keep awake so I could see my baby."

Here is the way one woman felt when her baby was not brought to her at feeding time the second night, though she had impressed on both her obstetrician and pediatrician that she wanted to breast-feed her baby: "The nurse admitted it was strange, but that she was powerless to do anything about it, as her instructions were to keep my baby in the nursery. No reason given. She promised to phone my pediatrician, but I am sure she didn't. I had no way to reach my husband, my family, my doctor, anyone. I felt a prisoner; abandoned, trapped, helpless against the hospital system."

To the hospital staffs, no doubt, merely two troublesome patients. If these mothers became profoundly depressed, weepy, inexplicably anxious on the third or fifth or sixth day after childbirth, did someone remark cheerily, "It's only the baby blues"?

Conversely, many mothers, delivered under circumstances radically different from the foregoing, have testified to the beneficial effect on their spirits. "I can never express what it meant to me to have my husband with me throughout my labor and delivery." . . . "The nurses were sweet and considerate. They seemed to know what I was feeling, and would say something encouraging or do something to give me ease." . . . "My doctor came into the labor room and sat down and chatted with Dick and me for an hour or more, though there was nothing right then for him to do. It made me feel he wouldn't let anything happen to me. I went off to the delivery room as gaily as to a party." . . . "I will never forget the emotion I felt when they put my baby in my arms as soon as he was born."

Do mothers who have happy hospital experiences escape the third-day blues? Do mothers escape them when their babies are born at home? No one can say. So far as is known, nobody has bothered to find out.

But two Baltimore hospitals did try the experiment of decorating their labor rooms like boudoirs, with "escape" reading material on the bedside table, soothing music that the mother could turn on or off at will, and frequent friendly visits from staff members. It was found that women undergoing labor in these pleasant surroundings needed less anesthesia in the delivery room than the ones in the standard, prisonlike labor rooms. And that the most helpful thing of all was the friendly attentions from the staff.

Now, in several of our great medical schools, studies are being made of the mental and emotional states of women going through pregnancy and childbirth. Doctors and hospitals here and there are recognizing that antisepsis and improved medical techniques, highly laudable as they are, may not be the whole story in a successful delivery; that a woman is a human being, even while bearing a baby, and appreciates being treated like one.

Maybe someday doctors will get around to investigating the third-day blues. END going to be here myself tomorrow, so you can come right up."

"That will be even better," she said pleasantly. "Thank you so much, Mr. Garrick."

She hung up, and Sam sat by the phone, wondering what he would tell them at the office, and why he'd been so foolish as to say he'd be in. A girl he'd never met was being married next week, and he'd put himself in the awkward position of having to miss that conference with Peterson. It didn't make sense, but he decided finally that he'd say he had a bad sore throat and a slight fever.

To ease his conscience, he worked hard the next day on some specifications for a power plant. But occasionally his mind wandered. For instance, on the small pine bureau in the bedroom she'd left a blue china shoe, and a bottle with a stopper shaped like a rose. Often, when he stood in front of the mirror, adjusting his tie, he'd notice these feminine and useless objects, and think vaguely about his friends who were married, and the girls he knew, and the rather mysterious and challenging difference marriage must make in a man's life. But of course the china shoe and the crystal rose would have meant nothing to him, if he hadn't read that letter, trespassing on forbidden territory, unearthing thoughts and feelings certainly not meant for him.

At three the doorbell rang. He pressed the buzzer, then stood by the entrance, reminding himself sharply that a Mrs. Shipley from Greenwich was coming to get something out of a box in the hall closet. That was all it amounted to, and the whole matter was of no importance.

A moment later he heard footsteps and opened the door to a short, rather stout lady, whose air of authority came not from the tweed suit and plain hat she was wearing, but from some attribute less definable but far more impressive. The girl with her was of a different mold, slender, with a thin, sensitive face, and long dark hair, arranged in a sort of coil, low on her neck.

He hadn't thought of what to say, but it didn't matter, for Mrs. Shipley, though she was panting slightly from the climb, took over at once. "Mr. Garrick, this is very kind of you!" she exclaimed. "I don't believe you know my daughter, Constance? We are sorry to have to intrude, but we promise it won't take long." Her bright gray eyes scanned the room, noticing, he was uneasily convinced, every new stain and spot of dust. But she was too polite to plunge at once into the closet. Instead she sat erect in the straightest of the armchairs, and devoted ten minutes to friendly conversation.

Constance glanced around the apartment, too, but not as though she were looking for flaws. Rather, there seemed to be a wistful, home-coming air about her, as if she were remembering and really loved this place. She spoke very little, for it turned out that her mother was a talker, the kind who asks questions, and answers them herself. "Are you comfortable here, Mr. Garrick?" she asked. "I'm sure you must be! I told my daughter to be sure and leave all the necessary equipment. She furnished it herself, you know, from places on Third Avenue and goodness knows where. Naturally they're not the sort of things she'll want in her new home, are they, darling?"

Constance had no chance to reply, for her mother supplied the answer. "Such a perfect little house they're going to have, Mr. Garrick. Just what she's always dreamed of! We've discovered a really fine decorator too." With wry amusement she glanced at the pots of ivy, the bright cushions, the vaguely shabby sofa. "Well, I suppose you know how girls are! Constance did feel she wanted to have her fling before she married, a few months on her own. She studied archaeology at Columbia. Courses, that is; extensions, I believe you call them."

She paused for breath and Sam said uncertainly, "You mean digging up old ruins and things like that?"

"Yes." The daughter spoke for the first time. Her voice was low, almost muted. "It's really fascinating; you've no idea ——"

Mrs. Shipley laughed. "Imagine that, Mr. Garrick! Wanting to devote your life to unearthing statues and tombs and things."

"It isn't only that, mother ——" But then the low voice trailed off, the brief moment of animation died away. Sam didn't realize that he'd been watching her. But now he knew suddenly that she wasn't happy. She was too pale, and she looked tired, yet somehow resigned too.

"Well, Constance, my dear, we'd better get busy and find your things," Mrs. Shipley said happily. "She's being married next week, Mr. Garrick. Such a fine young man! Peter Westbrook. He's with Westbrook and Ames, his father's law firm, you know. They're almost our oldest friends, and the two children have been sweethearts as far back as I can remember." She smiled warmly, almost mistily, seeming less formidable now, more like a mother, a truly loving and devoted mother.

They both went to work in the closet, then, unearthing various things, and packing them away in a suitcase. Finally they said good-by. But before they left, Constance stood by the door, looking at the apartment, while something seemed to die away. It was a curious kind of sadness, almost an emptiness, and it was quite plainly there in her face when she looked for the last time at the nice, square, vaguely shabby room.

When they'd gone Sam tried to get back to work on the power-plant specifications. But a moment later he shoved those aside, and went into the bedroom, and got out the letter, which he'd been keeping in a bureau drawer, under his socks and handkerchiefs. He read it straight through, and he was sure she had never sent either this or anything like it. Yet she had written the words, she had felt them. . . . But perhaps she was the kind of girl who didn't trust her own feelings.

He felt angry, and rather miserable; too upset, in fact, to work. Finally he put the letter in his pocket and walked around the corner to a movie. Halfway through the picture he got up and left, and walked uptown a few blocks. There were one or two phrases that kept repeating themselves in his mind. "Perhaps I'm too sensitive about hurting other people." That, of course, could refer to her parents as well as this guy she was marrying. "Our families are so close that I'm not even sure I'll have the courage to send this." Well, it would take a lot of courage for a girl like that to break an engagement that had lasted for years. "I can imagine just how they will feel." She had written that, believing that all the others were as sensitive as she herself, as easily hurt. "A new understanding of what love can mean."

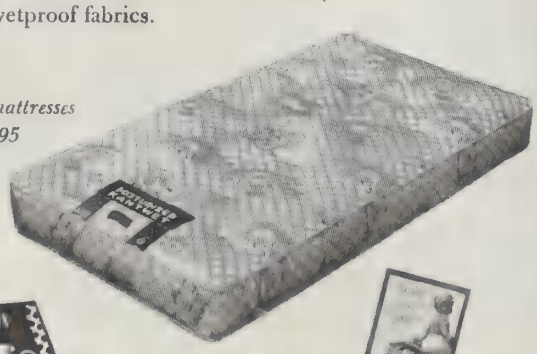
He turned abruptly, right in the middle of crossing 23rd Street. There was a blare of horns, and a taxi driver yelled, "Hey, buddy, what you think you're doin'?"

He ignored that, and walked back to the apartment, briskly this time. He went to the desk and got out a plain envelope and consulted the telephone directory. Then he printed the name and address on the outside of the envelope: Mr. Peter Westbrook, Jr., Westbrook and Ames, 40 Wall Street, New York. In the lower left-hand corner he marked it "Confidential." He slipped the letter inside, sealed and stamped it, then hurried around the corner and put it in a mailbox. As soon as he'd done that he felt slightly ill, and lightheaded, and decidedly guilty and ashamed, and faintly belligerent. He had a friend, Steve Dixon, who was giving a party that night. So he went to the party and met a pretty girl with curly blond hair, and thought about a girl who was too pale and too quiet, and had long brown hair, done in a coil at her neck, and long, interesting eyes—what color, gray, greenish? He couldn't remember.

The next day, and every day thereafter, he read—column by column—the society sections of the Times and the Tribune. Monday he found it, in a square box near the top of the page: "Mr. and Mrs. Bradford Shipley, of Greenwich, Connecticut, announce the indefinite postponement of the marriage of their daughter Constance to Mr. Peter Westbrook of Greenwich and New York. The engagement has been terminated by mutual consent."

So now I've done it! he thought, with an elation that was quickly dampened by shame. Just what had he done? Freed her? And had she wanted to be free? It was an unheard-of trick to play, an invasion of privacy quite foreign to his nature. He had never been a meddler, but somehow that letter had got under his skin. He tried to imagine Peter Westbrook reading it. What had he thought, how had he felt? And what kind of scene had they had afterward?



He told himself glumly that he'd had no right to play God in the lives of total strangers. But the feeling of elation persisted. She wasn't married, and this apartment was her home. Someday she'd come back, to get something, or cancel the lease, or renew it. Before

He wasn't quite sure when that would be, but after a few weeks he began to consider plans. He might get in touch with her about a new light in the kitchen. He could offer to pay for it, but say he wanted to check with her first. On the other hand, it might be better to think of some excuse that would really require her presence here. Redecoration, for instance; bookshelves, in that corner by the easy chair. Of course he realized, with a little prickle of apprehension, that she might easily guess that he was the one who had mailed the letter. She had good cause to be angry and resentful; but on the other hand, she might be glad. In any case, he must work out some way of getting together.

He kept mulling it over with increasing impatience. And then one day he returned from the office to find Mrs. Shipley just leaving the apartment, with a package of some sort under her arm. "Oh, Mr. Garrick!" she exclaimed. "I do hope you won't mind. The superintendent let me in with his key. My daughter needs some of her old notes and drawings, from that course she was taking, you know. She left them on the closet shelf."

"Of course," Sam said quickly. "Do come in, Mrs. Shipley. If your daughter—that is, she might like to come down herself and sort things over. Any time, just let me know."

"She can't very well do that, I'm afraid. At the moment she's in Italy."

"Italy!"

"She's married, Mr. Garrick. To a penniless young archaeologist, a nobody. They're traveling around Europe in one of those silly little foreign cars, digging up ruins." Mrs. Shipley sounded grim, but at the same time rather resigned, and more than a little incredulous. "In her letters—I can't understand it!—she seems like an entirely different girl! 'Life is heaven'—that's the kind of thing she writes. I can't imagine what they're living on—air, most likely. You just never know."

"That's right," Sam agreed quietly. "You never know."

After Mrs. Shipley had left, he wandered about the apartment, picking up the crystal bottle, putting it down again, standing in front of the big window with its pots of ivy. He tried to imagine her over in Italy with that young archaeologist, digging up ruins and living on air. What was it she had written her mother? "Life is heaven." And she had written something else: "A new awareness of what love can mean." Thinking about it, he felt empty and queer, yet vaguely expectant too. For now he knew what to look for, and someday soon he would find it.

AMID MY ALIEN CORN

attempt to explain the Moroccan adventure, why I wanted to farm again.

I had decided upon Spanish Morocco because, having lived in Tangier, I had some actual knowledge of the Moroccan farmlands. I knew there were rich areas watered by rivers (the Lukus where I was to farm was one of these) and that it was a good area for corn. There were times in Madrid when I found myself longing beyond all reason for a section of that rich Moroccan farmland where, so I dreamed, I would plant hundreds of acres of the finest American hybrid corn.

I chose hybrid corn because it seemed to me that this was the one crop, hitherto untried in Morocco, that would most benefit the country. Hybrid corn yields twice as much grain as ordinary corn seed. I had helped my father plant many acres of hybrid corn, and before its advent I had helped him plant many acres of ordinary corn, so I had observed at first hand the remarkable increase in yield that hybrid corn insures.

So I longed to plant hybrid corn in Morocco, and the longing came in the oddest times and places, and hit me hardest during one of my annual shopping trips to New York City. On a rainy day that interrupted the shopping orgies, the shows and the new movies, the dream of that farm floated up again. I picked up the telephone and called Mr. Henry Wallace in upstate New York, the man, more than any other in the world, responsible for the success of hybrid corn. He advised me to think of the climate in Morocco as approximating that of our Texas, and after shuffling around among his papers—I could hear them rustling over the phone—he recommended several types of seed that he thought would grow in Morocco.

That same rainy day, fired with Mr. Wallace's advice, I sought out a New York seed supplier. I leafed through his catalogue until I came to the C's and under "Corn" I selected two of the types of hybrid seed that Mr. Wallace had recommended.

"I'll take enough of those seeds to plant a thousand acres," I told the clerk, who was accustomed to supplying seeds in small paper bags for city terraces and back-yard gardens.

"Where shall I send them?" he asked politely, successfully masking his astonishment.

Then it occurred to me that I had no land on which to plant these fine fat seeds. I told the clerk to ship the seeds to our apartment in the center of Madrid and I left the store quickly, lest some difficulty arise about the shipping.

Having gone this far, it was easy—indeed, it was inevitable—to pick up the telephone and order a tractor.

"And where shall we send your tractor?" asked the clerk on the other end of the wire in Texas. I gave our Madrid address, hoping he was not acquainted with that city and could not share the vision that had flashed into my mind of our apartment building and our Spanish maids toiling up eight flights of stairs with a tractor and all the bags of corn seed that had been delivered at our door.

After I hung up the phone I stared down into rain-driven Fifth Avenue and knew a few moments of sheer panic. That was when I realized I had to cut short my New York visit, rush back to Spain, try to explain my purchases to Ricardo and ask his understanding aid in helping me to locate a thousand acres of farmland in Morocco, right away!

There is nothing enduring in life for a woman except what she builds in a man's heart. JUDITH ANDERSON

"I do know someone who has a farm in Morocco," Ricardo said. "Let me introduce you to this friend of mine. You'll like him a lot; you have much in common. And he just might be able to help you."

Shortly afterward, Ricardo took me to meet the major stockholder and active director of a farming company called The Lukus, comprising 20,000 acres of rich land along the Lukus River valley in Spanish Morocco.

He stood up politely as Ricardo and I approached. I saw a heavy-set man of about fifty years, with a round face and his gray hair thinning out on top. I disliked him instantly. His name was José Gomendio, with another name or two attached before or after, as all the Spaniards have; I shall just call him "Gomendio" from now on.

I think we drank some tea and I can suppose we ate some little cupcakes, because I have an unfailing appetite. Gomendio and Ricardo somehow arranged that I should go and see that farm of Gomendio's in Morocco, and if it met the requirements of hybrid-corn seed, I could plant my seed there. Gomendio was not particularly enthusiastic about this invitation. In fact, I could tell he liked me even less than I liked him. Ours was an arrangement we just drifted into; enthusiastically sponsored by Ricardo, who wanted to make me happy and who envisioned weeks of peace stretching out before him in my absence.

We talked back and forth for a time about what would be the best arrangement for planting the corn. With very little formality we drafted a contract that would make us farming partners.

I turned to Gomendio. "I must confess to you that I know almost nothing about that part of Spanish Morocco where you have the farm. I know that the Lukus farm follows a river bed, so the soil must be rich, but in spite of the months I spent in French Morocco and in Tangiers, I never learned much about the Spanish zone."

"You are not alone in your ignorance," Gomendio said. "There is very little outside interest in Spanish Morocco. We are a pretty backward zone compared with the French zone, and unless you had business there, as I have, you wouldn't look twice at it."

"You sound very unenthusiastic," I ventured.

"Not at all," he insisted. "I am just realistic. You will see for yourself soon enough."

The secretary appeared with the contract neatly typed and we sat at the desk, each reading a copy of it, line for line. The Lukus farming company supplied the land and I put up the seed and the supervision. The costs of production were to be paid from the income and the remaining money divided equally between the company and me. It was a fair enough contract for us both.

"Are you satisfied?" Gomendio asked me.

"Yes. Are you?"

For an answer, Gomendio signed the contract in his illegible scrawl and pushed it across his desk. I signed below his name with my own pen and in what I fondly think of as readable script.

Gomendio frowned at me through his cigarette smoke, and I could see he was trying to think how to tell me something. I waited.

"I know you are enthusiastic about this venture, but don't be disappointed if it fails."

"Why should it fail?" I asked.

"Morocco is too tough for a woman; you won't last long down there—the heat, the boredom, the apathy of the people and the hard work. You won't like it compared with life in Madrid."

I drew in a breath. "Boredom is all in the mind," I told him gaily. "As for the heat, I can never get hot enough for me. The hard work? I look forward to it! And people reflect whatever treatment they get, don't they? I'll last in Morocco all right. If I leave it will be because I am asked to leave."

"Asked to leave?" Gomendio echoed, widening his eyes in surprise at such an idea. "That is not likely."

Neither of us said anything more on that subject, but later I was to remember that little exchange.

Ricardo, my husband, viewed all these maneuvers to move out of his life for two or three months with mixed feelings. He would have preferred me to stay quietly in the apartment and occupy myself with the running of his household and the raising of his children, and it was not easy for him to be enthusiastic about my outside activity. On the other hand, in the most unselfish way he really wanted me to be happy; he was aware that I needed some outlet more active than our life in Madrid offered and so he consented to my new interest in Morocco. It was a subtle way of keeping me by letting me go.

Our sons were joyful at the thought of living a different life for several months. They would have welcomed any change that took them out of the apartment, but going to Morocco was something special.

"Will we shoot lions?" Ric, the oldest, asked, brandishing his Hopalong Cassidy revolver.

And I patiently explained, "We are going to North Africa, Ric, where there are no lions."

He looked crestfallen for a moment and then brightened again. "But we will see lots of camels! Maybe we can ride over the desert on a camel."

As for myself, I was terribly torn. In all our years of marriage, Ricardo and I had never been separated from each other for more than ten days or two weeks at the most, and this separation would be very strange. We arranged that whenever Ricardo's work permitted, he would fly to Tangiers and spend a few days with us, and whenever my work permitted I would return to Madrid to be with him. So, as always happens to us when we part for however short or long a time, we became a little sentimental; lumps came into our throats and the suggestion of tears in our eyes. I set out on the new adventure without thinking of turning back, but we already looked forward to being together again.

Gomendio, who spent most of his time in Madrid, attending to the business side of the farm's activities, materialized in Larache when I arrived in its main street with my new station wagon filled with children. He installed us all as guests in his own home, and after lunch, over coffee in the living room, he and I began to discuss the details of our contract and my more permanent living quarters.

We had no trouble confirming the details of our contract, but there was a disagreement between us over what constituted appropriate living quarters. When I brought up this subject, Gomendio wet his lips nervously and said, "There are many nice apartments here in Larache. I'll have someone from the office take you around to look at them this afternoon."

I looked out at Gomendio's magnificent view of the harbor. It was charming, and I could understand why Gomendio thought I should live in Larache, but I had come to Morocco to farm, not to admire the view.

As kindly as I could, I told him, "Thank you, but I plan to live right out on the farm. Larache is a good seven miles from where I shall be working," I reminded him. "And I can do so much more if I am as near as possible to the work."

"But Spaniards don't do it that way," he exploded. "The managers live in the town—the laborers are living on the farm. Besides," he said, "you are a woman. A woman cannot live out there alone. It is against our custom. There is also a certain amount of danger from the Arabs. How can we tell if they will receive your presence amiably or if they will resent you as an intruder and perhaps do something unpleasant?"

"I am not a Spanish woman. I'm American; and if we are going to farm, we live on our farms. It's as simple as that. The Arabs can be made to understand, I am sure."

We sat facing each other in a chilly silence, sipping our coffee grimly and ignoring the lovely view. We were two strong wills waiting it out, but in the silence I could feel Gomendio's defeat.

After the coffee, I borrowed Gomendio's jeep and joggled out to the farm to see if I could find a house of any sorts. The farm is 20,000 acres altogether. It is divided into five large sections: Adir Bajo, Adir Alto, Palafito, Nemsah and Meruan. These last two are old Arab names, as is the word "Adir." Bajo means low in Spanish and Alto means high—Low Adir and High Adir. "Palafito" is a kind of "little palace." On each of these five sections there is a center of population, a cortijo which goes by the same name as the section. For example, in the Adir Bajo section, the cortijo is called Adir Bajo also.

I drove through each of these five sections looking for something that would do for the many months I would be spending on the Lukus.

Adir Bajo began almost at the mouth of the River Lukus. To get down to Adir, at that time of year, one used the upper road that leads through the Palafito because the lower road was still deeply rutted from the winter rains. I was to take this trip almost every day through spring and summer, and always, coming up on the top of the rise which more or less separates the Palafito from the Adir lands, I would stop the car there, overcome by the beauty of the great Lukus Valley spread at my very feet. If my sons were along, they, too, would sit lost in admiration.

The hugeness of the valley, and of my own temerity in planning to put some of its vastness into cultivation, held me on that spot for a spellbound moment. Then I joggled on down into Adir Bajo. It was lowland and there were a fair number of trees along the banks of the Lukus. However, it was far from the parcels of land I would be planting. I imagined, too, that it would be very hot in midsummer and that there would be mosquitoes and malaria in the swamps.

I drove on, into Adir Alto. This valley settlement was the working headquarters of the Lukus farm; the business offices were in Larache. All the main farm buildings—the cortijo—were located in Adir Alto and I looked with interest at the machine shops, carpenter shops, blacksmith shop, stables and warehouses. These were to be my workshops; Adir Alto, my headquarters.

In the center of the establishment was a great, barren, sun-baked dirt square known as "the patio." Patio was a whimsical name to give this hideous square, wedged in between the Adir school, the head offices of the farm and two cavernous stables—one empty and the other crowded with horses and flies. It was in this patio that the men of The Lukus gathered in their idle moments for rest and "relaxation," and I saw several squatting there this afternoon, and was shocked by their apathy, their dejection. But what was there for them to do, once their work that wrung for them their right to exist was done, save to lean back against the wall, ill-nourished and bored and without hope, with nothing more to look forward to than the next day's work?

My memory of the dejected men sitting in the patio continued to depress me as I drove on. Things seemed brighter in the Palafito. This section of The Lukus is of a rich, reddish sandy soil that, given water, will grow anything. The populated part of the Palafito had been turned into a garden of Moroccan flowers and lawns, set into the center of 45,000 orange trees. I inquired about houses, but there was only one huge mansion, pretentious and not for me.

I drove farther across the valley, to Nemsah, the fourth section of The Lukus. The soil of Nemsah is an extension of the Palafito soil—sandy-red. But someone took the trouble to plant hundreds of eucalyptus trees there many years ago and a large pond has been made, surrounded by willows; adding to these another few thousand orange, lemon and grapefruit trees, it makes a cool spot in which to be on a hot summer day. Without bothering to look at the remaining section, Meruan, I decided to live in Nemsah.

As it happened, there was an empty house in Nemsah. The instant I saw it I knew that house was right for our peculiar needs. It was a compact little whitewashed villa, almost square, with bright blue window frames. The house even had a miniature garden, and not looking at the inside, I made up my mind to have it.

Back in Larache, I asked Gomendio. He wistfully mentioned again the apartment-in-Larache idea, but the shock of my living in the country had worn off and he agreed guardedly to my having the empty house in Nemsah.

That first week we followed the same routine each day. Just after daybreak we would pack a substantial lunch, pile into the station wagon and leave the Gomendio house in Larache. I would deposit my four sons and Pilar (our maid) in the Nemsah house and drive down to Adir Alto alone to get under way the preliminary work of planting the hybrid corn: the preparation of the ground, the conditioning of the machinery and the choosing of the laborers to do the work.

Whenever the farm work allowed, I would dash back to Nemsah and help Pilar in getting the house in shape. This house, so charming outwardly, presented a problem within. Although it was a tall, white and blue-trim villa that rose to the height of most two-story houses, the rooms inside were not proportionately large. On the contrary, they were all on one floor and squeezed together and small, and went straight up in the air, like chimneys. If you wanted any sensation of spaciousness, you had to look up at the ceilings; as soon as you looked at the four walls, you felt closed in.

But there was the garden, very tiny, but with several fine orange trees and some small squares of the coarse, spreading plant we call Bermuda grass. Because of its very simplicity that garden would be easy to put in order. And when the orange trees were in blossom, the most heavenly scent hung over all Nemsah.

The garden was walled in on all four sides, with a barred gate that sealed us off from the rest of the Nemsah cortijo. One of the first things I did was to take the lock off the gate and prop it open. Nobody else living in Nemsah had a gate, and I hoped by doing this I would be more promptly accepted as a real member of the cortijo.

My open-gate policy in Nemsah materialized many more children than I had realized lived in the dwellings scattered among the Nemsah cortijo buildings. Their number rose from the cautious three or four who appeared to play with my sons in those first days to an incautious, constant baker's dozen.

"La Banda," they called themselves. The Band.

Each morning when we arrived from Larache my four sons scattered like leaves to play with these new friends, and they returned only at lunchtime, and again in the evening. We would drive back, late at night, to Gomendio's house.

Much time was being wasted, driving to and fro, and I needed my days free for the land. We redoubled our efforts to get the Nemsah place in order; and at last Pilar and I had the house in fair enough shape, not only to receive us but also for any visitors who could brave the extreme informality of our lives and the lack of any luxuries.

As we moved on through March and into April, life in the household at Nemsah gradually took on a semblance of routine, while my outside life on the farm became more hectic.

My sons had certain duties. They were each to help with the garden and the outdoor work, and each had a special daily chore; one had to fill the coal scuttle, one to bring in wood for the fireplace, another emptied the garbage. When they were finished, they were free to play with the other Nemsah children.

As children often do with those they love, my sons took advantage of Pilar: hiding out in the orange groves when she called them, not eating their food when she was in a hurry, not taking their naps, playing little practical jokes on her. When she would finally break down in despair and weep and threaten to go back to Madrid, the four would gather around her quickly, patting her on the head and earnestly assuring her that now they were going to behave much better. And Pilar, convinced that they had reformed, would dry her tears and leap back into the battle.

All four of my sons had accepted their new life without a question and with no regrets for the confining apartment in Madrid. They missed their school friends, of course, but they launched into the Moroccan life as if it were a new adventure, and they stored up incidents to tell their friends when they went back to Madrid in the winter.

My sons meant to do their chores well, but the oldest was only ten, so they did need adult supervision. For this, I turned to the younger Arab men who were employed as day laborers. They did eight hours of work for The Lukus Company each day for about twenty-four cents a day. When they finished they would drift into my garden to help out. They loved children, and any time Pilar and I wanted to be away from the house, they acted enthusiastically as baby sitters. Almost children themselves, they played with my sons' toys and leafed through their picture books with childish glee. None of these young Arabs had much schooling. Some had learned to read and write at the few government schools that dotted Spanish Morocco, but when they reached the age of seven or eight, they were usually put to work by their families. They had no prospect at all of ever improving their lot, and yet these were the men of tomorrow who would be governing Morocco when she was free. It seemed to me that years were being wasted.

At first these Arabs eyed me with a natural suspicion for the unusual—I was a kind of magic witch who could do bad things if I wanted. But through little humane services, such as treating their frequent hurts or making them an occasional sandwich or giving them a cigarette, they very soon began to trust me and it was then they volunteered all the extra help around the house in Nemsah. They showed mild surprise that I would take the trouble to do them any small favors. And after the surprise came a showing of gratitude and a greater sense of "protection" for me; protection against those Arabs who did not know me well and might not show me enough respect.

The young Arabs came into and out of my house as if they were part of the family. They always knocked politely before entering, but they would have been astonished if anyone had said, "Do not come in." If they giggled too loudly when I was writing or reading, I could scold them as I did my own sons and they would not be offended. If I praised them for some work well done, they were proud. Even from the first weeks, I could tell that both these Arabs and the Spaniards were going to accept me. It made my life much easier; as if I were now a member of a team instead of an individual pulling against the rest of the team. Just the fact of my living on the farm instead of in Larache had been a terrific psychological advantage; the laborers associated me more with themselves than with the managers of Larache.

Before we could actually put the seeds into the ground, it had to be decided what seeds went into which ground. For this purpose, Gomendio called a first business meeting in the main office building of The Lukus in Larache.

I went in to attend the first meeting with many misgivings. Gomendio presented me to the other managers of The Lukus—I was being designated "manager" for want of a more appropriate term. Gomendio was the controlling stockholder in this company, and also the active director-manager of The Lukus; although, as I have said, he spent most of his time on the business affairs of the company in Madrid. To manage the farm itself, he had his brother-in-law, Rafael Fuentes, a huge, blond Spanish Teddy bear, with snapping eyes and a comic mustache. Rafols—everyone called him by this nickname, instead of Rafael—was so young and still had so much to learn that acting as his assistant was a dark foxy little man from the south of Spain, called Gamiz.

And myself. I had farmed in the most modern country of all; so besides managing the corn crop, I was expected to place at the disposal of the others whatever knowledge I had of modern American agricultural methods and equipment. In short, Gomendio was the boss, Rafols was under Gomendio and over Gamiz and me, but we two were to have a free hand in those fields we knew best.

Rafols was to occupy himself chiefly with the rice that year, Gamiz with the cotton, and I with my corn. Naturally, we all wanted the best parcelas possible. It made for some friction in the office that day. Gomendio, being "neutral," presided over our meeting.

It was hot and sticky and Gomendio had flung open the wide windows behind his desk. I could see a collection of Arab hovels near at hand, and back of them an inviting piece of the harbor in the corner of the window.

"Now, Betty," said Gomendio, "all these parcels in Adir Bajo are flat and well worked over and will be ideal cornland."

"That land is too salty," I argued. "It has been too many years in rice. Thank you, but I wouldn't plant one grain of corn in Adir Bajo that I cared about seeing grow." I turned my eyes to the window and studied the view indifferently.

Gamiz and Rafols exchanged a startled look. "Well, what do you want?" demanded Gomendio, taking a pencil from his desk and rolling it nervously between his fingers.

I got up from the chair, walked toward the big wall map and waved at Adir Alto. "If I could have my parcelas here, perhaps?"

I knew, of course, that it was the best soil in the company and both the other managers were clamoring for it too. But sometimes if you ask for everything, you get at least a little of it, whereas if you ask for nothing, that is what you get—nothing.

"Qué no, hombre!" Rafols leaped to his feet as if he had been shot. "No, that is not possible—not all the good land for one crop and an experimental one at that. Suppose she has a failure?"

"Compromise!" shouted Gomendio. "We shall work out a compromise—a little bit here, a little bit there."

Our meeting lasted all one day and part of the next morning, but with much shifting back and forth and bargaining, we reached an agreement that suited us all. I was assigned Parcel 31. It was in the Adir Bajo section but had never been cultivated before, so it could not be too affected by the rice planting in the rest of Adir Bajo. I was also assigned Parcels 412, 422, 432 in Adir Alto; magnificent land with which I expressed myself very happy. They threw in an annoying little parcel called 44 that had also never been cultivated. It had possibilities, admittedly, but it could also be a failure.

That was all the land I wanted to plant, but Rafols stuck a "condition" on those nice Adir Alto parcels. I could have them without further wrangling if I would agree to plant a parcel in the uncultivated, savage land on the other side of the River Lukus, known as the Mehasen.

"Or perhaps it would be too much work for the señora? Or too wild?" Rafols was baiting me carefully, keeping a poker face.

Part of the land in the Mehasen was held in concession by The Lukus, but it had never been touched by machinery. The Arabs living there were hostile. They thought of the land as theirs and they did not understand the concessions that their chiefs had made with the Spaniards. There was no bridge over the River Lukus; I would have to swim a horse over or drive miles around the head of the river. Too much work? Too wild? Rafols was waiting for me to refuse. I could feel it and I could not give him that advantage; I agreed to plant corn in a parcel of the Mehasen land.

On one of my trips to the U.S.A. I had bought a complete soil-testing outfit for The Lukus Company and I was full of enthusiasm for testing all the parcelas of The Lukus to find out of what they were really composed and what they really needed added to them to insure better crops. This was a revolutionary innovation in Morocco, soil testing never having been practiced there before. The Lukus chemist consented, grudgingly, to learn how to make the tests, but none of the managers was very convinced.

Not long after, I arrived at the weekly managers' meeting in Gomendio's office, half carrying, half dragging the heavy soil-testing outfit in both hands. Gomendio, Gamiz and Rafols stepped aside patiently to see what I had to say this time.

I said it quite briefly, fishing some odds and ends of paper from my jacket pocket and referring to them frequently. "All the Adir Bajo land is salty. There is too high a salt content for anything except rice. Even the Parcel Thirty-one, that I am to plant, has a high salt content although it has never been planted in rice. There must be a waste-water drainage into it from the other parcela. Look."

I spread my pieces of paper out on the desk and the three closed in over them to look at the soil-test results and examine them in a studious silence. Gamiz drew back from the desk and pronounced in his slow, grave voice, "The soil test is right. It shows that Adir Bajo is very salty. This testing is a good idea." The other two men broke into relaxed smiles. They, too, were discovering soil testing for themselves, all in a moment.

"Yes, yes," agreed Gomendio in his hearty way. "We shall test all the parcelas," waving his arms. "We shall have a new map which shows only the chemical content of the parcelas. We shall correct it each year." He loved maps. He reached over and pressed a button that brought in his secretary. "Get the chemist for me, and the topographer. You, Gamiz, explain this new idea to them."

I gathered up my dirty paper scraps from the desk, nodded good-by to everyone and started for the door, where I paused. "I'll keep Parcel Thirty-one anyway," I said. "We can pile on the fertilizer and see what happens. I plan to start mixing the fertilizer formula today for all my parcelas."

"I'll be doing the same for my cotton," said Gamiz.

I closed the door behind me, but I left the soil-testing outfit on the floor where I had placed it. I knew it would be used now; it had found a home.

I was looking forward to meeting my foreman with growing nervousness. As Rafols was the general farm manager and knew the men, he wanted to choose my foreman himself and so he came by Nemsah one morning and picked me up in his jeep. We drove down to the Adir cortijo in silence and I waited in the patio beside Rafols' jeep while he went to fetch the foreman of his choice. I felt eyes upon me and tried not to appear anxious, but it was an acutely embarrassing time for me—this meeting a stranger with whom I would have to work so closely all season.

My foreman came across the dirt patio at Rafols' side. He was walking slowly like the Andalusian he was, wearing an old felt hat pulled down over his eyes. He was so nervous that his hand was wet with perspiration when he offered it to me, and the knowledge that he was as apprehensive as I was put me more at ease.

He had kind brown eyes, crinkled in the corners from the sun and wind. "I am going to do everything you tell me, señora," he said. "I know you do things different from how we do them in Spain, but I am ready to do what you say."

I was touched by his statement, blurted out with so much obvious difficulty. He was making a declaration of loyalty to me against all the criticism and opposition he would have to put up with through the year on my account: opposition from both directions, up from the labor and down from the management, because I was a woman and because I was a foreigner doing the age-old operation of farming a different way. His name was Marron—Antonio Marron.

Shortly after this Pepe was assigned to me—he, too, would be both foreman and friend.

The parcelas of land assigned to me had been winter plowed; that is to say, they had been plowed up the preceding fall by the big Caterpillar D-6 tractors, pulling the great, round disk plows. All that remained for us to do this spring was to disk the parcels in the opposite direction from the winter disking. This had to be done just before we were ready to begin spreading on the fertilizer and to plant.

During these days of preparing the soil, I rose with the sun. Sometimes one or more of my sons would awaken with me, and when they did, we breakfasted together at the kitchen table. I would have some of the cold milk that had been brought to us the night before from Adir, and whatever fruit Pilar had put on a plate for me. My sons ate American cold cereal, and toast made over the electric plate, chocolate milk and the fruit I did not eat.

If I was driving down to Adir, one of the sons would come along with me and mount a tractor for a few rounds or stop off at one of the laborer's houses to visit the children.

Sometimes, instead of driving, I rode Quimera, the oversized bay mare that had been assigned to me and that I could not mount without first stepping on a wall. On these days the boys did not go with me, but stayed behind in Nemsah. There was a great deal there to keep them amused.

I always tried to be back in Nemsah in time to lunch with them, but often during these days of preparation it would be closer to three o'clock when I reached home, and my sons would have eaten and would be taking a rest. I would hastily eat something while holding a domestic session with Pilar, then I would be off again by car or horse to spend the rest of the afternoon in the parcelas, or to the office in Larache. I tried to get back to Nemsah in time to read the bedtime story and listen to each son as he gave me his special version of the day. For me, this was the nicest part of the day, and when I was kept too long in the fields and returned late to a sleeping house, I felt I had missed something important.

By this time most of my working team, headed by Marron, Pepe and Espejo, had been assigned to me. Spring was crowding us, it was mid-April and the vast fields of The Lukus were ready; time was at our heels.

Parcel 31 had been disked up furiously by Pepe's D-4 Caterpillars; it had been sprinkled by Espejo's fertilizer-tossing team of Spaniards; it had been smoothed down again by the Caterpillars. With Marron, I tramped it from one end to the other—the whole 200 acres—just to inspect it for roughness. It lay, for over a mile, a wide strip of rich brown corduroy, hugging the dikelike road that divided it from the rice fields of Adir Bajo. We were satisfied that it was ready to plant.

I was again in Larache, in Gomendio's office. My present mission was to present Gomendio with a list of what I thought absolutely essential machinery for handling a corn crop of 1000 acres. I explained this to Gomendio, glancing from time to time at the list in my hand. He leaned over the desk and took it from me rather apprehensively.

Corn planter	$ 535
Corn picker	1,700
Corn sheller	225

Gomendio moaned out loud dramatically. "It is too much money!"

Life never becomes a habit to me. It's always a marvel.

"What's too much money? The planter? Ridiculously low—it plants sixty acres a day. The picker is too expensive? Have you ever seen a picker work? One picker replaces one hundred Arabs, at the very least. And the sheller!" I threw up both hands. "Given away, that's what. A regalo. Por nada—a gift. For nothing."

"The corn sheller," said Gomendio, his eyes glued to the $225. "This is what you can have."

"Only the corn sheller?" I demanded indignantly. "What do you expect me to plant and to pick with? A shovel and a basket?"

"You can pick with those one hundred Arabs you are babbling about," said Gomendio stonily. "And you can plant the stuff with the old avantrén."

The avantrén is a prehistoric agricultural implement of torture upon which four men sit astraddle four funneled tubes reaching to the ground, into which they shove the seeds, practically one at a time, while they are pulled over the field backward by a tractor.

I stood up sadly, and held out my hand for the list. "But I can order a corn sheller, can't I?"

"Bueno, bueno. If you wish."

In the hall outside the office, Marron was waiting for me, twisting his old felt hat nervously. "Any luck, señora?" he whispered, as he fell into step with me going down the hall.

"No. Just as I expected. We can have nothing except the sheller."

"Mother of Jesus protect us! It means then the avantrén."

We climbed into the station wagon and drove back to the Adir cortijo in a dejected silence. Once in Adir we sought for Montes, the company blacksmith. We found him out behind the Adir patio, a brawny, black-browed but gentlehearted man, and we three set to work on the two old abandoned avantréns. Long after midnight, Marron and I were still hunched over the machines under the powerful fluorescent lights of the machine shop and Montes was patiently attaching the plowshares which would cut a furrow in the earth for the seeds to drop into. Montes glanced suggestively at his watch.

"I suppose we better get some sleep if we are to start tomorrow," I admitted reluctantly and got up off the old iron wheel on which I had been sitting. "Let's get a cup of coffee at the canteen before we turn in."

Montes laid down his heavy mallet and we walked the few feet that separated us from the Adir patio. "This patio is a sea of mud in the winter," commented Montes.

"And chokes one with dust in the summer," added Marron.

"Everyone says the same thing. We should do something about it—stone or brick or anything." I waved a hand vaguely. "Anything."

We passed out through the main gate of the patio and stumbled along in the dark to the dingy little cement lean-to that we called the cantina—the canteen. One part of it served as a general store, an economato selling at cost to the farm employees; the other part was arranged into a kitchen-dining room for the laborers who had no homes on the farm. I often stopped in for a cup of coffee and a chat with the wizened-up little cook, Manolo.

We pushed through the dining room and into the kitchen. Manolo was squatted on the floor shaping doughnuts from a mound of dough which he had balanced beside him on a chair. He jumped to his feet with a smile.

"It is coffee you have a wish for, I can tell. A little moment only," and he plugged in his electric plate with a flourish and plunked a battered black pot over the heating coil. "Pues, café."

I knelt on the floor to cut a few doughnuts for him. "We start to plant our corn today when the sun comes up," I told Manolo. You will have many early customers for these doughnuts."

"I make them to be eaten, in spite of not having a proper kitchen nor a decent dining room," he said pointedly.

"Yes, yes, I know. Someday there will be such a building here in Adir."

"I shall be dead and buried and gone to the sky and not interested any more in where the doughnuts get made. Heaven is for tomorrow. Doughnuts are for today."

He stuck a spoon in each of four glasses and filled them with scalding coffee. We stood by the light of the one sickly electric bulb and raised our glasses to the prospect of a successful corn crop for Marron and me and a new kitchen for Manolo to make doughnuts in.

I think it was there and then that I decided to try to do something to better conditions in Adir.

I leaped out of bed early and bundled into my gray jäger slacks and a new black-and-white-checked flannel shirt which I had saved for a very special occasion. Well, this was special enough. This was planting day!

As I was bending over the little icebox, collecting a handful of fruit, four-year-old Jay appeared behind me. His hair was tousled and his eyes were still half shut with sleep, but he was all dressed except for the tennis shoes. He held these in one hand.

"I have to go with you to plant the corn—Espejo says so," Jay announced from the doorway of the kitchen. Then to change the subject before I could protest, he pushed the shoes right under my nose. "Which one is for which foot?" he demanded.

For what seemed to me the ninety-ninth time, I patiently aligned the two little shoes on the kitchen floor and showed him how, if placed the wrong way, the toes would turn out, and if placed the right way, the toes were straight.

"I got it now," he said, also for the ninety-ninth time, and sat down right there and put them on quickly, before he forgot which was which. Together we let ourselves out the front door, quietly in order not to waken the others.

We got into the station wagon, which I had left before the garden gate, and Jay obligingly pressed the starter for me. The Lukus Valley was still washed with reds and yellows left from the dawn. Once more on the rise I stopped the car on the site overlooking the vastnesses of the Mehasen Valley—a feeling of peace pervaded everything and it was good to let it sink in before descending to down-to-earth Adir.

Espejo was waiting impatiently before the main gate of Adir, hopping around nervously. Together we went to the warehouse to collect the first bags of seed from the barrel of water in which they had been soaking for two days. While we loaded the dripping, unwieldy sacks into the station wagon, Jay marched resolutely over to the canteen. From a low shelf in the kitchen, he chose a big cup and a bigger spoon. He sat down at a table with two Arab tractor drivers. After he had greeted them with the Arab salem aleikum and they had returned his greeting, he fished a packet of cereal out of his jacket hood. The two men leaned forward to examine the grains curiously, although they did not care to taste anything so radical. Manolo appeared to pour milk over the cereal and to offer sugar. Jay ate in silence and his Arab friends sucked noisily, as is their custom, at glasses of coffee and milk. The repast finished, Jay rode out to the field on a tractor driven by one of his breakfast companions.

As we lined the first decrepit avantrén up on the first row, Marron turned to me. "Would you like to make the first round?" I asked him in an "after you, kind sir" voice.

"The honor should surely be yours, señora," replied Marron, bowing slightly.

"Why don't we both go?" I said, and we unseated Espejo, who already held a handful of seeds.

In blissful silence we made the first round, stopping occasionally to make an adjustment—angling more the two plowshares which were opening the furrows, raising the machine so that it did not plow too deeply, shifting the baskets of seed into more convenient position, and occasionally retrieving Jay when he lost his balance.

Jay, the agile one, was assisting us as best he knew how. He maneuvered about on the plunging machine, teetering precariously on the sides to give himself a thrill, looking over our shoulders with his hands clutching our heads, now and then dropping a seed in the wrong place and finally going to sleep, his head pulled into his hood like a turtle and propped against a basket of corn seed.

At the end of the third round, Marron and I relinquished our seats on the avantrén and put the second model into motion. For the rest of the day, the two old avantréns jerked up and down the parcel, our men straddling the tubes and dropping in seeds, for all the world like stuffing so many geese to make foie gras livers.

The next day and the next, things went smoothly with Parcel 31. Marron looked at me and I looked at him and we said to each other bravely:

"The Mehasen?"

"Yes, the Mehasen."

Marron looked across the Lukus River at the deserted Mehasen landscape, humped here and there with huts of unfriendly Arabs, and shook his head sadly. "Our enemies. We are about to offer ourselves into the hands of the enemy."

"It isn't that drastic," I said. "Pepe has already sent one of his D-Fours over and nobody has heard any shots."

"And no noise of the D-Four is to be heard on the air, either," Marron observed glumly.

Then we were occupied with getting ourselves down the thirty feet of sharply steep, slippery claybank. When we reached the water, slithering and sliding, I plunged in first because my Quimera was at least two hands taller than Marron's white mare or Pepe's gelding. The water was running swiftly and rose higher around the suspicious Quimera. She threw her head nervously from left to right. I glanced back at Pepe for reassurance.

"You have reached the deepest part," he assured me. "It won't get any deeper. You won't get wet."

Pepe proved to be right. Just as Quimera's eyes began to roll and water touched her belly, we passed the center of the river. "I hope you have the afternoon tide calculated as well," I said over my shoulder as I urged Quimera up another steep bank to gain the Mehasen flat land.

My parcel of cornland was still a mile away and we set off in silence. The whole valley, as far as you could see in any direction, was cut into tiny plots. Some were twenty feet square, some were twenty yards, but none contained more than a quarter of an acre. The plots had been scratched up with crude, bent tree boughs fastened to handles. We crisscrossed the plots, single file, taking great pains to keep to the border and not to ride on any of the worked land. Here and there an Arab was forcing down on the handle of one of the crude plows, pulled in slow motion by a team of heavy oxen. As we passed, he would let up on the handle and look into our faces and examine our mounts. His face would be impassive, expressionless. There was no hate reflected in it, neither was there any love.

I looked up at the Rif Mountains, looming black against the blue sky; seeming even blacker because the sky was so blue. I looked down at the Arabs we were passing. How to explain to them that our presence here today was going to help them; that Gomendio had agreed that they should share equally with the Spaniards in the water rights and that half the resulting irrigated land would be theirs? How could these men with the bent-tree-branch plows be made to understand about dams and reservoirs and increased production from improved terrains and tractors? And were we doing it the best way, just arriving like this, in one day swimming the river and, with one tractor, beginning?

As we approached our parcel, we could see the outline of the Caterpillar D-4 tractor and the wormlike tracing of the tractor's plow furrows.

"The tractor is stopped," observed Marron.

"We can all see that," I answered crossly.

We rode up to the tractor. As we reined in our horses, the driver raised his turbaned head. It was my Arab friend Larbi. Inclining his head slightly, he asked, "The health of your husband?"

"Well, thank you."

"The health of your sons?"

"Very well, thank you."

"And the health of yourself, dear madame?"

"Excellent."

"It makes me joyful."

With the formalities out of the way, I was now free to ask, "And what are you doing seated idly in the shade of your tractor when there is still much work to be done?"

"Ah, madame," he answered softly, "it has to do with the Arabs of the Mehasen. They are unwilling to let us proceed."

"You have a tractor. How can an unarmed, unequipped Arab stop you from plowing?"

"It is too simple, madame. The Arab merely sits down upon the ground in the furrow of my tractor plow and there he stays. Am I to pass around him? No, it would be a crooked furrow. Am I to pass over him? No, he is as my brother. Shall I strike him? For that I go to prison. So he continues to sit there"—Larbi indicated the other extreme of the parcela—"and I continue to sit here"—he motioned to the shady side of the tractor and sat down there again, indicating he had no more to say.

I looked down to where Larbi had pointed and, sure enough, there was a hump of jelab right in the furrow. We approached, we stood in front of the offending man. He did not rise to confront us. Pepe, Marron and I had to squat down in front of him to get a view of his face, half hidden under his hood, and to enter into a conversation.

"Selvager"—good day from my companions and me—"are you a friend to us?"

The hood raised slowly and the face was visible, parched and dried up and lined with dozens of tiny wrinkles. His hood fell away to his shoulders, revealing the shaved skull with its one long pigtail at the back. His legs were tucked up underneath the jelab and his workgnarled hands were folded peacefully into his lap. His eyes were dark and impersonal.

"Selvager," he responded slowly and with great politeness.

"You are sitting exactly in the path of our tractor." I spoke in Spanish and looked directly into his quiet eyes. Pepe obligingly translated this piece of information for the Arab and his expression changed to one of surprise.

"Pardon me, madame. It is not I who get into the tractor's path. It is the tractor who gets into my path. It is surely a mistake, but your tractor is passing directly over my piece of land."

"Except that it is not your piece of land any more, pardon me," I cut in.

"I have owned this land for my forty years and my father owned it before that. And before him it was my grandfather's. So how can you come now, today, with this roaring diablo and say my land is yours?"

I leaned over almost into his face. "Pardon me, but we have rented this land. We have paid money—felous"—I rubbed my thumb and two fingers together—"to use this land. Your baja is the one who was paid. He must pay you and you must move out of the furrow, please."

At the mention of the baja, the regional head of the Arabs, the little man flinched ever so slightly. "I am here, not caring about the baja. This is my land. It is not your land. I will stay." He settled more permanently than ever into the furrow, pulled his hood down over his head to indicate that our interview was at an end and refolded his weather-beaten old hands quietly into his lap.

It was a discouraging moment, but one which we had anticipated. The trouble was not that Arab sitting in that furrow in front of our tractor. The real trouble started years ago. It was a fight between the Moroccan Arabs and the Spaniards; the Arabs always jockeying for their right of independence, the Spaniards maneuvering to retain the hold they had won by arms over Morocco. At the moment, it was not for us to take one side or the other. It was only our job to get the corn planted.

I turned to the boys. "What do we do now?"

"Let's look up the jari of the kabila. Sometimes they can put things right," said Pepe.

On the kabila or village level, it is the jari, or cadi, a sort of local judge, who has the immediate authority. We set out to find him.

Entering a kabila is like entering another, more foreign land. There were several half-naked children engaged at desultory games in the dust. There was a huddle of wrapped-up women, squatted on their haunches, muttering to one another. The gaps in the cactus showed bare, trampled yards at the end of which were the Arab huts—baked mud structures with thatched roofs, called chozas.

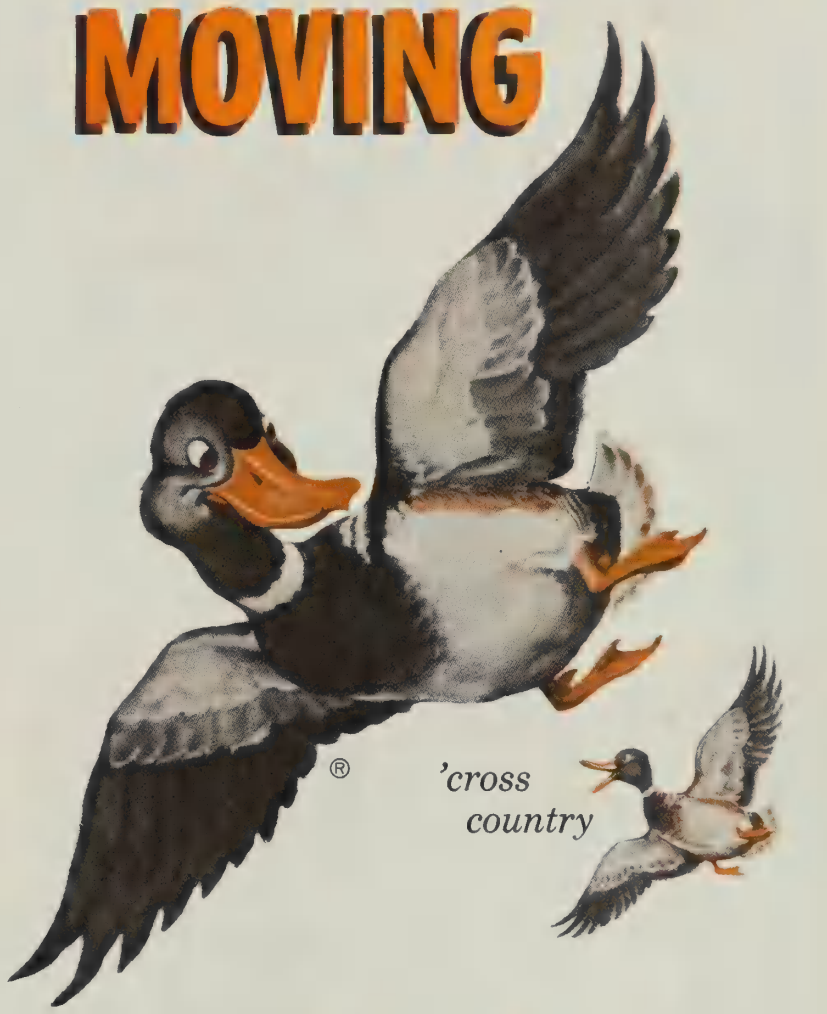
Pepe, who had been here many times before as a guest, led the way into the property of the jari. As we approached the choza, a statuesque Arab appeared and motioned us all inside through the narrow, low doorway.

"What is going on? Did you ask him?"



"Don't be impatient," answered Pepe. "This is an Arab. We cannot discuss business so quickly. We must first take tea with him."

We found ourselves in a low-ceilinged, white-plastered, windowless room with the floor completely covered in layer upon layer of richly patterned woolen rugs. The jari had already slid his feet out of his babuchas and was padding across the rugs to take a seat among the silk and satin cushions piled in disorder around three walls of the room.

He raised his two arms dramatically before him and clapped them twice in slow motion. Immediately a young woman appeared in the doorway with a large tray, placed it directly in front of the jari and silently withdrew from the room again, her face carefully veiled up to the eyes. The tray was round and brass with three little legs of its own. On it were set a metal teapot, a copper kettle, four small glasses, a large conical lump of sugar and a mound of green mint, freshly plucked. Our Arab host launched into the delicate process of making the mint tea, giving it his complete attention. Finally he poured himself part of a glassful, tilted it to his lips and sucked the tea as noisily as possible into his mouth. He swilled it around like a wine taster, and swallowed it. He nodded contentedly, poured the three remaining glasses full and replenished his own. We all began sucking tea between our teeth and having our glasses refilled as soon as they were empty until we had done away with twelve glasses of tea among us.

Pepe pulled himself together—all that tea and idle conversation had put him into a rather relaxed state—and said, "With her most respectful respect, the señora wants to point out that one of your subjects is sitting in front of the señora's tractor, making it impossible to proceed further with the plowing; and pardon us for mentioning this, but the jari is aware of the agreement that exists between Company Lukus and the baja which the baja expects the jari to carry out the best way for all of us." He paused expectantly, looking first at me and then at the jari.

The jari answered, "The señora will forgive the ignorant Arab. I know the baja has sold the rights to all our lands to the Spanish conquerors."

"Not sold," I put in hastily. "Just rented to us."

"Rented," he corrected himself without spirit, "rented away our livelihood." He fell to musing silently, his head lowered. Suddenly he raised his head. "I shall send to remove the man from in front of your tractor," he said firmly. He rose to his feet. "I am honored by your visit and you will remember, please, that we are little civilized and so would demonstrate our displeasure in uncivilized ways."

"Such as sitting in front of tractors?"

"Such as sitting in front of tractors." He declined his head, his fine, brown hands shoved out of sight into the sleeves of his jelab. We could go.

Single file and pensive, we made our way to the river. The Arabs had left their work and filtered back behind the cactus hedges, leaving the fields deserted and silent. There was an air of heavy solitude left and it penetrated even to us on our horses. It is a moment I often recall—the immensity of the Mehasen plain, the blueness of the sky, the feeling of being surrounded by unseen eyes and yet the completeness of the silence and peace.

"If you had only one wish, what would you want more than anything else in the world right now?" I asked into the still air. Both Marron and Pepe turned slightly in their saddles to look at me.

"I?" said Marron, tugging his old felt hat down on his forehead. "I should wish for a tractor of my very own. I would marry Carmen right away and take her to Sevilla with the tractor and work there just for the two of us and our children for the rest of my life. I would see the feria"—the annual fair—"of Sevilla every spring until I died." He smiled happily; he was at the feria in his mind.

"And you, Pepe?" I said. "What would you wish for?"

Pepe looked toward the west, into the sun. "I would ask to go there, just once."

"There?"

"America. To see America and perhaps stay there for a time. But we could as well ask for sample pieces of the moon, señora."

We were the usual four at the round table in Gomendio's office—Rafols, Gamiz and myself, with Gomendio refereeing. As usual, we were arguing.

My argument concerned the living conditions in Adir and the state of the men's quarters. "Take the canteen for an example," I argued, getting to my feet and pacing back and forth before Gomendio's huge desk. "None of you has been to the canteen at midnight and seen poor old Manolo trying to get some doughnuts made for breakfast—no light, insufficient water and certainly no space. Do you know that he has to spread things out on the floor to work? How can a cook do his best when he has to cut out doughnuts on the floor?"

No one answered.

"The dining quarters aren't much better; 'quarters' is an exaggeration—one little room, full of mud and flies in the summer and cold as the North Pole in the winter. Is that any place for workingmen without homes on the farm to eat?"

No one answered.

"And the patio! What a mess. What a disgrace. Ankle deep in dust ——" Silence.

"The only change they can look forward to is mud." Then I reached into my briefcase and took out a roll of plans. "I was introduced to one of the local Larache builders the other day and suggested he draw up a simple plan for a dormitory."

I spread the plan out on the desk. It was not at all the simple plan I called it. It was a dream version of bachelors' quarters: a long, U-shaped building with individual bedrooms, a communal shower-bathroom on one side and a large, airy dining room-kitchen facing it. The middle part of the U was a spacious day room into which I had carefully lettered the words "Ping-pong table" and "Library."

Gomendio, Gamiz and Rafols studied it frowning. Rafols broke the silence. "Ridiculous!"

"Do you realize, Betty, what such a structure would cost The Lukus Company?" This, of course, was Gomendio.

"Not any more than your two Cadillacs and one Mercedes Benz cost." I was ready to use any argument, however unfair. "If those men have to sleep another night with the gasoline drums, I'll move them all into my house. The horses get better care in Adir."

Gomendio glared at Rafols and Gamiz. Rafols said, "If that is all that worries you, Betty, suppose I give you the schoolroom. It is empty until September. You could move them in there for the time being and Gomendio could think about this other idea."

I was willing to accept anything. "That will do for tonight, thank you, but we won't leave the dormitory idea—all the thinking Gomendio will do, pardon me, is to shove the thing in a drawer."

A silence followed; everyone was in painful thought.

I suggested, "If it seems like too much money, I have an idea that won't cost you anything—or hardly anything; not even the price of a jeep."

They looked interested.

"The old dairy stable in the patio is empty. You remember it, Rafols. The heavy work is in tearing out the concrete and iron fixtures and we would do that ourselves, on our own time, before or after working hours."

They gave it to me, thinking it would be the end, the finish of this home-improvement move.

As I went out the door, I remarked, "You don't mind if we haul a few rocks for the patio while we are at it? To fill in the worst of the holes—on our own free time, of course."

"No," they said. "No, we don't mind." They would have said anything to get rid of me.

Back in the cortijo of Adir, my enthusiasm ran over on the men, sitting in the dust of the patio. Amid a confusion of men, kids and dogs, we hauled the cots, the mattresses and the makeshift beds out of the warehouse and into the schoolroom. When we had finished, you would have said it was a pretty scruffy dormitory, but we thought it was something out of Hollywood. It had windows, at least, and lights, and the floor was tile, not dirt, and the walls were plastered. And it did not smell of gasoline or fuel oil.

Pepe's battered old packing-case bed draped in blankets was set in the middle of the room, and from the top of it Pepe explained about the stable. I had been bluffing in Gomendio's office. I did not know if the men were willing to help with the destruction and new construction. I watched anxiously.

Pepe finished his explanation. Montes, the brawny blacksmith, turned to me. He was married and had his own house in the cortijo; it could not benefit him that the bachelors had a dormitory. "When does all this begin?" he said.

"I promised it would be in our spare time. Perhaps tomorrow night after working hours?" I suggested.

"Why not tonight?" Montes said, and he got off the crate on which he had been balancing and lumbered off to his blacksmith shop. He came back with three sledge hammers and three giant crowbars. We crossed the patio in a furor of excitement, like a gang of hoodlums intent upon assaulting the First National Bank. Someone pushed open the sagging door of the stable. Montes held out one of the sledge hammers to me. "Would you like to strike the first blow?"

Everyone stood back respectfully while I grasped the handle of the heavy sledge and went into the center of the stable. A row of iron stanchions for cows stood there. I raised the hammer over one shoulder, aimed low at the base of the stanchion and swung with all my might. The hammer struck with a ringing blow that sounded and resounded in the empty stable. The cement cracked open around the stanchion, and with a delighted roar the men were all over the place and the stable was a sudden madhouse of flying cement, chips, dust and shouts of laughter and joy.

There was a feeling under their enthusiastic destruction of brothers banded together to get something accomplished for the good of all; a feeling of better things to come; it was the first glimmer of hope I had felt around me during my days in The Lukus. It was awe-inspiring. It was wonderful. And, tended properly, it could grow.

That first night was a disorganized mess, but in the following days we shifted the work onto a more organized basis. A young electrician ran in two electric wires from the leaning pole in the patio and we attached powerful light bulbs that allowed us to work until after midnight. There was someone hammering away at almost every hour. Those men who worked on the night plowing shift gave up an hour or two of their daytime sleep to fill a couple of dump cars with rubble. Those who worked in the fields in the daytime took a turn while they waited for dinner to be served in the canteen. And the men with homes in the cortijo came out after their dinners to bang away until sleep caught up with them.

The patio developed in the same way. Our idea was to cobble the surface of the patio with stones from a stone pit up in Meruan. As we needed tractors to move the stones, we wrung permission out of Rafols to let us use them on the days when it was too wet to work the fields. We had to wait for such a day, but it finally came—a dull afternoon with a steady, cold downpour. We pulled our jackets around us and went out into the rain to find a tractor and a wagon. Driving back through the patio on our way to the stone pit, the wagon silently filled with men. Some had raincoats, one or two had blankets, but most of them had only their old jackets with the collars turned up. We jolted out to the stone pit, huddled together in the beating rain, silent but determined. And we loaded the wagon full of stones with our bare hands, tearing the flesh and blackening the nails, and we hauled them back to the patio where one of the men who had made cobbled streets in his village in Spain silently began to cobble in a wet corner of the patio. All the time, the rain continued to fall, cold and unpleasant. Our effort was a pathetic drop in the bucket. It looked somewhat as it would if one man should kneel in the corner of Times Square and begin to pave the place, one cobblestone at a time, all by himself; it looked just that futile. But everything has to have a beginning and the only way to begin is to take the first stone and put it in place. And someone had to place the stone. We were the someones. I knelt behind this man and handed him the stones, one by one. I stayed until I was too wet and too cold to stay any longer, but when I dropped out someone took my place, and from then on that work never stopped. The cobbled patch in the patio spread out and out, each day farther, like an inkstain spreading out over a blotter.

Along toward the end of April we began to get well ahead of our corn-planting schedule, and at the same time Gamiz's cotton planting began dropping behind. Rafols was casting covetous eyes at our antiquated avantréns. I could tell what was going on in his mind; he figured that if he put my two old machines on the cotton planting it would even up the work all around. That would, of course, leave us planting corn with our bare hands. No, I had no intention of letting Rafols hustle me out of my machines.

The morning came when Marron and I put our two machines into the last of the "400" parcels.

"There is nothing complicated left to do," I told Marron, "just these long straight rows. We should finish up here by Saturday, don't you think? We can all take Sunday off for a change, and on Monday we can tackle our little bad-shaped, bad-conditioned Forty-four parcel."

Marron smiled with satisfaction. "I can see the end in sight," he said gleefully. "And we finish ahead of everyone, too, even with such inferior avantréns."

We were still cackling contentedly to each other when our doom jack-rabbited up in the form of Rafols' jeep. It stopped in its usual cloud of dust and Rafols leaped out, leaving the motor running and the door ajar.

Striding purposefully toward us, he waved his hands at the struggling avantréns. "Getting along fine, aren't you, Betty?"

"Yes, just fine. In fact, we hope to finish up next week."

"So soon as all that?" exclaimed Rafols in his eager, boyish way. "And how long would it take without the avantréns?"

Marron and I both turned an icy look upon him. I spoke. "We have not even considered such a drastic circumstance. Both machines are limping along nicely with daily repairs, but we aren't complaining and neither are we planning on doing without them."

Rafols looked injured. "Did I say I wanted your old machines? We have all the tractor planters. I don't want them at all, I was only wondering ——"

I interrupted him. "Wonder no more, Don Rafols; these machines stay here in the corn until I am finished with them. I'll send you an official memorandum on that day."

Rafols turned our attention elsewhere. "I almost forgot to tell you, Betty. Your husband, Ricardo, is telephoning you from Madrid. You must go right into the cortijo and call him back—he's waiting."

"What does Ricardo want? Did he say?"

"Oh, something about a big party." Rafols grinned wickedly. "Know you're going to enjoy that!" He nodded to us both, leaped into his jeep and was gone.

When Rafols' jeep was again only a telltale ball of dust miles away, I turned to Marron. "You guard these old iron beasts with your life while I am on the phone. Imagine my going to Madrid this week! Why, I wouldn't think of it!"

It was a useless protest. Rafols had been correct. There was a party in Madrid the next night—our party, Ricardo's and mine—and I was expected to be hostess. There was nothing to argue against. After all, Ricardo had his rights. I would be there.

I drove into Tangier early the next morning, and took the plane for Madrid. During the flight, my mind was still busy planting corn; but when we landed at the Madrid airport, and I saw Ricardo waiting for me, I was back in Spain with a rush. We embraced happily and went off to the car, arms linked together, both talking at once.

The afternoon was spent in preparing the menu for the evening's dinner and in trying to put myself into presentable shape; my hair was sun-streaked and brittle, my hands were dark with soil stains. I gave my hair two shampoos and an oil treatment, rolled it onto some curlers and trusted that the results would pass inspection. It took me an hour to soak the stains from my hands and file my nails into a respectable shape.

For the party, I wore a long, full-skirted white satin ball dress that Christian Dior of Paris had designed. It was embroidered all over with thousands of tiny pearls and crystals and colored beads and it had its own matching white satin slippers. My sun-tanned shoulders were even darker against the white satin.

Ricardo and I drifted around, talking with everyone and serving lobster and turkey and homemade strawberry ice cream. Everyone drank lots of champagne and the evening wore on into the early morning.

The next afternoon, I flew back onto the African scene, eager to see the final planting of the corn. In Adir Alto, standing on the edge

Are you one who needs a second glass of Orange Juice today?

A special health message from the Florida Citrus Commission

AMERICANS like orange juice with breakfast and they drink a lot of it; eighty per cent of them have it on the average of four times a week. We've learned that orange juice is a most important source of precious Vitamin C, the vitamin that we need daily, because the body can't "store" it. We've learned also that delicious orange juice is a wonderful source of food energy and of other important health benefits.

But what we don't seem to understand is that people who are active physically, mentally, or emotionally, or under "stress and strain," use up their Vitamin C and energy faster, and hence need to replenish their supply more often.

Many People Need More!

Infants and children need orange juice to keep up strength and resistance during critical years of growth, yet surveys have shown a dangerous lack of it in the diets of the very young. Adolescents need extra orange juice, too, because of their strenuous activities, yet teenagers tend to neglect important food requirements unless carefully encouraged to consume more of the things they need —such as orange juice. An extensive survey in Pennsylvania shows that only about 50% of all teenagers from all kinds of backgrounds obtain the recommended daily supply of vital Vitamin C.

Expectant mothers are a particularly important group who need this vitamin in extra supply. Busy housewives, hard-working businessmen and hard-playing children, as well as heavy manual workers and world-famous athletes use up their energy and Vitamin C faster.

How About You?

Are you one of these busy, active people? And during the day, don't you at times just crave quick refreshment? If so, you'll know your "body wisdom" is warning you to get some Vitamin C and energy fast. So reach for a second glass of orange juice—the fact is, you need it.

Question:

Why does Frank Gifford crave Orange Juice after a tough game?

Answer:

His Body Wisdom tells him he needs extra Vitamin C and quick energy!

Frank Gifford, All-American, star of the New York Giants

If you're "on the go" practically every minute, you and football star Frank Gifford have something in common...you're both using up energy and Vitamin C fast. And since Vitamin C is the one vitamin your body can't store, a single glass of orange juice with breakfast just isn't enough.

You need a second glass of orange juice later in the day to replace Vitamin C and used-up energy. And Fresh-Frozen Orange Juice from Florida is one of the most delicious ways to make sure you get enough.

of the "400" parcels, I found Marron close to tears.

"What is the matter?" I asked in dismay.

"Señora, they came right out and took away our avantréns. I said to them, 'You can't do that, the Señora Betty won't like it.' And they just answered that it had been decided. What could I do?" Marron was almost beside himself.

"Now, don't take it so hard," I told him. "We just have to round up some hand labor. Send out the word and we'll see what turns up in the morning."

The "word" was sent up to the nearest kabila by way of an Arab boy who herded pigs in and out of the ditches and stubble fields during the day and returned them to the folds in the late afternoon. When he went home to his kabila for his evening meal he carried along the information that we would be needing help in the morning.

As soon as the sun came up, I saddled big, bouncy Quimera and rode down to the 44 parcela. By that time, our new help had begun to turn up. They came straggling along the dusty road in unkempt disorder—the Arab women who do 95 per cent of all the physical labor in the Arab households. They tend the skinny cattle and the sheep, they plant the meager gardens, they carry the firewood and make the meals. When there is a call for work in The Lukus, the Arab men will consent to drive the tractors or count the sacks; but if there are crops to be planted or picked, they send their women.

The women who came were of all ages—pathetic little thin ones of ten or twelve years, husky hulking Amazons in the late teens or twenties, and old wizened grandmothers of heaven knows what age. They were dressed in a startling array of old rags; and if they had babies at the time, they brought them right along, wrapped up somewhere in their jumble of old clothes.

Marron herded them disgustedly into a long row across the end of the parcel. Each one carried her own zapa, a most impractical, short-handled, head-heavy hoe. We gave each "girl" a handful of corn seed and indicated that we wanted three seeds dropped into each hole. And with more giggling, they started straggling off across the field.

"Mujeres!" groaned Marron, grabbing his head with both hands.

"Oh, cheer up, we are on the last lap. Suppose we had all the parcelas to do like this!"

Marron had talked so much about his girl Carmen—the one he wanted to take to Sevilla with the tractor he had wished for—that I was anxious to meet her. One morning when the work was fairly well in shape, we went to visit Carmen. She lived in Adir Bajo with her parents and a couple of sisters. As we drove, Marron explained that they expected to get married before too long.

"Padre Tomás is in charge of things. He wants everything to be absolutely correct and there are so many things to do." Marron shook his head in a troubled way. Then he added hastily, "Of course the padre is right. It should be that way; a marriage that is not correct in the eyes of the church is no marriage at all." Marron went on with his story. "When I first went to Padre Tomás with this idea of getting married, he said I should think it over very carefully." And Marron had assured the padre that they had been thinking it over for several years already and felt they had made up their minds.

"Then bring me your own baptismal paper and that of your fiancée," Padre Tomás had said, "and we can get on with the marriage."

"That is my problem now, señora. You see, Carmen and I were both born in Sevilla and baptized there, but our fathers never had enough money to pay for copies of the baptismal papers."

"Well, Marron, that doesn't sound like too much of a problem—just save the money you need and send for the papers. Isn't that easy?"

He sighed heavily. "I suppose so, señora, but it all takes such a long time."

Carmen was a sweet, gentle-voiced young girl, with a petite, attractive figure and lovely white-blond hair that was all out of character with her Southern Spain background. She had a saintly quality about her, and a maturity beyond her twenty-three or so years. She introduced me to her pretty sisters and to her mother. We sat, all of us, in the kitchen-living room, dimmed to keep it cool, around the bare wooden table and sipped cups of black coffee liberally mixed with chicory.

When I later started back, Marron came along with me to stop off at the Nemsah pump house and show me where he and Carmen would live when they were finally married. It was only three rooms attached to the big engine room of the pump house; a modest dwelling, but clean and light. Marron had already finished the painting and he proudly showed me his new bedroom suite and his living-room table. There were no doors shutting off either the bedroom or the living room from the kitchen and I suggested that curtains in these two spaces would add a lot and solve the problem of privacy.

"Yes, I agree, but they are so expensive, señora, that they will have to wait."

"Don't do anything," I said suddenly. "I think I have just the thing for you in Madrid—some curtains from our first house that won't fit into the apartment where we are now. I shall write for them immediately."

"There is time, señora, there is time," said Marron, thinking morosely of the baptismal papers.

I turned to him and said, "Marron, would you be offended if I loaned you that money you need and you could pay me back when you have it?" It required courage for me to make such a suggestion. Marron was proud, and money is a touchy subject, particularly between women and men.

Apparently love was stronger than Spanish pride, because Marron broke into a smile. "Would you do that, señora? And consider it a temporary loan just between you and me?"

"It's a contract," I said, offering my hand.

Ten days later, Marron hissed me into a corner of the patio and brought me up to date on the wedding situation. The baptismal papers, promptly paid for, had duly arrived, both his and Carmen's. He had borne them happily to Padre Tomás and the wheels of the Catholic Church had begun to turn—the banns were posted and the church reserved for some vague date in the winter.

And then one morning we stopped in a ditch down beyond Parcel 44. We sat down on two big rocks and I poured two cups of hot coffee from my vacuum bottle. I turned to hand Marron his cup and suddenly he put his face down into both his hands.

I set the cup carefully on the ground and knelt down in front of him. "Will you tell me what is the matter and perhaps there is something I can do to help?"

After a moment, Marron's shoulders stopped shaking and he looked at me unhappily through his fingers. "I believe you are my friend, señora, and I am sorry not to have spoken to you before, but I was so ashamed and I thought that maybe the señora, with her fine background, would not like me so much when she knew the truth."

"Never mind the background, Marron, and tell me what you have to say."

"I am desesperado"—desperate—"about this wedding. We still have not been given a definite date, and we cannot wait very much longer. Carmen is going to have our baby very soon." He looked down at the coffee cup and his breath came too quickly as he waited to be censured.

I moved closer to put my arm around his shoulder. "Why, that is not so serious, Marron. Your intentions have always been honest. You really should have married years ago when you first made up your minds. Suppose you take the rest of today off and go on home and prepare to get married next week. And here"—I fished around inside the leather pouch that was attached to my belt, drew out some money and shoved it into Marron's lap—"you will need a decent suit and a pair of shoes," I said.

Marron got to his feet and smiled for the first time in many days.

That same evening, after my sons had dropped off to sleep, I drove into Larache and sought out Gomendio. "Suppose you have a word with Padre Tomás and arrange the wedding for next week? The poor young man is going crazy and Carmen's family are all upset—to say nothing of Carmen herself."

It was arranged and Marron was married to Carmen in his new suit and shiny shoes. Carmen wore a pretty suit that her mother had helped her make. There was no time for a honeymoon then, because Marron was needed in the corn. We agreed that they could go to Spain when the work eased up in the fall—to Granada and Seville and even all the way up to Madrid, if they wished.

They settled into their new life, thrilled with each other as partners. It was good to see the way their eyes lit up whenever they met; the pride they took in their three rooms; the industrious way they tackled the barren dirt yard, trying to turn it into a garden.

April was ending, and, someway or other, all the crops were planted; my corn, Rafols' rice, Gamiz's cotton, the pepper and castor and tomato plants—all were in the ground. And all us jefes went around digging up our seeds to see if they had sprouted yet; "to see if the seed has moved," as the Spaniards say. The Spaniard gives personality to everything that grows. "He doesn't like his feet wet," they say of corn; or "Cotton, he adores lots of sun"; or "Rice will eat that fertilizer with much pleasure." I could picture Rice out there gobbling a delicious lunch of phosphate fertilizer, or Cotton stretching wide his arms to receive the sun, or my Corn trying gingerly to keep his feet dry.

At such times I realized how supremely happy I was with my share of life on the Lukus, and how well my luck had held—so far. Carmen and Marron were married, the men at Adir had a place to sleep, and every kernel of hybrid corn I had bought in a mood of wild impulse in New York was safely bedded in 1000 acres of rich Morocco soil. This had been a wonderful spring.

Laughter is wholesome. God is not so dull as some people make out. Did He not make the kitten to chase its tail?

HEINRICH HEINE

May folded warm wings over the Lukus River valley. With the corn actually in the ground I had a little more freedom in which to enjoy my family and life in our Nemsah house. It would have been impossible to feel lonely in Nemsah with La Banda sharing our daily lives.

The Nemsah children were nearly all boys. We had only two girls there: a miniature, doll-like, reticent child of five who ate like a canary bird; and a hulking, simple-minded girl of eleven. The boys ranged in ages from four to ten and one of the ten-year-olds was the natural leader of the band.

His name was Manolo. He was the son of The Lukus Company's chief sheepherder and his mother was dead. His father's job demanded that he live wherever the sheep were grazing at the time; one month it might be on the sands of Nemsah, another month it would be on the wheat stubble of Meruan. Manolo slept stretched out on the dirt floor of his father's various shacks, one blanket under him, another on top. His clothes were discarded, cut-down trousers of his father's, tattered shirt, canvas sandals in the winter and in summer no shoes at all.

Manolo was brown-haired and dark-eyed, with his fair skin burned leathery. He kept about him a poise, an air of quiet dignity and a wisdom beyond his years; an adulthood that children of the fields often have.

He was the leader of all the children—La Banda. I would open my eyes in my bedroom in those delicious, orange-blossom-fragrant first hours of the morning and hear the children out in the garden. They would be gathered under the orange trees and Manolo would be deciding gravely what they would do that day.

There were so many choices. If the morning was not too hot, they would saddle up the old horse known as "107" and take turns riding around the cortijo. Another early-morning favorite game was to scout down to where the burros were grazing. Most of the older boys would scramble onto the backs of the burros. With short sticks they prodded their animals around in slow, wide circles. The little boys were allowed each to take hold of a burro's tail and follow the parade on foot. From a distance it looked for all the world like a circus troupe training in winter quarters.

When the sun came up, hot in the sky, La Banda would slither back to the house, stopping on the way at some half-hidden irrigation canal to wet their feet up to the knees and dunk their heads. They would then, like as not, congregate in the playground out behind the house. There was a clump of eucalyptus trees that gave shade to a good-sized patch of ground and we had set up a swing, a pair of rings and a parallel bar. Someone was always adding something new and interesting. One day I rolled in a length of cement pipe from a nearby irrigation project. It was useful to crawl through, or to push up on its end and use as a fortress.

Manolo gradually came to sleep in our house and to have his meals with my sons. I do not remember if there was ever one day when we said, "Manolo, why don't you sleep here and have your meals with us?" It just happened. He had to be at the house so early in the morning anyway to direct the band's activities, and very often his "home" would be miles and miles away that week—too far to go for meals, too far to go back at night. His father never objected.

It was like that with La Banda and the baths. There was never actually a day when I said, "You boys are very dirty and should take a bath." My sons are allowed to accumulate from head to toe whatever dirt they wish during the day, so long as they consent to soak in a good hot tub of water each night. The tub was big and all four boys plunged in at once. As none of the other houses in Nemsah had bathtubs, many of the band had never seen one, so they came into the bathroom out of natural curiosity and lined up along the wall to watch my sons having their baths. Before long when my sons got out of the tub, the rest of the band would strip and hop in. Peals of laughter, water all over the bathroom floor and flowing out into the hall, shrieks of agony from soap in unaccustomed eyes! Some of the boys took to bringing their clean clothes with them once a week and changing after their baths.

The band gradually took to wearing blue jeans, polo shirts and sneakers, which I begged from understanding mothers in the States, obtained from the American PX in French Morocco, or bought on the Tangier black market at atrocious prices. The day arrived when the boys were all dressed so much alike that it was hard to tell one from another. Some stranger to Nemsah was apt to ask, "But which ones are yours, señora?"

I would look around at the boys dashing by but they shifted from place to place so fast and were dressed so alike that I would have to reply, "I don't know right now, but they do sort themselves out at nights and mine are the four who come for dinner."

To the consternation of the band, I woke up one morning and resolved that the time had come for education. There was an empty room attached to the foot of the long L that formed the Nemsah buildings. It opened onto our house garden, which would be ideal for the purpose of supervision. I caught Rafols one day as he tore by in his jeep.

"There is an empty room next to my house, Rafols," I began, leaning in the jeep window.

He raced his motor impatiently and frowned at this delay. "What would you want it for—to start a hospital?"

"No, I want to make a school."

"A school!" he snorted. "This is the middle of summer."

"I'm not here in the winter and these children need some teaching; and besides ——"

Rafols threw up his hands. "Take the room. Do what you want with it. Would you stop aside now and let me proceed? You can see I'm in a hurry."

I stepped aside and Rafols raced away, hunched over his wheel like a potential winner on the Indianapolis Speedway.

"Gracias—thanks," I called to the dust swirl he left behind.

That very morning I rounded up the band from the burro circuit, and informed them that they were about to be educated. There were loud groans from all the boys and Ric informed the little citizens of Nemsah that this was unfair because he served nine months of that kind of torture in Madrid. My mind was made up, and I got the town carpenter to build four child-sized tables for the older children and one long, low table for the kindergarten tykes. He also built a bookcase and a blackboard and a desk for "teacher," although as yet we had no teacher. We painted each piece of furniture a different color—red, blue, yellow, green. For the classes, we bought our instruction books from a local store, but we had piles of magazines, crayons and coloring books from America and the children made lots of cutout pictures to take home to their parents.

The teacher we found was the young girl who taught in the Adir school during the winter months. She came out from Larache every morning and the boys gave her a rough time until we instituted the afternoon snack. Only the children who had behaved themselves could have the snack when class was over. The snack was a big glass of orange juice or chocolate milk, a handful of cookies or a thick sandwich, and always a couple of hard candies twisted up in colored paper. It helped the boys remember to go easy on the teacher and it filled in on the meager meals they ate in their houses.

School was only three hours of the day, so there were still many hours left for the burros and the playground. They forgave me, the band, for setting them at the schoolwork and even went back to liking me a little.

It would soon be summer, and still no rain had fallen; and how desperately our planted seeds needed rain! There were several days late in May when long layers of gray clouds formed in the east, but the west stayed bright and blue. Marron and I walked the entire length of Parcel 31 with Pepe trailing along behind, anxiously peering in hopes of seeing the first little green sprout. There were none to be seen that day above the ground, but we stopped in midfield and dug around and finally we had in our hands several kernels of corn, all "moved." The first pale sprouts showed. We replaced the kernels, careful not to break their shoots.

We talked of many things as we tramped along. Marron and Pepe wanted to know if Texas oilmen are truly as fabulous as all the stories say. Pepe explained how the latest model of the German Mercedes Benz automobile could be greased from stem to stern by pressing a single button. Marron said that that was nothing, the Americans had perfected an adaptation of radar which enabled them to drive around at night without headlights!

"It sees in the dark automatically," he explained. He knew this because his cousin in Seville had seen the American consul's car driving thusly. I ventured to say that it was more likely the American consul had just neglected to turn on his lights. Marron turned a scornful look upon me which was meant to indicate that I did not know everything in the world.

We went toward the far end of Parcel 31 to examine a wonderful spring of clear cold water that Marron had stumbled across during the spring planting. While digging to clear out the spring pool, Marron had found an interesting old Moorish millstone. It was a strange object to find in this sector which has been marshland as long as anyone can recall. Marron said the Arab who accompanied him had refused to lift out the stone, explaining, "Underneath will be living the devil and we should be freeing him into the world."

I examined the ancient millstone with much curiosity, running my fingers over its smooth surface.

"I should like to have this for my fireplace hearth in Nemsah," I said.

Marron shook his head. "I don't think the Arabs would like it so much if we moved it."

"No," agreed Pepe. "Especially taking it inside a house—a Christian house—they wouldn't understand that."

We slid the stone carefully back inside the hole, on one edge of the spring. And surely it is still there.

That night I went to sleep with the hot, dust-filled air hanging heavily over the whole length of the Lukus Valley. But in those last hours before dawn, it began to rain; a thick-dropped, pounding sheet of water that lasted two hours and brought steam from the earth. After the sun had risen, rosy and warm-looking over the damp farm, I took Jay by the hand and Penn, the littlest son, and we walked joyously across the road into the citrus groves. We went barefooted and the wet, cold sand felt glorious between our toes. We took a reed basket, and once we were underneath the black-green foliage, we each found a big yellow grapefruit for our breakfast. We went farther into the next grove and we picked oranges until there was no more room in the basket.

Jay let go of my hand and planted his little bare feet in the sand. "Let's have a race back to the house," he said.

Penn immediately crouched almost to the ground, and began to count, "One, two, three, four ——"

"That's enough numbers," I told him. "I'll carry the basket of fruit and it will be a fair handicap."

Penn was up to number ten and we took off across the sand, the two little boys plowing along ahead of me, blond heads shining, shrieking with happiness and good health.

After that first welcome rain, there were others. Before long, everybody's seeds had "moved" and the once bare brown fields were furred with neat rows of tiny green sprouts.

This growing period allowed us to devote more time to our dormitory at Adir. As he had promised, Gomendio gave us a mason with two assistants and let the company carpenter devote part of each day to the dormitory. The rooms were beginning to take shape. We decided to keep the wide stable-door effect, replacing the sliding wooden panels with large, attractive iron-grille gates. These led into an ample reception hall where we planned to put a couch and a couple of chairs. Off to the right and to the left were to run two passageways, and the bedrooms gave onto these; small rooms, to be sure, with just enough space for double-decker bunks on one side and a table and chair on the other. The clothes lockers were to be out in the hall. Each man would have one with his own key. On the other side of the passageway, a large communal shower-toilet was being built.

On one end of the dormitory we built a small room and bath, rather more opulent. This would serve as a guest room for any visiting technicians. On the other end we constructed a room we planned to outfit as a new first-aid station. Emilio, the company's male nurse, spent much of his spare time hovering over that room, making practical suggestions.

We were able to give the patio more time too. Occasional days of summer rain allowed us to collect a splendid big pile of stones. Gomendio, seeing evidence of our industry, softened up enough to assign us two full-time stonemasons. These, aided by volunteers, soon had the cobbled part of the patio fairly chewing into the old dirt area. It became possible to walk on stone all the way from the office to the dormitory building, a feeling of positive luxury.

The idea of having some kind of garden in our patio had long been lurking in the back of my mind. In the very center of the patio, where the old leaning telephone pole with the dim light bulb stood, was a well. Shooting out from this well, like the points of a crudely drawn star, were five cement drinking troughs, waist high, out of which the horses and cows drank and at which the bachelors washed and shaved. As the bachelors would soon be washing and shaving in their new dormitory and the stock was to be banished to one of the smaller patios, we squeezed permission from Rafols to make our garden around the well.

It was a long, tedious job. We sought out a rich, black soil down at the Nemsah pump house, and with this dirt we filled the troughs. The ground between the starlike troughs was hard-trodden and poor. It had to be dug up, the stones removed, and a better grade of soil mixed in. It took weeks and weeks and we pressed all the stray school children into service. And any unfortunate laborer, Arab or Spanish, who sat down in the patio to rest for a moment would suddenly find a shovel or a pick in his hands.

When the ground finally was in shape, I drove up to the Palafito and went into a huddle with Pedro, the gardener. He was a placid, bronzed man who loved gardening so much that his face was a sunbeam whenever he had a chance to discuss it. We wandered around the Palafito gardens, planning what we could steal for the Adir patio. We finally decided that the small circular bed around the mouth of the well should be put into uña de gato—cat's fingernail—a delicious name for the small, low, green, spreading plant with brilliant purple flowers. We set one of the Arabs to pulling up uña, and later I drove him down to Adir while he transplanted it.

We agreed to have a small green hedge all the way around the circle and to plant in ach space between the troughs cypress trees. edro explained that these would someday be all enough for a man to walk between. He uggested two palm trees in each section; for nese we had to drive into Larache and talk ne head of the Moroccan Forestry Depart- nent out of several of his. He also donated a umber of mimosa trees. Four of these we lanted in front of the dormitory, making uite a ceremony of the planting. When you lant a tree, you create a memory.

We planted several more mimosas in our atio plot and filled the troughs themselves ith bright red and pink geraniums, the kind nat fall over and hang downward, covering ne cement with a profusion of green leaves nd bright flowers.

Before we finished, one of the old grand- nothers of the cortijo came shuffling out and nrust upon us a prize plant from her own arden. I transplanted it into a very promi- ent place so that she could see it always as ne went by on her way to the economato for ne groceries.

It was midsummer.

Our dormitory was getting along so well nat we began looking greedily at the stable n the other side of the patio. I pestered Rafols bout it, and we were soon tearing the stable part and planning wonderful big din- g room-café with fine new kitchen st for the cook, nd a separate sec- on for the company ore.

And all the time, ne corn was getting gher, so that when e walked through , Marron and I, it egan to slap across ur knees and there ere some places here it came up to ne waist with its ick, juicy stalks nd its healthy, drab reen leaves.

Another gnawing roblem for which e found more time uring midsummer as that of keep- g everyone in clothes. The company sal- ies were so small that after food had been ought, and shoes and the inevitable medi- nes, there was never much left for clothing. I began to ask all our friends in the States save me their old clothes. Whenever we ntertained Americans in Madrid and they sked what they could do for me, I would say, Send old clothes." These contributions were nt to my parents, who live in Maryland. My nother acted as a collection depot, receiving l the clothes, sorting them, and packing nem in transportable cartons. A friend of my usband's, who has a shipping agency, took are of transporting the cartons to Madrid. nd from there I lugged them down to Mo- occo myself, explaining each time to the curi- us customs officials that it was nothing of ontrabanda—only old clothes for the farmers.

Once the system got going we had a carton old clothes to distribute almost every onth. All around the farm, men began to pop in blue jeans and loudly colored flannel irts, and small children wore American orts and polo shirts. Near where my mother ved in Maryland was a whole row of houses hose housewife occupants conscientiously ved every outgrown dress and trouser, ery scrap, for these people 4000 miles away, one of whom they would ever see. It was a splay of neighborliness that touched these eople of Morocco deeply. They were anxious, course, for the clothes they badly needed; ut even more they were curious about the nknown friends who had sent the gifts.

A Spanish wife receiving a cotton house ress would ask, "Does she have a large family, is American señora? Does she have to work hard as I do? She must have lots of dresses send away one so new, doesn't she?"

I would explain that yes, the former owner of that dress had five children and she did all her own housework. And no, she did not have lots of dresses, but she had enough and she wanted to give one to a woman in Africa who needed it.

It was a new concept of generosity for the Spanish woman to understand.

The new babies concerned me almost more than the young children or the adults. There never seemed to be enough little shirts and dresses in our old-clothes cartons, and never any diapers at all. I cornered Gomendio in his big office one day and explained this problem to him in serious detail. He looked interested.

"As you can imagine, it is a subject that I have never gone into very deeply. What would you suggest we do?"

He and I came to an agreement whereby The Lukus would pay for the material if the women would make up the clothes themselves. We worked out a very satisfactory layette: six cotton diapers, two flannel shirts, two long dresses, two cotton shirts, two woolen sweaters, two pairs of bootees, two binders, four sheets, a crib mattress and pillow, a rubber crib sheet and a woolen shawl. We divided the work among all the women, whether they were expecting babies or not, and they helped out cheerfully. The girls in the school classes embroidered the little sheets in pink or blue. Some young girls knitted sweaters and bootees. Women with sewing machines ran up the shirts and dresses. We tried to keep one or two layettes made in advance, and most of the time we were successful, but sometimes we got behind when a new baby was expected and then there was a mad clicking of knitting needles and sewing machines. When the little one finally arrived, we presented him proudly with his hastily assembled layette and clucked over him like any bunch of women, foolish over a newborn baby.

In July the corn stretched so tall that we could no longer see over it. And the ears began to form—two long, slender ears on each stalk. You came down the irrigation ditch, you plunged in between two rows and you were lost to the world, the green leaves folding in behind you and before and overhead. Those corn rows were the one cool place on the farm; the heat had become oppressive. The stalks were now too tall to cultivate. We sprayed once again. We crossed the river and rode through the Mehasen corn. We examined the 31, all the "400" parcels and that unwanted child, Parcel 44. And then we settled down to let those slender ears plump up. It would still take time.

The permanent pasture I had talked Gomendio into experimenting with had sprung up, rich and green. We had planted it in the parcela behind the dingy old canteen. It looked homelike and familiar to me, with horses, mules and colts standing knee-deep in young oats that would soon be supplemented with clover and a bit later on with timothy grass.

One of the basic problems in Morocco is the almost complete lack of nutritious pasture lands. The Spaniards are reluctant to spend money on anything from which they cannot see an immediate result. Pasture is one of these things—it takes several years of expensive seeding before you begin to reap results in fatter cattle and sheep and pigs. I was trying two varieties of dry-land grasses; both can live with very little water once their astonishing ten-foot roots have penetrated into the earth. One is named Buffel Grass; and the other, Weeping Love Grass—wonderful, romantic

"I LOVE YOU— BUT I CAN'T LEAVE HIM . . ."

■ Arlis shook her head. "I can't, Crawford," she said. "If I went with you, not a soul in the world could say what Matthew Dunbar might do. I just can't let him be driven that far." They were two strong men, fighting on opposite sides in a battle which she knew could destroy them all. Borden Deal tells the story in name, especially when translated into Spanish: hierba de amor llorando.

The Arabs were busy about this time with their annual observance of Ramadan. The Ramadan consists of a full month's fasting between sunup and sundown; nothing must pass the Arab's lips during that period, not even water. This is not so hard on the rich Arab families who can stay up eating and drinking all night and drowse through the daylight hours, but it is hell on those Arabs who are working for a living. During this period, the Arabs at The Lukus dragged themselves through the day doing about half a day's work, moaning and groaning and even fainting when it was convenient. But if they were true Mohammedans, nothing would persuade them to give it up or sneak a drink of water, and they lost pounds of weight.

Finally the whole period came to an end—the occasion for a terrific huge feast in all the Arab kabilas.

Larbi hurried to me one day toward the end of Ramadan and announced flush-cheeked that I was invited to his house for the elaborate feast. We went in the waning light of the late afternoon, when our work had been completed. You could feel the excitement in the air, hear the Arabs calling to one another all over the farm, laughing and hurrying with their brass tray tea tables balanced securely upon their heads. And off in the distance sounded the thud of a darabukka, the small Arab drum, and the high, questioning note of a ghaita, the Arab flute.

We drove up to the kabila in a jeep. There were several of us—Pepe, myself, Marron and gaunt Espejo—all looking forward to a good meal. Larbi's kabila was easily the most fascinating of the four on the Lukus farm, at the highest point of the property. We had to leave the jeep at the bottom of a hill and walk up because there was only a crude footpath winding through the brush and rock. As we came to the top, there was Larbi wearing a new yellow silk turban and pantaloons of deep purple satin. He had on a mauve blouse and an orange cummerbund. With his shining black skin and white teeth, Larbi was a Technicolor picture.

And the view—it made one jealous of the Arabs who could live up here all their lives and look out every day all the way down the valley as far as Larache, and across the Mehasen to the dark blue mountains!

This was a double celebration for Larbi. Besides being his feast to end the Ramadan, he was having the feast for the baptism of his newest baby son. "Baptism," they call it when they speak to our race, but actually it is the circumcision ceremony that takes place two or three days after the birth of the son. We were expected to visit the little patient first thing. For this purely female function, Larbi handed us over to his wife, who looked years older than he, bent and shrouded in her cumbersome white cotton haik. She was glad of this rare opportunity to get into the picture; the Arab woman is usually called only to serve the meal to her master and his guests, and never introduced as Larbi had just introduced her to me. She led us halfway across the hard-packed dirt yard to the chabola that was the women's quarters. Then, glancing curiously over her shoulder at me, she motioned for me to pass in front of her.

I could hear her behind me asking rapid questions of Pepe in Arabic: "Does the señora Americana always wear trousers, like an Arab?"

Pepe answered, "Yes, she wears them all the time when she is working on the land."

That pleased the woman and she caught up with me again, gently nudged my arm and with timid signs showed me that we both wore trousers of a sort. It was a way of finding some common ground.

To enter the chabola, we all had to stoop to the waist, and once inside, we still had to half crouch to keep from striking our heads on the ceiling. The floor was hard-packed earth. In the center there was a small charcoal fire, going full blast and tended by another old woman, surely some leftover relative of Larbi's or his wife's. The fire gave off an enormous amount of smoke; it hung in thick blue clouds and our eyes began to smart and then to stream from its strength. Strings of drying red and green peppers and herbs were suspended from the ceiling, and there were mounds of potatoes and tomatoes and melons on the floor. In a miniature hammock of woven hemp, swaying gently, was the new baby. The old fire-tending crone hastily brought a crude oil lamp that was belching off more and blacker smoke and this she thrust into the poor baby's face.

He could not possibly have been sleeping anyway. I leaned over and peered into the wizened face, and noticed his puffed eyes squeezed tightly shut against the smoke and his pain, but leaking tears out of the edges. Still, he was not crying and my heart went out to him, learning so young this lesson that he would have so much chance to practice in the life ahead of him. I looked up into the brown faces of the women, staring at me so fixedly, waiting for a verdict, and I quickly pronounced him, with extravagant gestures of my hands, absolutely the finest baby I had seen in a long time. The ladies relaxed gratefully and giggled. Until I had spoken, they seemed afraid that I would not like their child. I called Pepe over and through him I said, "I have four babies in Nemsah." I showed them how tall with my hands. "They would like to come and see you and bring some clothes to your new son." This delighted both the women and they patted me affectionately on the arm and bobbed their heads up and down.

It was getting darker now and the old relative lighted our way across the yard to Larbi's main chabola. This was a larger hut, rectangular in shape, with higher walls. Once inside the anteroom, we were able to stand up straight. We removed our boots, stepped across the second threshold onto Larbi's fine collection of woolen rugs and arranged ourselves along the wall against the many satin cushions. Larbi sat solemnly in the exact center of the room, cushions heaped behind him to help maintain his erect posture. An outsider would never have guessed that just the day before we had all been crawling over a tractor together; and Larbi would have been offended had someone mentioned the harsh word "tractor" in this, his social setting. We Americans who continually cut across social talk with remarks about "the flier I took on the market today" or "if the union would just let me increase production" could take a lesson in deportment from Larbi.

We were no sooner seated than the tea ceremony began, Larbi's wife bearing in the tray and kettle and silently retiring again. In spite of the intimate conversation we had engaged in such a few minutes before, Larbi's wife never even looked at me; she might have been any servant impersonally serving her master.

When we had all been served tea, a large, round wooden table on squat legs was brought in and placed in front of Larbi. He motioned us to surround it, and as we did, his wife put a huge pottery bowl in the center. It was the traditional Arab dish, a whole baby lamb, stewed and served with the couscous meal and rich with raisins and almonds. We ate this with our fingers, as we were expected to do, rolling up the sleeve on the right arm, dipping two fingers and the thumb into the couscous and taking a large pinch which we bounced onto the palm of the same hand, rolled up smoothly into a small ball and tossed into our mouths. The other hand is never used. In between balls of couscous, we tore sections of the lamb from the bones and ate them with relish.

We were all leaning back from the table, groaning from the quantities of couscous, when Larbi's wife set before us an oversized platter of small roasted chickens. These had been done with raisins and almonds, also, and were cooked to a crisp golden brown. We pulled ourselves closer to the table and began again on the chicken. Through the open doorway we could see the women and the children gathered around the couscous bowl, eating hungrily of what remained.

Our tea glasses were constantly being refilled, and when the chicken platter was borne away it was replaced by a kind of Arab pancake, sweet and syrupy, called galets, with which we terminated our feast.

"My hands, Larbi, is there something to wipe them on?"

They were so sticky that I could not possibly lick them clean, as Marron was doing in correct Arab custom. Larbi looked distressed for a moment and then his face lit up. He turned behind him and from a colorfully painted wooden chest he drew a length of fine white satin and handed it to me happily.

"Use this, señora."

"No, I wouldn't do that. It is much too fine." But I saw from his eyes that he would be hurt if I did not, so I took it and carefully cleaned my hands.

"It is my wife's wedding petticoat," he explained proudly.

As we were lounging back on the cushions, a weird sound started up outside. It began as an indistinct noise in the distance and gradually, as it came closer, it separated into the Arab drum, the darabukka, and the high-noted, wailing flute, the ghaita.

Larbi smiled again. "The dancers," he explained. "I have paid the most and they will dance in my very yard tonight."

We put our boots back on and staggered out into the yard. While nobody was watching, I slipped over to where the women were finishing up the sticky pancakes, and in those few Arab phrases which I can manage, I told Larbi's wife that it was a magnificent feast we had eaten and how thankful all of us were.

We stood there in the pale light of the moon, like two conspirators, she glancing continually over at her husband to be sure he did not see us, but reluctant to have me leave. We assured each other, with much arm waving, that we would get together again soon.

The rising moon had flooded the whole hilltop with an unreal bluish light. And the dancers had indeed come into Larbi's very yard, only the tops of their bobbing heads visible above the milling, jostling crowd of admirers that came along with them and pushed into the yard.

In deference to the fact that Larbi had paid the most, the ragged crowd of men and women and youngsters fell back a bit and left us who were standing in the door of the chabola a clear view of the night's entertainment. There were only two dancers, a man and a woman, and they were engaged in the classic Arab dance—facing each other across an imaginary ring and coming slowly together in a circular motion, with nervous, mincing steps in time to the mounting music. When they finally met in the center of the ring, the music was frenzied and the dancers bobbed their heads at each other's faces frantically, their bodies never touching. The audience apparently considered this scandalously sexy and they went into screams of ecstasy. Upon closer inspection, I realized that the "woman" dancer was not a woman at all but a female impersonator. When I questioned Larbi, he told me that women were never allowed to participate directly in these risqué dances. Each time the dance ran its course and the wild climax was reached, the audience screamed for more, flapping the sleeves of their jelabs, throwing back their hoods to howl their approval.

It was very late and we told Larbi good night, telling him not to come with us, that we would find our way along the path and down the hill.

"As you will it, el oum. Allah go with you." Larbi bowed his head once and returned to the dancers.

"What is that name they always call me?" I asked Pepe curiously. "That name in Arabic el oum?"

Pepe and Marron exchanged amused glances over my head. "Don't you know? It's the name the Arabs have given to you. It means 'the little mother.'" And then they were suddenly embarrassed by this sentimentality and Pepe shouted back to Espejo, "Hurry up and we can all race down the hill and see how the señora runs!"

I recalled the Arab plunging up and down in front of me on his horse, longing for a race. It is an urge that all males seem to have—an almost physical need to establish their superiority over the female.

"Give me a head start," I pleaded, breaking into a trot.

"Nada de eso—nothing doing!"

I broke into a run and was off down the hill. The hill was so steep that the faster I ran, the faster I had to run. The three young men passed me effortlessly on either side, running easily and emitting piercing, happy war whoops. A wispy cloud passed between us and the full moon, obscuring the winding path among the stunted trees. And then it was as bright as day again and I was arriving, still running headlong, at the foot of the hill in the little valley. The men were already there, sprawled around on the ground, catching their breaths. I brought myself to a grateful stop and dropped down onto a handy rock, huffing and puffing. Said one young man to the others—could it have been nineteen-year-old Pepe?—"The little mother doesn't run so badly, considering her age!"

With the men I worked beside day after day, whether Arab or Spanish, I was at ease. They did not disapprove of anything I might say, wear or do. If at times they found me unreasonable, they hid their feelings under the mask of unfailing courtesy. Or they might even try to explain to me how they felt. They accepted me as fellow workman and friend.

This was not always true of my fellow farm managers. There were times during our weekly business meetings in Larache when I sensed their disapproval as a tangible force filling the room, the subtle resentment of a woman who was daring to voice demands in an Arab-Spanish world where women are supposed to be subservient. It made no difference that most of my demands were based on the needs of poorer, less privileged men of their own race.

From the first day I had peered into the dusty patio at Adir I had been troubled by the apathy of the men squatting there, images of despair muffled in heat and wool, sunk in the silence of complete, utter boredom. While talking with several of these men, the idea of a club began to form in my mind.

I stopped Rafols on his rapid way through the patio one day.

"Trouble?" he inquired, glancing swiftly from face to face and turning his eyes finally to me.

"Quite the contrary," I began cheerily. "We only want to borrow a building for ——"

"No! You have borrowed enough buildings. We cannot afford it. You are spoiling the men."

"But, Rafols, this building is empty!"

I had almost been telling the truth. It was practically an empty building: an ample, rectangular room attached to the end of the largest granary. It did contain a few dozen scattered sacks of chemical fertilizer, but these were easily spirited off to another warehouse and we were left with our lovely empty building.

We needed first an organization to run this club, and just as urgently we needed money. So we called everyone together to elect officers. The men crowded into the room, hot and dusty from their day's work. Lacking a chair, I sat on an upturned tomato basket. They made a serious thing of founding their club and elected Montes, the blacksmith, as president. A young man called Luis was elected treasurer-secretary. Fair, sallow, with a serious, never-smiling expression, he was the nearest we could produce to an intellectual. With Montes to lend us an aura of respectability, Luis would do nicely to keep us on a business-like basis.

We levied a dues fee of five pesetas (about ten cents then) a month against each member and that included all his family too; his wife and children were then eligible to enter the club. We had intended the club originally for the Spanish personnel, but the more enlightened Arab men who were interested could and did use the club facilities. There was no question of the Arab women's participating, simply because all their tradition was against their taking part in such a public project.

The day after our first meeting Rafols was doleful. He shook his head discouragingly: "It won't work, Betty, it smells too much like a union."

"Don't be silly, hombre. We are out to amuse ourselves. The last thing from our minds is to create any political significance. Leave us in peace, man, leave us in peace."

And he did. He watched carefully from the side lines, but he made no move to interfere.

We got on with the decorating details. One of our main ambitions was to achieve a movie, so Vicente, the company carpenter, built us a very adequate projection booth out of plywood boards, set up on stilts at the far end of the room. On either side, he built a set of bleachers to hold the audience. The painter who had done my house wandered in. We asked him to paint us a white "movie screen" opposite the projection booth. He outdid himself and added elaborate floral decorations in colors on both sides of the finished screen.

Besides providing the diversions that were so badly needed, the club sparked that flame of brotherhood that had been lit so hesitatingly by our building of the dormitory. The men had their quarrels, of course; but they were all working for the same results and ultimately, for the first time, they were working for themselves. They realized this and it was important enough to make them settle their differences and pull together. In the long run, the newborn feeling of teamwork among the laborers was much more important than whether my corn crop failed or succeeded.

Rafols gave us permission to build six card tables and chairs, and these we enameled glossy forest green. We nailed a bulletin board to the wall. I contributed my oversized dining table. In no time at all we had all the basic requirements for the first club that The Lukus had ever seen.

I had an old Telefunken radio, left over from the war, and this we sent to be overhauled. I had dozens upon dozens of American magazines, and these all went to fill the reading table and to be added to each month as I finished with the new magazines that came from my parents in Maryland.

These magazines inspired the first notice on our bulletin board. I came in one evening and Luis had laboriously written out on the office typewriter a notice which said very sharply:

"These magazines are the property of the señora and out of respect to her you are hereby ordered to take good care of them!"

"Oh, no, no, Luis," I protested, "that isn't the right idea at all. In the first place, they are not my magazines any more. Anything that enters that door belongs to the club. Now let's work out a kindlier notice about the magazines."

Luis regarded me with his solemn, unsmiling face. "Señora, they won't listen to gentle notices. They are all tough guys and we gotta treat them tough; but we will do what you say!"

Our notice finally read something like this:

"Magazines are for the enjoyment of all in the club. Please return them to the table when finished."

In spite of Luis' predictions, the notice worked. Gnarled, work-roughened hands leafed through the magazines hundreds of times. The Spanish wives took them home to look at in the privacy of their own houses. The magazines were always returned respectfully to the table. We got such a backlog that we were at last able to hand them around, for wrapping paper, always scarce in Morocco, or to the children for cutouts.

We were now accumulating a modest little mound of money and Luis and I made a trip into Larache one day and bought several packs of cards, a couple of sets of checkers and dominoes and a set of chess. It was a pleasure in the evenings to drive through the patio and see the light streaming out of the building, to hear the radio blaring too loudly and the raucous voices of the game players outshouting the radio.

One morning when I pulled up to the gasoline pump to fill the station wagon, Luis, who dispensed the gasoline, came running out of his little hut, full of excitement.

"Señora, a great opportunity has presented itself! One of the army officers' clubs in Larache is moving quarters. They have a brand-new billiard table, but no room for it in their new club. They will sell for below what it cost them, just to be rid of it. It is made for us, señora; what do you say?"

"I say it will be awfully expensive," I told him.

Luis persisted. "We'll never find one so cheap again. If you ask The Lukus to put up the money, we can repay something each month. Please."

So Luis and I paid a formal call on the army headquarters. We were led into a large room by a captain. Two orderlies uncovered the billiard table and everyone turned toward me, expecting a professional appraisal. I studied the table seriously from all angles, running my hand over the green felt. I really had no idea at all what to look for. Persuaded by a vigorous shake of Luis' head, I turned to the captain and announced, "We'll buy it."

Luis, arranging to have it transported to the club that very afternoon, was as joyful as a child with a new toy, and it did turn out to be our most popular plaything. I was even told later by a billiard expert that we had made a good buy; the angel was still watching over well-meaning fools.

The United States Information Service in Tangier possessed several fine movie projectors; they offered us the loan of one, provided we could assure them a maximum audience. They also lent us a selection of their own films—educational films on life in the States, Disney cartoons and newsreels. Everyone was satisfied with the arrangement, but we also wanted to show a feature film every second week. This was harder to arrange, but there were companies in Madrid that did rent features. They were a sorry list of titles, all ancient and mostly horse opera and whodunits, but I comforted myself that this was what the Lukus people would prefer. And, sitting on one of those hard bleachers, surrounded by the rowdy children and the sweaty men and the tidied-up women waiting for the first projection to start, it seemed as exciting to me as any Hollywood première.

The educational films of life in the United States interested everyone; more so than did the Hollywood films. The Spanish wife could see in what surroundings and with what equipment an American woman kept house. The mechanic could follow the day of an American mechanic from the time he got up until he went to bed. To a man, the audience was astonished at how hard American people worked, at how much of our money goes to taxes and, obviously, at the amount of material wealth a modest laborer is able to accumulate.

The USIS came to our rescue also in getting our club library started. They made us a gift of 100 good titles translated into Spanish: Gone With the Wind and Mark Twain and John Steinbeck. Each month they thoughtfully added one or two. We took money from our dues fund to buy a whole series of paper-backed Western and detective stories. Whenever I happened into someone's library in Madrid, I managed to beg a volume or two, and in this way our collection grew satisfactorily. We also subscribed to several monthly magazines and a daily paper.

One day Padre Tomás happened to be turning the pages of a volume and suddenly he put it back and turned to Luis, who was nearby.

"Tell me, boy," he said rather impatiently. "Why is it that all the good books in this collection are by American authors? There are many fine Spanish writers, you know."

Luis faced the padre squarely. "It has something to do with generosity, padre. I agree with you that we have lots of good Spanish writers, but somehow we Spaniards lack the spirit of giving to those poorer than ourselves. The Americans may not have the best writers, but, padre, they give and give and give until it makes me ashamed."

On one of my Tangier trips I bought a three-speed machine and a handful of long-playing records—all Spanish music: rumbas, tangos and flamenco, rhythms to which they could all dance. The evening we installed it was one of wonder all across the patio. A few of the men were familiar with the old, hand-wound machines, but not even one of them had ever seen, or imagined, a long-player with an automatic record changer. They pushed one another to get close enough to see the arm draw back and the record drop in place. There was a hush over the room. The melody of Tres Veces Guapa (Three Times Beautiful), everybody's current favorite, floated out into the patio. Couples drifted together and the dancing began. By and by the only sounds were the music from the new phonograph and the scrape-scrape of clumsy country shoes against cement, broken by an occasional giggle or a hardy, masculine guffaw.

It was not Beethoven in Carnegie Hall or Tommy Dorsey in the Empire Room, but it was better than that line of bored, tired, discontented men sitting on their heels along the patio wall each evening.

September, the time of harvest, came to Morocco so abruptly that it took my breath away. It seemed that only yesterday it had been spring and I was worrying with Marron about getting all the corn seed into the ground before Rafols snatched away our avantréns for the other crops. One day the fields were all green—the corn, the rice, the cotton—with the sun blazing hot in the sky from early morning until late at night. And we were cultivating out the weeds and combating the insects with sprays, and saying to one another, "Will this corn never grow high enough to stop worrying us?" Now—the very next day, it seemed—I was looking out over the Lukus Valley and the whole scene had changed. The fields were all brown, the leaves on the trees, the ribbons of roads through the parcels. Even the river was brown, with its sluggish water running muddy. And although the days were still as hot as ever, with the unblinking sun overhead, the nights began to be colder, forecasting the autumn.

I asked myself, Where did all the days go? How could these cornstalks spring up so fast?

Marron was striding ahead of me down the rows of dried, rustling, crackling stalks, hitching up his blue jeans with one hand and with the other pulling nervously at his old felt hat. He was jubilant; his face, usually an unemotional mask, was wreathed in smiles. "The corn is as dry as we can expect, señora. It is ready to be picked." He had stopped in the middle of a row, plucked a yellow ear of corn from its stalk and he was breaking off the grains one at a time and rattling them around in the palm of one hand. "We can start whenever you say."

"Tomorrow it shall be," I said. "Tomorrow is our official first day of harvest."

Actually, we did not anticipate much of a labor turnout on the first day of harvest because the Aid el Kebir had just ended. The Aid el Kebir is the big Arab fiesta of killing the sheep—representing the sacrifice of a mutton instead of Abraham's son. It is celebrated only once a year and the Arab families save all year long so that they can buy a sheep for their celebration. On the first day of the festivities the sheep is killed, and as long as there is any left to eat, the Arabs are not likely to work.

So, for our first day of harvest, Marron and I counted on having only a few of the Arab women show up. But even fewer than we expected came down from their kabilas, and we began with only fifteen well-fed, slow-moving ladies. Later on in the month, when we were working furiously against the impending rains with 130 hands each day, we looked back upon that first morning as a miracle of calm organization.

At the time it did not seem calm at all. Such large quantities of corn as ours had never been raised before in Morocco, and there was no precedent to tell us how we could harvest it without machinery. In America I would not even have attempted such acrobatics, but Gomendio had continued to resist the purchase of a mechanical picker. Short of buying one with my own money, there was nothing I could do except make out with hand labor.

Our problem, then, was to pick by hand 1000 acres of corn, transport it from the scattered parcelas in which it was planted to some central point, shell it through our corn shellers and get it sewn neatly into sacks in time to ship it off to whichever customer paid the highest price—all before the autumn rains set in.

We gave each of our fifteen Arab starters a basket, placed them at the beginning of fifteen rows of corn in Parcel 31, and told them that the object was to break off the ear of corn, husk it, drop it into the basket and proceed to the next stalk. The "girls" all nodded wisely, their silver earrings jangling and their colored beads tinkling. They set upon the cornstalks with as much delight as if this were a new game they were learning.

Our idea had been to let these fine ladies husk their baskets full of corn and dump the ears into a center pile every 200 yards or so. We soon found the corn was so dry that a vast quantity of it was being involuntarily shelled off onto the ground, from where it was impossible to retrieve it.

We solved that slight difficulty by rushing to the granary and detaching several piles of old sacks from the protesting granary clerk. We picked out the oldest, most decrepit Arab on the payroll and set him to work making large sack-blankets on which to dump the corn. About twenty sacks sewn together made a satisfactory, leakproof dumping ground. Our Arab needleman sat on the edge of Parcel 31 with his legs crossed under him, his needle in hand, surrounded by sacks. He sat absolutely still in the blazing-hot sun and sewed without interruption; at midday he seemed ready to go shimmering skyward, so hot it was, but he sewed on unaffected. Only when night fell did he put down his needle.

With the mutton from the Aid el Kebir feast lasting so nicely, it was several days before we got enough corn collected to start our shellers whirling. By the time we had 100 or more fairly interested pickers—women, old men and young boys—we were able to keep one truck occupied all day in transporting the corn heaps from the parcela to the Nemsah era. And if the parcela, with its hundred-odd milling, chanting, sweating bodies, presented an aspect of chaos, well, the work in the Nemsah era presented the same chaos, concentrated into a much smaller area. We had only half as many workers, but thrown together as they were upon a table of cement only twenty yards square, it appeared that there were twice as many of them, their voices seemed louder, their problems more immediate, more pressing.

I put Espejo in charge of the era and I gave him two serious, hard-working Spaniards to help with the specialized work—weighing each sack of corn, and sewing it closed afterward. The weighing, certainly, was no speciality, but it was next to impossible to get the Arabs to put the same amount of grain into each sack. The sewing, though, was indeed special and required special workmen. These men had come from Seville, where they had closed thousands of sacks of wheat with their needles and cord. Each man reminded me of the "little tailor," sitting as he did cross-legged on an already sewn sack and moving slowly on down a line of sacks. Another skill was that of aerating the corn. The men from Seville would attack a pile of corn with two long, flat wooden paddlelike shovels and, very like circus jugglers, keep a stream of gleaming yellow kernels constantly in mid-air.

We chose two separate crews to man the two shellers and tried to create between them some feeling of competition—who would shell the most corn, whose machine stopped the least, which general area was kept the neatest. We tried each day to shell all the corn we had picked, and that often meant working long after dark, sometimes until after midnight.

We fell into a routine that held nothing else for us but corn on the stalk, then ears of corn, then mighty piles of shelled corn and finally stately rows of sacks filled with corn, and piles of bare, stripped cobs. We arose in the morning to the corn, we dropped into bed late at night still breathing the heavy odor of corn. There was nothing else in our world.

I should not have been in the cotton section in the first place, because it was not my job. But toward the end of the harvest, I got so sick and tired of corn that I just took off in the morning and went somewhere else, anywhere so long as there was no corn. So, this day, I drove my car out into a cotton parcel that Gamiz had planted near the border town of Alcazarquivir, where The Lukus has more landholdings. I stayed around all day, eating a little food from Pepe's lunch basket. It was hot, and the air so still that time itself seemed to be suspended there.

In the late afternoon, I was sitting with Pepe on the ground beside my car trying to manipulate a drink of cold water from a botin—a large pottery jar in which water is kept cool. It has only a small hole in the top, and to get a drink one must hold the botin up in the air, open the mouth wide and direct a tiny jet of water into the mouth. As I put the botin down again in the shade of the empty sacks, a Lukus truck drew up and stopped. It contained two or three drums of gasoline for refueling the tractors, and the two Arabs in the back of the truck set about unloading while Pepe sauntered leisurely toward them. The Arabs were hoisting the drum straight up over the truck tail gate. The thought crossed my mind fleetingly that they should have lowered the tail gate first and rolled the drum out, and then I was on my feet shouting because I could see that the drum was not going to fall out of the truck, it was teetering back onto the two Arabs. One of them looked up at the drum with his face frozen in fright, and leaped back out of the way. The other poor man, his head bent under the weight, failed to see the danger. The drum crashed back onto him with an ominous sound.

Pepe reached the truck first. He hitched himself up, looked over the side and dropped back to the ground again, covering his face with his hands and moaning. I caught hold of his shoulder, digging in my fingernails. "What is the matter? Get on your feet!"

"Can't," he babbled. "Blood all over the place—makes me sick to my stomach."

The victim in the bottom of the truck was screaming now and his companion had jumped over the side and fled. I looked around hastily for something that could stanch the flow of blood. "Give me your shirt, Pepe, and get the tail gate down as fast as you can."

He continued to moan like a hurt child and I shook him by the shoulders with all my might. He seemed to come back to his senses, and gave me the shirt. I climbed up into the truck. The hurt Arab was curled up in a ball, clutching his ankle with both hands and holding what was left of his foot up in the air. The flange of the heavy gasoline drum had dropped full force across the bare toes of his right foot; the little toe was gone completely, the adjoining three were dangling grotesquely and the big toe was smashed to a pulp. There was nothing I could do there in the truck except cover the wound and stop the blood flow. The T shirt was pitifully inadequate, but I gathered the foot together as well as I could and wrapped the shirt around and around.

Now the wound was hidden, Pepe was willing to help, and between us we carried the man the short distance to my car. The frail old man weighed hardly as much as a good, robust first-grade pupil and his bones stuck out all over his body.

We arranged him in the back seat of the station wagon and Pepe sat beside him while I drove full speed into Alcazarquivir. Fortunately, the village had a Red Cross hospital. We pulled up in front of it and began unloading our Arab. A crowd of loitering Arabs gathered immediately and followed us up the walk to the hospital door.

"It is the American señora," explained one Arab. "She was driving too fast, as they all do, and has struck down this poor old man. He will die!"

"That's a lie," barked Pepe in Arabic. And the crowd fell back more respectfully.

We brought the old man into the emergency room and I hoisted him up onto the examination table while Pepe went to find an attendant. I found a towel, wet it under the faucet and wiped the old man's face, smiling at him, saying it would be all right, trying to give him some confidence.

In a few minutes the attendant came in the door. He was an Arab himself, with dark, close-cropped hair, a little mustache and a pale, olive skin. He was smoking a cigarette and he took it out of his mouth long enough to ask in perfect Spanish, "What is your trouble?" Then he replaced it.

"Field accident—man has cut his toes across—has to be sewn up right away."

The attendant looked at me for a long moment. "I guess I can do the diagnosing myself," he informed me, and with one hand he began to undo my crude bandage. In the other he held his cigarette.

I cut in, "This man is in a bad state of shock. He should have a shot of something—morphine or whatever you have."

"Morphine!" snorted the attendant. "That stuff costs money, señora. We don't just give it to everybody."

"He is a Lukus employee and you can assume that the company will pay for it," I snapped.

"Si," he said, looking up from the wound. "Well, let me enlighten you. The first thing The Lukus would ask me is why I had wasted morphine on this case!" He had reached for a bottle of alcohol and poured it over the wound and wrapped it up again hurriedly in a surgical dressing. I winced for the patient.

"Is that all you are going to do?" I demanded indignantly. "If the toes are to be saved, it has to be done immediately."

The attendant had finished his cigarette. He dropped it on the floor beside the table and ground it out with his heel. "The doctor comes in to make his calls in an hour. He'll fix it up then. The toes? He won't even try to save them—too long a job, too messy. He'll just take them off. These beasts of the fields never know the difference."

We stood looking at each other from opposite sides of the examination table, with the old man lying between us, staring mutely from one face to the other, trying through his haze of pain to understand what was going on.

I folded my hands together behind my back, noticing that they were trembling, and I began again in a quieter, lower voice, "I should think your being one of them would make a difference. Except for some twist of luck, you could have been a 'beast of the fields' yourself today. I should think you would want to use your superior education to better your own race in any little way you can. I would be ashamed, if I were you."

His dark eyes narrowed to slits and a half-smile passed over his mouth. "One can see you have not been long in Morocco, señora. The first law of Morocco is 'Every man for himself.' If I were to give this scum the morphine you talk of—which I know he needs as well as you know it—if I were to spend three hours sweating to save those toes of his—and I know they could be saved—why, tomorrow I could be looking for another job. It wouldn't be a job in any hospital, either. You see, the word would have gotten around that I was a little bit too much interested in the Arabs. Do you understand now?" He spoke almost kindly.

"It's an inhuman attitude."

"On the contrary, it is only too human. The Spaniards want to preserve their position in Morocco; why not? And they cannot do that by giving in to the Arabs even in these little things. And as for my particular position, the Spaniards hand out these jobs. So I do exactly what you see here." He turned his back quickly and began to fumble around in a wall cabinet. In a moment he turned again and he was holding a hypodermic needle. As he held it up to test it, he smiled at me. "I can say he was screaming so loudly that he disturbed the other patients!"

I left the hospital and found Pepe waiting patiently in the car. The sun was low in the sky and the heat was beginning to lift.

As I climbed behind the steering wheel, Pepe said, "Permit me to buy you a granizado de café"—coffee in chipped ice—"at the café, señora?" I nodded silently and we drove down the main street, into the big square where the café was.

If we are to have genius we must put up with the inconvenience of genius, a thing the world will never do; it wants geniuses, but would like them just like other people.

GEORGE MOORE

One of my last missions in the autumn was to make Pepe's big wish come true. He wanted to go to America more than anything else. It obsessed him. He was always talking about it. And I had worried my brains to find a way. Then I remembered that my father was always having difficulty finding labor for his farm and I wrote to him. He answered with an enthusiastic yes, he would take the young man for a year. I made a hasty trip to Tangier to wangle a visa for Pepe from the American legation and buy him a boat ticket. It all happened so fast that I had no time to consult Pepe along the way, and so when I finally went to see him, there was no way of turning back from the trip.

I found Pepe down and miserable with malaria, the occupational disease of Morocco. He was racked between the bouts of fever and chill, but feeling well enough to be propped up in bed. The room was filled with other young men flopping about on the floor, and Pepe was entertaining them all with one of his stories. I sat down on the foot of the bed and listened. When he finished, the room vibrated with the loud chattering of carefree men and we were able to speak in that complete privacy which only crowds and noise can offer.

"Are you feeling well enough to travel?" I asked.

Pepe smiled, thinking I was teasing him. "You know I am always ready to travel. Where am I going? To America, perhaps?"

"Yes," I said. "Your ship leaves the day after tomorrow."

A look of astonishment and joy colored his wan face. He pushed his covers back and swung his feet out of bed onto the floor. "Suddenly I don't have malaria any more!" he announced.

On Wednesday I drove to the southern extreme of the farm to get Pepe. He lived there with his parents in a house with a thatched roof, mud walls and a dirt floor. At the parting, Pepe's grandmother wept openly and told us all that she would never see him again. His father was mute with the agony of this long voyage his son was taking. His mother took it all with great dignity and until the last minute kept patting Pepe's arm and telling him, "Be a good boy."

We drove in silence into Tangier. What is there to say to a youngster w[illegible] is going to America for the first time? No matter how you

From research comes TRUTH...

To determine the truth about speed of pain relief without stomach upset, three distinguished medical experts—one in a prominent eastern medical school...another in the medical department of a great mid-western university... and another whose work centers in several of New York's largest clinics—have conducted independent studies of Bayer Aspirin versus an aspirin with a 'buffer' added.

Since 1954, when the first in this long and penetrating research series began, these doctors have given thousands of doses of Bayer and the buffered aspirin to men and women actually suffering from pain—because this is the one final and absolute way of testing the value of pain relievers. And now, this vast research project is over. It confirms—overwhelmingly and undeniably—a truth we have known for years...

And the TRUTH is...

BAYER Brings Fastest Relief

the fastest, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief you can get!

MINOR PAINS OF RHEUMATISM? There's no need to let the minor pains of rheumatism or arthritis stop you from having fun with the youngsters. Just take Bayer Aspirin and you'll get temporary relief that's amazingly fast! Bayer also works with remarkable speed to relieve neuritic and neuralgic pain. And remember—the highest-quality, best-tasting aspirin you can give your youngsters is Flavored, Children's-Size Bayer Aspirin.

ACHING MUSCLES? When too much exercise brings on backache, or other muscular pains, Bayer Aspirin will make you feel better fast! This is because a Bayer tablet disintegrates on its way to the stomach. Thus Bayer—unlike pain relieving tablets which are still whole when they enter the stomach—is ready to go to work instantly, without delay, to relieve pain. Remember—for many kinds of pain or ache, Bayer is what millions take!

describe it, he will find it completely different in his own eyes. The ship I had found was one that had just recently added Tangier as a port of call and its schedule was rather haphazard. When we inquired at the shipping office if it had arrived, the clerk went to the window that overlooked the Bay of Tangier, whipped up a pair of binoculars and peered out, gyrating slowly to take in the full sweep of the bay.

"Nope, don't see any sign of her, but you can't be sure—better go down to the dock and take a closer look."

He wrote the name of the ship on a piece of scrap paper and Pepe and I went down to the dock. We asked several loiterers if they had seen our ship, describing it to them as "this long, and painted battleship gray." No one had seen her. I was anxious.

"We can't afford to miss her—not now," I said.

We hired one of the grubby little rowboats that scuttle beside the Tangier docks looking for tourists, and we went slowly rowing around the harbor among the ships which were anchored there, looking from close range at all their names.

Pepe began to laugh. "It seems a funny way to go to America, doesn't it? Rowing around the harbor trying to find your ship!"

"The manner couldn't matter less," I told him, thinking of the thousands of now prominent Americans who had entered just as ignobly.

There was the loud hoot of a new arrival and we turned to see our ship steam slowly into the bay. As soon as her ladder was down, we climbed aboard and settled Pepe into his cabin.

As we were leaving the cabin, Pepe clapped a hand over his mouth. "The police! Dios mio! The police! I have forgotten to notify them that I was leaving."

"Well, never mind now. I shall do it when I get back to shore," I told him, although it seemed to me that the police could be a touch sharper and notice for themselves that a citizen was departing.

The steward of the ship spoke Spanish, which assured Pepe at least of getting his meals. His cabin mate was an American. "Try to learn a few words of English on the boat," I advised him. There had been no time for lessons on the farm that summer. "And learn everything else you possibly can—Morocco needs it."

We shook hands briefly. I climbed down the ladder and my patient Arab rowboat captain rowed me to shore again. When the ship pulled out of the bay, bound for America, I could see Pepe standing at the rail, a lone figure, setting out on a big adventure, and I waved to him for courage. Pepe waved back. I am not sure, still, who was encouraging whom.

Another piece of unfinished business was the matter of little Manolo's education. It did not depend upon me, as Pepe's trip had, so much as it depended upon the mother superior in the Red Cross hospital in Larache. With my time grown short, I had asked to see her.

We sat together in her parlor, dimmed from the sun's hot beat by drawn curtains, and discussed the small Manolo. He had continued to develop well that summer. He no longer objected to having his hair cut on Haircut Day and he took his evening bath with simulated relish. He learned to read very capably, and he often read the nightly bedtime story in my stead. His writing improved remarkably and he worked hard at his drawing, which he liked the most, and even painted some. His patience with the littler boys was endless and he helped Jay carefully with his Arabic vocabulary. He ceased swearing altogether; not only just in front of me, but for all occasions. His face filled out and he added an inch to his height. All round, I considered that motherless Manolo was making progress and that the progress should be continued when I had gone away.

The mother superior held the key to Manolo's future because she chose the candidates for a free school which the Catholic Church operated in Spanish Morocco. It was really only for orphans, but in extreme cases they would accept boys with a parent still living. I wanted the mother superior to choose Manolo, but she vacillated; she had many other commitments.

"His reading and writing have improved in a remarkable way," I pointed out to her, hitching myself forward on the chair.

"He has always written well," she answered. "We were the first to teach him, you know."

Manolo had suffered a bout of malaria in the Red Cross clinic and the sisters had kept him for some weeks, taking special interest in his instruction.

"That is all the more reason why you should continue," I hastened to say.

Suddenly she tired of the whole thing and stood up, her gray skirts swishing gracefully around her ankles, one waxlike hand clasping her crucifix. "There will be a place for Manolo in the school this fall," she announced. "Send his father in to talk to me and see that the boy has some clothes to bring with him."

I was so pleased that I couldn't find the words to thank her. I had dreaded leaving Manolo on his own. It was the same feeling I had toward all the things I had started on the Lukus farm: the dormitory, the dining room, the club, the layettes, the distribution of used clothing; not only these material improvements, but the undefinable spirit of good will that had sprung up among the people. I felt that we had gained some hard-fought ground through the summer months and that, in my winter's absence, there was the danger that it might be lost again. I felt that having shown these people the way, it was almost my duty to help them stay on that course, and in going away, as I had to, I was deserting them.

In order to show them all that I was not really deserting, that my absence was only temporary and that, soon enough, I would be there again to continue our battles, I went around those last days saying, "I'll be back in the spring." To the timid ones it was a promise and to others—to Rafols, for instance—it was meant to be a threat.

And about my failures—the many things I had attempted and been refused—I felt temporarily set back, but not defeated. Spring would come soon and I would be back to try again.

I opened my eyes to see Gomendio towering over me, legs apart, hands on hips, with an astonished look on his face.

"What are you doing asleep here in this ditch? I have been driving all over the parcela in my jeep looking for you and just as I am about to give up, here you are, sound asleep in a ditch."

I sat up slowly, retrieved my black jacket from where it had been serving as a pillow and began brushing the grass out of it.

"No wind down here," I explained, looking up into his face. "I was tired from being out in this field since dawn. And cold." I shivered a little. Now that I was awake, I felt the cold again. I put my arms into the sleeves of the jacket, zipped it up the front and pulled the collar around my ears. "What can I do for you, anyway? Do you want to see the remains of the corn in the field—in Parcel Forty-four? Remember when you assigned me that nasty little parcel? It gave us lots of trouble—Marron and me—but the results have not been too bad. Shall we look at it?"

Gomendio hesitated. "I want to talk to you alone."

I looked at the sweep of fields bare in all four directions, bare of rice, bare of cotton and almost bare of corn. "We couldn't be more alone," I offered cheerfully, "except in the Sahara. Let's look at Forty-four." I climbed into the jeep and Gomendio took the wheel. We jounced past a mile or two of broken cornstalks. I studied them avidly.

"You never get tired of the corn, do you?" Gomendio said, watching me from the corner of his eye, but he plainly had something more to say, and it was hard for him to begin. His hands moved nervously up and down the steering wheel. He cleared his throat several times.

"You will make a lot of money this year, Betty," he began brightly.

"So will you," I rejoined quickly. "Everybody will be rich."

It was true. We had a lot of corn between us. The British Food Ministry had been so impressed with the sample we had sent them they had cabled their acceptance of the entire crop at a good price. We would both make a considerable profit.

"Yes." Gomendio added lamely, "It has been a good year for all the crops."

"Was that what you drove out to discuss with me, Gomendio? The condition of the crops? The price of corn?"

"No. No, of course it wasn't." He jammed on the brakes impatiently, stopping the jeep with an abrupt jerk. He yanked open the door and stepped out onto the narrow road; I stepped down too. I was determined to cooperate.

Gomendio had turned and was leaning over the fender of the jeep, his hands folded together on the hood. The corn rose up behind him, dwarfing his bulky height. Corn does that to anyone, no matter how big. He looked into my eyes for a moment, sadly, and then he lowered his eyes to study his hands.

"There is no easy way to tell you anything, Betty. You always want it hard, square between the eyes. I had hoped you would understand my mission, had hoped you would meet me halfway."

"That is the way I prefer things—straight," I said quietly.

"Very well," he said slowly but firmly. "What I have to say is simply this: we don't want you on the Lukus farm any more." He stopped, but he did not raise his eyes.

I put my hand up to my throat instinctively with his first words. It was as if he had reached across the jeep and struck me with the full strength of his hand. I withdrew my fingers quickly and composed my face. Still he did not look up. He was waiting for me to speak.

"Who is 'we'?" I asked. "The board of directors?"

"No, Betty, not the board of directors—the people here."

"You mean the men I work with? Their wives? The little children?"

Gomendio glanced up impatiently and looked away again. "Of course not. You know who I mean. The Spanish women in town, for example; they feel you have taken over too much. They feel ——"

"The women in town don't know if I am here or in Madrid," I interrupted sharply. "No, it is not the women."

"Well, the rest of us, then," Gomendio began again.

"You mean Rafols wants me to leave?" I asked.

"No, not Rafols alone."

"Then it is you, Gomendio. You want me to leave. Yes?"

"All right, Betty," he burst out crossly. "If you want all the details, I want you to leave, yes."

"Why? Why? Why? What have I done wrong? Who have I hurt?" I waved my arms around dramatically and my voice rose.

"It is not exactly that you have done anything wrong, Betty, it is that you want to do things differently. You want to do everything the way you do it in America; all these democratic ideas of yours—they just won't work here because the people are not educated enough. Besides that, you attract too much attention. All of Morocco is watching you, commenting on every new thing you do. You want to change everything around. You upset everyone. You ——"

I slammed my fist down on the hood of the jeep. "That's not fair! Many times I am right and you are wrong."

"Let me explain. You could stay here, Betty, and do what you want in a small, unobtrusive way; you could have your little club and your dormitory and your movies every two weeks, the people would be happy and no harm would be caused. But no, for you that is not good enough—you take the club and the dormitory today, but it is only a steppingstone for you; your eye is on tomorrow and tomorrow you want something more and the next day more until every laborer in The Lukus has the same material things and the same rights as I have and you prove finally that we are all equal.

"Well, I don't happen to believe that, Betty. You can't tell me that some black-skinned Arab squatting on his haunches in a chozo is as good as I am and deserves to have the same rights. I don't believe it, and as long as you do believe it and keep insisting on proving it here, we can never agree."

"Be practical, Gomendio. What I want is only a way of life that is bound to come to Morocco someday, as surely as we are standing here. And I am not insisting that I have to be the one to do it. In fact, I prefer if you do it yourself—I want you to do it."

Gomendio shook his head hopelessly. "Don't you see? What you want is a miniature United States of America here in the heart of Morocco, and that is the only thing you will settle for. You will go hammering away until you get what you want."

"Well, all right, Gomendio, make a little America here in Morocco. What have you got to lose? Time? You have lived your life already. Money? You have more money than you could spend in three lifetimes. Why don't you do this for Morocco—help to start a new kind of life where the Spanish laborers live a little more like humans and the Arabs have some rights too? Of all the Spaniards in Morocco, you are the one with a chance to be remembered for something worth while, and you stand there telling me to go away!"

Gomendio stopped looking at his hands. He raised his eyes and they were troubled. Troubled, and very sad.

"Every word you say may be true, Betty. Morocco will probably be free the way India is finally free. Someday. But have you ever looked at it from my point of view? I am a Spaniard. Suppose I do what you say in a great burst of democracy? Suppose the Spaniards who control Morocco do not want it that way at all—and you know that they certainly do not—where would I be? I'll tell you—I'd be an old man with no place to go and all my life's work a ruin. And don't think the Arabs would thank me either."

"Ah—fear," I said. "It is something else—if you are afraid. What are you afraid of? Your reputation? What people will say? Your money? Don't you have enough yet? Or you haven't lived long enough—you want some more years, and peaceful ones."

Gomendio's face clouded over with anger. "I should slap you across the face! It is all true, what you say, but you make it sound dishonest and cowardly and somehow unclean. What I am doing is what any Spaniard would do in my place."

"That's right," I nodded my head vigorously. "It is exactly what any Spaniard would do in your place and you are exactly that. Not a great man with great potentials—just a little man playing it safe—any Spaniard."

He rejected all this as coldly as he could. "We are a thousand miles apart in the way we think. We could stand here forever arguing and neither of us would change. Twenty years ago I might have listened to what you are saying, might have tried it even; I don't know. Now I know it is too late.

"The Lukus is mine, Betty. It belongs to Gomendio, not to you. You act as if it were all yours; everyone is calling it 'The Señora Betty's farm,' 'The farm of the señora Americana.' Well, it is damned well not yours!" His voice rose strongly. "It's mine!"

Gomendio looked out over the acres that had recently bulged with their offerings of corn and cotton and rice. His snapping eyes softened a little and he made a motion with his hands as if he were caressing the land.

"I know every inch of this land, Betty. Since I was a young man I have tramped these swamps, driven the machines that have shaped these parcels, seen luxurious growth rise up out of nothing. All my hopes, all my aspirations begin here. True, I am older now and I don't go galloping through the ditches the way you do, but I don't need to either. I have served my time. I want a peaceful old age, and a quiet one. It is my right for the years I have worked. With you there is nothing but change and more change and too much action. And who knows if the end will be good?"

Gomendio put his straw hat back on his head. It was all over. Already the sun had touched the horizon, spreading dull red, and the corn was throwing a long, gray, eerie shadow. Gomendio climbed into the jeep, leaned across the seat and wrenched open the door at my side.

I got in. There was nothing else to do. As we jostled over the dirt road toward Nemsah I tried to strangle a sob. Gomendio's knuckles whitened around the steering wheel.

"I have never seen you cry, Betty. I describe you always to all my friends as a pillar of strength, meeting whatever comes imperturbably. The Lukus means more to me than it does to you; remember that. I am going to keep on looking straight ahead, and when we arrive at Nemsah I hope I can go on thinking that you never cry."

In Nemsah I got out of the jeep without waiting for Gomendio to open the door, but he hurried out and blocked the way as I entered my gate.

"Will you shake hands with me, please?" he asked solemnly.

I hesitated a moment. "No, not tonight. I don't know if we are still friends. Perhaps you've betrayed me. I'll have to have some time to think."

I recognized that Gomendio was right: I could not compromise. He was sincere when he said I could have continued working on the Lukus farm in a modest way, if I were willing not to interfere with the established methods of doing things and with the way of life. When I thought this over carefully, I realized that I could never accept those conditions. If I did accept them, it would mean I had given my tacit consent to them, and this I would never be willing to do.

So I would leave, as Gomendio had asked me, without any protest. And I would shake hands with him and we would remain social friends. It would be an empty, pointless friendship. I would leave, but I would not be leaving entirely; something of me would stay behind in Morocco and spread itself out, I felt, over the years to come.

To begin with, there was the hybrid corn. Everyone had seen what a tremendous improvement hybrid-corn seed was over ordinary seed; it had resulted in almost doubling the grain they could expect to harvest from each hectaria of land in Morocco. I had the satisfaction of knowing that never again would ordinary corn seed be planted on the Lukus farm, and eventually this practice would spread through all Spanish Morocco. In that manner, even the most remote Arab would feel the difference: for every ear of corn he had harvested previously, he could now harvest two. He could raise twice as much stock on that grain or he would have twice as much grain to sell in the market on Wednesdays.

The soil-testing practices and the irrigation by portable aluminum pipes were also there in Morocco to stay and to grow into custom.

The idea, at least, of permanent pasture and of rich grasslands had been accepted on The Lukus and in other years it could be developed with success.

In Adir, the dormitory would remain standing in spite of my absence, and the new dining room-kitchen would be completed and occupied with pleasure, although I would never go there again to see it. I regretted missing the smile that would wreath Manolo's face when he could cut his doughnuts on an ample, white marble counter.

The club would survive, too, and grow in all directions as the men became accustomed to having a place of recreation that belonged just to them. I could help the club out from Madrid by continuing to send magazines and books, and I could still cut out the layettes and send those to Emilio for distribution. Emilio could also take care of passing around the clothing my mother collected. So these services could survive without my presence in The Lukus Company.

All my new friendships would have to be ended; for Marron was no man to write letters. He would write to me occasionally, I knew, but he could never put into words what he was feeling, and what would he have to say to me, a señora living in Madrid? And what would I have, then, to say to him?

There were a hundred things; they slid through my mind, one after the other. Some of them brought a smile, some of them made me sad. I felt I would never have the spirit to enter such an overwhelming project again; I would have to find, instead, some gentler outlet.

But in the final sum, I could not be discouraged, nor could I feel that I had given my heart and my energy in vain, because I knew that I was leaving so much that was good behind me.

When you say good-by to a place for the last time, you remember everything clearly. Such as pushing open the tired screen door of my house that last morning and remembering the way it still stuck at the bottom. It will always stick at the bottom. And thinking idly, as I had a hundred times before, that I must get Vicente to plane it down a little. He never will plane it down a little. The cool feel through my boots of the red tiles that make up the porch floor, cool still from the quiet morning shower, although the sun was already warm on my face. The look of an Arab woman, padding gracefully down the sandy road, her spotless haik hiding everything except her black eyes and her broad bare feet; she with a two-foot-long monkey wrench balanced absurdly across the top of her head, on her leisurely, timeless way to a tractor miles away. The feel of the saddle under me and of gawky, bony Quimera under the saddle. The way the sand crumbled away from her hoofs and the glistening darkness of the orange leaves with the raindrops not yet evaporated in the sun. The last look of the yellow Caterpillar tractors crawling down their long brown rows, involved already in next season's problems. And the men, Arabs and Spaniards; the good ones and the bad ones, all saying adiós until next season and all of us knowing, really, that there would not be a next season for me.

When I came back to Nemsah from my last ride, my sons were tumbling out of the house and Pilar's shrill, far-carrying voice was demanding that they help get the luggage loaded into the station wagon. And my sons already were looking forward to celebrating Christmas in Madrid.

Fern, at 35, had never held a job. Suddenly she had to be mother-father-breadwinner. Triple life takes a heavy toll.

Fern Morlang has been dazed for over a year and a half. She tries not to show it in front of the children. Occasionally she takes out of its cardboard carton the last gift her husband gave her, a 400-day Black Forest glass clock. It doesn't work. Herb had said, "We'll adjust it as soon as we find a permanent place to live." He never had time to.

Herb was 36 and in the prime of life when he sat down in his easy chair one evening after dinner, rustled open his newspaper, and his sigh of contentment became a strangled call for help. Fern ran from the kitchen, and at his stricken look helped him to the couch. He barely had time to tell her of the pain that had flashed at the back of his head and down his neck, when he lapsed into a coma. It took only about ten minutes for the local ambulance to arrive. Herb never regained consciousness during the night at the hospital with his wife at his side. At 5:30 the next morning, February 8, 1956, slightly before dawn woke the sleeping town of Fallon, Nevada, Fern was a widow after having been a wife for sixteen years. Cerebral hemorrhage had struck without warning.

She can never reconstruct the days that followed. Pain, fear and disbelief blurred them mercifully. Voices reached her ears, she stood at the local veterans' plot, heard taps played by Legionnaires in uniform, was handed a folded American flag she took home and put in a dresser drawer, to discover it there, with no conscious memory, months later. The morning she left the hospital she had called her sister-in-law,

Old house rents for $40 a month. Fern is grateful for it after previous house near tracks. The street here is lighted, the children safe. While she works they shepherd one another, watching over Peggy. Donnie carries door key for all. After school, he will try, with his sisters, to put up old fence that toppled.

Fern rises at 6:45 when she works, wakes the children at 7, has them off to school at 8, is at her own job by 9 A.M. Meanwhile she has made breakfast, laundered, helped pack school lunch boxes, straightened house, and dropped Peggy off at baby sitter's on her walk to the Lariat Motel. Strain is heavy. Gains are few. "I don't think I'll be able to make it work for the next 15 years."

Judy is in charge of the $25-a-week food money and cooks on weekends while her mother works. Connie is the dish dryer, is also learning how to spend for "filling" foods. Jacquie "our domestic one" does most of the ironing. Son Donnie is free of kitchen duty because all the heavy chores are his.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

To take a job at $35 a week, she has to pay $6 for baby care, leave four children on their own.

Esther Sutterfield, who lived half a mile out of town, her own parents in North Dakota, and Herb's father who was temporarily renting a house in Fallon and looking for work. Then she had gone home numbed and made breakfast for the children.

The relatives had taken care of details her mind refused to accept. The men, low-voiced, had pooled money, shaking heads worriedly over the less than $300 left of the $2000 nest egg Herb had brought to Fallon five months before. The women had whispered and spoken into phones and dressed the children for a trip in the car of a prosperous local rancher whose wife had sympathetically offered to take them for a week.

Fern was dimly aware of bills being paid for her, of envelopes of $5 and $10 bills being pressed on her by relatives with work-worn hands. Everyone tried to help. And none of them, Fern knew, had an income that could suddenly take care of six dependents. All lived in crowded quarters on inadequate budgets. Her father and mother, retired from a struggling farm, had little security. Herb's father, who had spent his middle life farming in North Dakota, was looking for laboring jobs. In her overturned life, Fern was left with the fact that the future of her children would depend on her alone. She had never held a job.

"But I couldn't think then," she remembers. "I knew women worked, and I was sure I could. I was young enough to" (she was 35). With gratitude after troubled family conferences she had thanked her relatives, assured them she would solve her problems, and tried to pick up the pieces of her life.

The children were comfortingly back with her now, in the bulging little two-bedroom house on a side road behind the main highway. It was the temporary home Herb had rented when they moved to town, but even its $65 rent had become a luxury. From now on she would have to breadwin for five—dark-eyed Judy, 14; plump Jacquie, 9; Donnie, who at 8 walked close to his mother's side and squared vulnerably young shoulders; 6-year-old Connie, whose gap-toothed smile of little girlhood had closed soberly; and 14-month-old Peggy, who looked bafflledly upward from face to face.

There was no backlog of any kind. Herb's G.I. insurance had lapsed, he had sacrificed his retirement pension when he left the Government job he had held for ten years. As Fern took stock—a slim and troubled figure in size 10 house dress, blue eyes frightened, voice low, brown hair wisping distractedly—she knew she would try first of all to keep panic from reaching the children. She would begin by cutting bills, one at a time.

Donnie mends porch, nails up fallen screens, repairs doorknobs—"we all rely on him." He gets A's in school, is soberly scientific. The girls will skimp, hoping he can have a full college education.

After school: more work. Fern and Herb used to take children picnicking in California. Life is different in Nevada. But sometimes neighbor Sam Higginbotham takes them riding to see bottomless Soda Lake, big Lahontan Dam or vast desert. Typical road sign: "Next sandwich stop—68 miles."

Little Peggy clowns to make the family laugh. At meals, when they bow heads in prayer, she lifts up tablecloth to see what they're looking down at. Only a frown from Fern stops her giggling. "She's a handful to dress," but Jacquie blocks a somersault.

All the "father's jobs" await Fern's return.

Sometimes, even with Donnie's help, big repairs are difficult.

Her mind was working slowly. First there was the 1950 car to turn back to the finance company, the phone to be taken out. The washer and refrigerator Herb had bought when they came to Fallon would have to be kept, even at worrisome installments of $18 a month—she could not do without them. A cheaper house would have to be found. With Donnie at her side she hunted lodgings, found a dilapidated house near the railroad tracks on the edge of town, almost in the shadow of a barren slope called Rattlesnake Hill, and took it because it cost only $45 a month. The local furniture store rented her a van and forgot to send a bill. The town of 2500 had lately grown as laborers like Herb came to work on an expanding naval air base. Only a few native residents heard of her difficulty, helped where they could. "I didn't know anyone personally," Fern realized. "I always used to stay home taking care of the children and I never knew how to get acquainted easily." For a while, she thought, in the strange new house, she would live from day to day—postponing the problems.

A man from the Social Security agency had called at the house on his monthly day in town and asked her to fill out a form for survivors' insurance, although he couldn't tell her what the sum would come to. "I'm a legman," he explained. The forms would go to Kansas City to be processed and in three months she would have an answer. In three months, Fern thought, she would have a job too. Job and check should see her through.

The truth came slowly. Women did work, but there were few jobs for unskilled women of 35 with babies to care for. Waitress jobs were filled. Industry was nonexistent in the small agricultural town, job openings limited to able-bodied men who could work in heavy building trades. A 9-to-5 job was impossible while the children needed her. Domestic work at $1 an hour or less was unavailable to a woman who could work only late in the day or evenings, when 14-year-old Judy was home to take care of the baby. And in no case could she begin to support six people on part-time earnings.

"I wish we could do something for you," Nevada state-welfare representative Robert Keiffer had told her worriedly, calling on her after hearing of Herb's death. "I know what a spot you're in. But you have to be a state

Old portable sewing machine, bought used for $22, has refused to work for months. Only repair spot is Reno, 63 miles away. Since Fern can't get there without a car, Donnie tries to decide what parts to send for. If he can fix it, Fern can save money by making some children's clothes, altering others.

Fern conquered shyness to talk to government agencies, found little hope. County had no funds. She was ineligible for veterans' pension. State Aid to Dependent Children is cut low if she works. Social Security payment is inadequate because her husband was not regularly covered in his occupations.

resident for a year before we can help. Can you hold out five more months?" It would take that long to establish residence, make her eligible for help that was never a specific figure in her mind.

In March, the shelves were far from filled. But some money came from Herb's brother-in-law Ed, some from Herb's father who had found a job in California, some from her own parents in North Dakota. It all helped buy oatmeal, noodles, soup greens and hamburger for the children's meals.

The peril of her situation had begun to close in on her now. Fern knew little about business—"or life, even." She essays a timid joke as she talks now, to ease the drawn lines around her eyes. "Maybe it was because I was born on a farm in North Dakota—I was eighteen years old before I discovered you could buy shoes anywhere except in a catalogue." It had been a simple world where a woman married, followed her husband, budgeted the food money, and trusted to the future. Suddenly, when Herb's big 5'7", 185-pound frame no longer bulked between his family and a world of strangers, Fern forced herself to conquer shyness and seek out strangers for the answers.

"First, I thought I could find an answer in California." Her in-laws in town took care of the children while Fern went back to Vallejo, where she and Herb had lived for ten years. "I stayed with Herb's sister Gerda out there and tried to find out about laws." Neighbors had asked, in surprise, "But isn't there some kind of widow's aid?" It had such a familiar ring, Fern thought there must be if she simply looked in the right place. No one seemed to know where to look. The local American Legion post thought she ought to write to the state office or the Veterans Administration in Washington, but no answers had come. But her most overwhelming confusion at the time, which she had just begun to grasp, was that she was "stateless," a resident of nowhere because in July, 1955, Herb had moved his whole family over the California-Nevada border to look for a new job.

"All I could think of was writing to the President," but she rejected the idea, sure her efforts would turn up answers. In California she had paused again, not knowing where to look. "Then I suddenly thought—if anybody knew about laws and could explain them it would be the district attorney," and she went to see him. He was courteous but regretful, made an appointment for her at the California welfare office. "The woman there asked me to fill out a form, and after I'd filled it all out she looked it over and said that to get welfare help we'd have to live in California for a year. I'd CONTINUED ON PAGE 182

It has been a run-around of filling out government welfare forms. But you can't feed children on paper.

First Baptist Church is one pillar of security and friendship in town. All five children take one another to Sunday school there. Fern lacks time for church activities, can't join groups or entertain. But lately, "feeling so terribly alone," she began attending services while out of work.

have to move the whole family back, wait a year, and after that they could help anybody in the family who was born in California" (the four youngest children were) "but she couldn't say how much it would be."

Fern had looked at California apartments—"they were $85 to $95 a month—I could never afford it." An unskilled job might bring her $50 a week. It would cost that much to hire a housekeeper if she took a full-time job. And there were scarcely enough funds now to keep the children fed and clothed, much less move six people across a state boundary. It would be better, then, to hold out four months in Nevada instead of twelve in California. More baffled, but feeling a stubbornness that surprised her, she went home to Fallon.

"It seemed as though the only thing I could do was give up the children, and I wouldn't do it. I wouldn't put them in a home or give them out for adoption even for a while, not after they'd lost their father." And a dim, flickering indignation began to grow in her. If there were funds for keeping children in an institution—she hadn't looked into it—there had to be a way children could be cared for by a mother of their own who was willing to work.

In April, she waited for May.

In May, her survivors' insurance check arrived. She opened the envelope with trembling fingers. There was a lump-sum death payment of $150. It would pay the overdue rent, she noted mechanically. And there was the first of her monthly payment checks. She puzzled over the sum. Herb, she was to learn later, because he had worked as a farm hand, spent four years in the Army, then become a Government worker, had not been regularly covered by the Social Security laws.

His widow would get $16.10 a month for her support, but only if she did not work. Holding a job would cut the benefit. Each of the children would get $11.80 a month for food, clothing, lodgings and all necessities.

"It was so bad I couldn't believe it." She was aghast at how much hope she had placed in the Government check. She sat at the kitchen table and cried bitterly then, for the first time in months. The children were at school. Only Peggy, at her mother's feet, burst into alarmed sobs. Stricken, Fern picked her up and washed both their faces. "The baby looked so frightened and she didn't even know of what. At least I knew." By the time the baby had been sung to and comforted and the children came home from school, a dry-eyed but drawn Fern was at the stove cooking the invariable pot of noodles that would be the children's supper. She would add browned hamburger, a can of tomato soup, a can of corn—"I've kept changing the vegetable for variety." Fortunately the children liked it and it filled the young bodies Fern tried to picture subsisting on less than $3 a week.

Judy, who bounded into the kitchen with long-legged awkwardness, was always a help. Glancing at her mother's face, she took the big spoon and apron from her, chattered determinedly about trivial things—"And, mother, Mike—he sits next to me—he says world history is utterly boring and he's ready to drop it." With big-sisterly authority she put a stack of plates into Jacquie's outstretched hands, spanked the blue-jeaned rear of Connie, who was standing and listening instead of putting out knives and forks. Donnie was free of housework. He did all the repairs for his mother, and, in fourth grade, had already begun to walk alone as the man of the house. It was he who carried the door key and kept his sisters from crossing streets against the lights. When they talked about the future, as they had timidly begun to, they had agreed that the girls would all try to finish high school and maybe Donnie could be sent to college. He had A marks, a knack for science, and they depended on him. Quiet and protective, Donnie had already saved his 25 cents a week allowance for eight weeks toward a tool chest he needed to put the house in shape for his mother.

But it was Fern herself one night who boarded up the sagging and broken windows of the old house in feverish fear. "There was no one thing that happened," but a steady trembling had begun to come over her. She no longer looked for a job, but stayed home at night in the old house on the black and lightless road. Vagrants wandered past from the tracks, calling to one another with loud shouts. The little girls had orders not to go out when their mother wasn't home. But Donnie, playing in the street one day, had been hit by two older boys with a piece of timber,

ABOUT THE "ADC" PROGRAM— AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN

- A provision to cover aid to dependent children now exists in all 48 states. Nevada was the last state to adopt it, in 1955. It is in all states a part of the Social Security program suggested by the Federal Government in the 1930's and taken up by states as they felt able to afford it. The name of the program and the amount of funds vary from state to state, but the program shares some characteristics in all states:

  —Its purpose is to help children live with a parent or relative when deprived of support by the death, incapacity, desertion or absence of the breadwinning member of the family.

  —In no case must the residence period required by a state be more than a year.

  —A welfare worker must visit the home to prove need and check data.

  —Aid must be available in all parts of the state.

  —Children are eligible up to age 18. (However, some states limit their coverage, stop payments at age 14 or 16, for example.)

- Low-income states have a higher percentage of children than high-income states. Federal aid helps equalize opportunities for all children, but the program is state-administered.

- All taxpayers support this program through Federal, state and (in some cases) local taxes. Altogether this program costs about 2/10 of a cent out of each dollar of national personal income.

- The state has to take into account, in determining need and amount of payment, any income the family has, including Social Security benefits. In general, states provide a level of living that includes only minimum essentials. The national average payment per person in a recent month was $25.92.

- Funds available vary. From time to time, Congress has increased the Federal share. Sometimes states vote an increase or decrease of their own appropriations. Aid to children is not a constant sum. Available funds affect the amount of payments, as do other factors.

a cruel head blow that had taken five stitches and $33 to repair at the local hospital. If she were ever to hold a job, Fern knew, she would have to move, somehow and somewhere. If she could fight the breakdown that threatened—hold out till July—make the relatives' checks do—she could see it through. At one desperate point she had visited the local county welfare office to see if they had emergency help toward the still-owed hospital bill. But their funds covered little. "I could only," Mrs. Selma Groth had told her troubledly, "give you a two-dollar order for groceries from time to time, or some old clothes, but we don't have the funds to get them cleaned after people give them to us." Fern had thanked her, pinning all hopes on the state check in July. She could move then to a safer neighborhood, leave the children alone during vacation, and hunt for summer work.

In July, everything happened. The tide turned. Big Ed Sutterfield, husband of Herb's sister, had been helping her hunt apartments in the housing-short town. A farmer and itinerant harvester, he worked part time on Fallon's neon-lined Main Street, in the Keystone Club owned by Darrell King. Over the ring of silver dollars racing through legal slot machines, the two men had talked of Fern's dilemma and found a temporary answer. "You tell Fern I have a house vacant—the one on West Williams Street—but the land's worth more than the house." King had been frank. "If she can make do with it, she can live there, and just forget about paying rent if she doesn't have it." Set on a street that was to be rezoned for business, the house had grown run-down but the land had been put up for sale. Gratefully, Fern moved to the cottage whose doors were warped with age, paint weathered away, steps replaced by planks leading from porch to bare earth. The house was old, but it stood on a main thoroughfare under street lights, companioned by fresh and landscaped bungalows, patrolled by police. It would be safe for the children.

FAMOUS OVERNIGHT

By BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN

HOW AMERICA LIVES
in the November JOURNAL

She had scarcely settled in when help came from another quarter. Four blocks down the road, Sam and Beryl Higginbotham, who owned the Lariat Motel, created a job for her.

Lively-eyed Beryl had seen the children at play, noted their good manners, had glimpsed the young widow shopping with thin handbag in the pleasant neighborhood. Word of her story had traveled now, and Beryl called on her one day resolutely. "Sam and I could use a chambermaid to help us out at the motel. We could pay you $35, and if you started in the morning we could arrange your hours so you'd be home in the middle of the day. I don't think myself," she went on warmly, "you should have to leave your babies at all, but we heard you were having trouble." She remembers Fern's face startled with hope as she answered, "I can start any time you want me."

By nine the next morning, five months after Herb's death, Fern was on salary. Vacuuming and dusting each of the eighteen units after the overnight guests had sped away, changing linens, mitering bed corners, wheeling the big cleaning cart up the paveway, she was breadwinning for the first time in her life. Stopping in the central apartment off the motel lobby to join Beryl and gruffly kind Sam in a morning cup of coffee, she had found stanch and understanding friends. That night she bought a frying chicken on the way home from work, a loaf of gingerbread and a 65-cent quart of ice cream and the whole family celebrated her job. It was a feast—nobody had ice cream now except on birthdays. For Fern, July was the month when "the pain began to wear off." It was the month, too, her first check came from the Nevada welfare office, for $149. Thinking she was not eligible now that she had a job, she returned it with thanks. She was earning the same amount.

August sped. Nevada's silver dollars clinked heavily in her purse, but they spun out fast. When the school term started in September, she had to board the baby. By word of mouth she heard of teacher's wife Mrs. George Jurgens, Jr., who took in children for day care. Luckily the Jurgens cottage was a few blocks down the street on the way to the motel. Little Peggy could be dropped off in the morning, would be fed lunch there and kept until 2 P.M. for $1.50 a day, or $6 for four weekdays. Friday was Fern's day off. On Saturday and Sunday while she worked, the children would take care of one another and go off, all five, to First Baptist Sunday school, where even Peggy sat quiet under her brother's watchful eye. When all came home they would take off their "good" clothes, make lunch for one another, and wait for her.

But the double strain of being mother and breadwinner was thinning Fern to a steady exhaustion she had to fight after work. Everyone loyally did chores. Judy and Jacquie did the week's grocery marketing on their mile walk home from school each Friday, took a 50-cent taxi to bear the load of cartons and brown paper bags they couldn't carry. It worried the girls. Sometimes Judy, with $1.51 left of the grocery money, would have to choose between milk and bananas, spaghetti and soap. Jacquie had asked her mother gravely, "Couldn't we buy a car with the money we spend getting the food home?" Some stores delivered, but in the long run they cost more than the supermarket, and Fern would explain it while she penciled out price differences for her daughter. She knew to the penny.

By three in the afternoon, when she had finished at the motel, all her "mother's jobs" waited—teaching, cleaning, cooking, laundry (household linens Friday, clothes in the morning before work to be taken in from the line later), mending, ironing, supervising homework, drying tears. And after them came a father's jobs—the fallen-off doorknob to fix, the rusty screen to nail in place, the broken window to be repaired. She had to learn to change fuses—when she tried, sparks flew out and she had no idea where to look for the main power switch. The leaky faucet defied her when she tried to explain to a hardware store the parts or tools she needed to fix it. The broken chimney pipe in the kitchen took her a week of work as she replaced worn black elbows with shiny replacements she had carried home from Main Street, and the result made the children hilarious. Fern, standing back, laughed with them—"I was as exactly like the picture of the crooked house in the storybook Connie ran and brought me!" But there was work that defied her completely.

Ed Sutterfield came to help when he could. And Sam Higginbotham stood by on big repairs Donnie couldn't do—the washing machine that flooded the floor, the door that came loose from a hinge. When the ironing board collapsed under hard workouts by the two older girls, Sam dropped in to resolder it and Jacquie leaned her dark young head close to his to whisper conspiratorially, "Don't hurry with it, Sam—it's my week to iron." Whenever a man's big laugh rang out in the house now the whole family stopped and turned to it and even small Peggy came racing in to the unexpected sound.

But on ordinary work-filled evenings, with hours scarce, Fern grew weary. The broken sewing machine stood in a corner while she mended by hand—there were no repair facilities in town, no funds to send it to Reno for service or parts. When there was a spill on the rug that called for cleaning, all five children joined shoulders with her to push at the overstuffed chair Herb would have swung aside in a single motion. The big black oil heater in the living room was a monster bearing no instructions on where oil should go in or flame come out, and "not wanting to blow us all up" she had to call the utility company and ask for someone to come and explain it. As the weather chilled there would be extra fuel to buy, and she tried desperately to remember what Herb had said their bill was the winter before. The electric bill of $14 had already taken a deep monthly cut and she asked the company to recheck the meter to be sure there was no mistake.

With all her fathering and mothering, life wasn't working out financially.

Fern knew it, and even Beryl was troubled about her employee. Ends scarcely met now that sitter fees cut her earnings to $29. "You can't live this way," Beryl would say indignantly at the motel office. Its file case held a fruitless correspondence. Long letters to the Veterans Administration had brought back answers that the widow and children qualified for no aid. Forms from the Social Security agency restated that by earning over $1200 a year Fern would have to turn back part of her Government check. She had explored every avenue she could think of, and without Beryl's typewriter even the correspondence would have been impossible. It would be fifteen more years to put Peggy through school, and how she would manage Fern had no idea.

It was pointless now to think of the dreams Herb had, but her memory went straying back.

It was 1939 when Fern Bolkan, daughter of farmers in Raub, North Dakota, met Herb Morlang. She was finishing high school. He had been working as a migrant farmhand ever since graduation from eighth grade. It was May 2, 1940, when they married, summer of the next year when their first daughter was born, the year after when Herb was inducted into the Army. Until 1945 Herb was in the 13th Armored ("Black Cat") Division, a T/5, driving armored cars farther away from his native farmlands and into the final campaigns of the Rhine. From Germany, he was shipped back to California for discharge, and his wife joined him. Mare Island Navy Yard nearby was recruiting workers and Herb, with three years of hard-won mechanical skills, was hired as ordnanceman to inventory incoming and outgoing ships. For ten years he advanced slowly while his work commendations mounted. "Superior performance . . . high degree of skill and ability . . . exceptionally accurate" read the slips that raised his salary to a take-home level of $70 a week.

But Herb had a dream of security for his family. In Nevada, a naval air base was expanding, and land cost less than it did in the town of Vallejo where they lived. "He said he was getting heavy from indoor work, anyway," Fern remembers. He was 36, "just the right age to make a change," he predicted confidently.

In Fallon, a town he had scouted on a vacation trip, small farm-ranches could be had for as little as $8000, and he could combine part-time agriculture with a laborer's job. In July, 1955, Herb made the big move. His nest egg was the $2000 he had accumulated in a retirement fund, his symbol of security the gold-and-glass clock the boys at the yard gave him as a farewell gift to be set up in the new home.

At first the family rented a small house behind a lumberyard and Herb took on a laborer's job with a local engineering company. But unemployment set in—"something was holding up the Government appropriations," Fern remembers dimly, "and there were long layoffs that cut into Herb's money." He switched jobs to work for a roofing contractor, carrying buckets of tar up and down ladders in the hot sun. "It didn't seem to bother him. If he ever worried, he never let me know—he always took care of things," Fern says of the cheerful, dark-eyed man who had spent another day of layoff laughing with her at home, playing with the children, eating a hearty dinner before the fateful evening he sat in the easy chair and was struck by death.

She had to think ahead, she would remind herself, but her mind would go in circles. She could see no way of taking care of things. All she could do was live by the day and keep her fingers crossed.

Early in the year Peggy began to pick up chronic colds and couldn't be left at the baby sitter's. "If she has anything contagious, I just can't risk the other babies I take care of." Mrs. Jurgens had shaken her head regretfully. Donnie and Connie had sniffles, too, and she was steadily losing more time from work. With all Sam and Beryl's generosity, it was impossible to go on taking their checks. Tourist trade had dropped during the slack season, and keeping her on was straining the Lariat budget.

Only state aid could keep the household going now, and she went to the welfare office to reapply for help. The "ADC" check that she had once turned back with thanks would now be a lifesaver. ADC had been a mystery at first—the state had no pamphlets to explain it. By now Fern had learned that it stood for Aid to Dependent Children. While she worked all income would be deducted from her check, so that it would come to about $7 a month. But now jobless, she could receive about $150 a month. The money was based on family need, with no sum allowed for medical or dental work, but she would be able to squeeze medicines out of the food envelope. The dental checkups the children needed would have to wait.

More pressing blows had fallen. The house had been sold. A buyer for the lot even now waited for the family to move. And at the motel one night, Beryl and Fern thoughtfully talked about the future. In 1957, or '58 at the latest, the Higginbothams hoped to sell or lease their business and retire. Whether Fern would have a job open under a new manager was unknown.

Often before, she had wondered whether to go, whether to stay. The move to a big city might bring more income, but it would throw her children alone into busy streets during the day or take most of her salary paying for day care. Now the only solution left seemed to be to go home to North Dakota, to the small town of Raub, where her parents lived. A few friends and relatives were still scattered on struggling farms nearby. "I could find a housekeeper's job there ——" Fern realized how vague her plan was as she talked it over, but it was no vaguer than anything else she could think of. She would take any kind of work she could get. Gifts of milk and vegetables from the farm would help the children. There wasn't a penny in the bank for moving. But somehow she would have to move.

"We'll help," Sam and Beryl had promised.

Again she walked to the welfare office, her mainstay now, to talk over job hopes. "If I go to North Dakota—and can't get work right away—will I still be able to get help or will I have to wait another year there?" This time she would not have to wait, Robert Keiffer assured her. Nevada was one of the few states that could help while she was transferring to another state. Once again, there was no way of knowing what the aid would be—it would depend on what housing she found, what job.

It would be a gamble that might lead nowhere.

"I would give up," Fern thought to herself on the way home, but there was no way to give up. There was nothing to do but struggle until she found another house, or raised money for bus fare, or looked for other part-time jobs, or resigned herself to living on welfare. She would go on polishing the children's shoes that were getting too worn to walk in, mending Connie's dress and brightening its frayed skirt with 35 cents' worth of rickrack, looking for a remnant for Judy. "Our home-ec teacher," Judy had said the night before, "wants us to make a tweed skirt, mother, but the material costs five dollars!" Fern had distractedly watched her daughter paring potatoes and all she could think to say was, "Make the peelings thinner, dear." Donnie needed a new coat. She would have to think.

Tonight the menu would be hamburger casserole again. She browned the meat, opened a can of corn, broke up the 25-cent head of lettuce bought for salad to help Judy practice nutritional meals. The children had all bowed heads while small Connie said grace:

". . . Thank you, Lord, for birds that sing,
Thank you, Lord, for everything!"

Days would go into days. After the children were in bed she would set her mind to it again. With their faces vulnerable and young, she would go on looking for an answer, and she would lie sleepless with the urgency of finding it as night closed in. END

Fern's job consists of cleaning 18 units a day at motel on main highway.

WHAT FERN HAD AS INCOME WHILE SHE WORKED

Her Social Security check paid $75.10 a month for support of the family. But by earning $1820 a year at the motel, she would have to sacrifice eight of her own $16.10 benefits a year, bringing the check down to $59.

At the motel she earned $35 a week but paid $6 a week for baby care, bringing her cash earnings down to $29.

Her cash income in round figures:

8 months a year—$125 from motel, $59 from Social Security, a total of $184 a month.

4 months a year—$125 from motel, $75 from Social Security, a total of $200 a month.

In the course of an earning year she would have $2272, or an average $189 a month, or under $44 a week to support six people in all daily needs plus emergencies.

HOW THE MORLANGS SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

If Fern does not work (minor illnesses of children, slack season at motel have kept her home periodically) her outgo figures for the family remain much the same. ADC check, currently about $150 a month, supplements her Social Security income and keeps household going when she cannot earn. Relations still help out. Expenses are cut to the bone.

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

although he is entirely ignorant of human nature, and at the moment he is studying to get a degree in engineering. He speaks five languages and earns his living as a translator and tutor. Max let fly with words to the effect I was a stupid, uncultivated peasant, who should be grateful to him for rescuing me from a backwoods farm. My stepfather is a small-town druggist and I was a high-school graduate studying to be a nurse when I met Max. I answered with some choice and assorted words of my own. I then locked Max out of the house. I should be ashamed to admit it, but in a peculiar way that disgraceful scene was bracing and stimulating to me. It was as though I'd won some sort of victory over Max, proved he couldn't push me around any more. Yet I know my lack of control is harming our children, and my children mean everything to me.

"Max and I met back in Oklahoma when I was barely eighteen years old. He was serving his first hitch in the American Army; Korea was to come later. At this late date it's hard for me to comprehend why I was so wild to marry him. My experiences growing up hadn't recommended marriage to me. My mother and my stepfather fought all the time, although my mother tried to hide it by locking us kids out of the house whenever a fight was in progress. Many a night my brothers and I would be shivering on the porch until ten or eleven P.M. And every Sunday directly after we returned from church and ate dinner we were ordered outside and we stayed outside until evening. My mother and stepfather liked to loll around all Sunday afternoon in their dressing gowns and my mother was too much of a prude to want us kids to see them. It didn't ever occur to her we might peek through the windows and she didn't care how miserable it made us feel to be locked out of our own home. Other kids in our crowd weren't treated that way.

"When I married Max my mother refused to attend the wedding because he was of a different faith and was foreign. Actually I suppose it was Max's foreignness that first attracted me. Max was different from anybody else I had ever known. He was a man of twenty-six, not a callow boy. Things had happened to him, real things. He could talk about Rome and London, Vienna and Paris, cities I had only read about. He had wit and polish. In those days, when Max was opening the world to me, his good manners and his sense of humor hid his arrogance and meanness.

"Max and I met at a USO dance. Afterward we saw each other every day for three straight months. I couldn't get enough of his conversation. Max would telephone the hospital where I was training and ask the switchboard operator for Queen Anne—Anne is my middle name—and when I answered he would tell me he was Henry the Eighth. Max would tease me by pretending that he, like Henry the Eighth, was a great ladies' man, but I didn't believe him. He didn't even kiss me until we had gone together for a month; and with every other boy I knew it was smack, smack, smack after fifteen minutes.

"I quickly made up my mind I'd marry Max if I could catch him. Possibly my mistakes began right there. I was too humble, too dazzled by him. Nowadays, in our quarrels, he reminds me of how I chased him and insists he didn't want to marry. That isn't true. Max proposed to me. On a Saturday night we had dinner at the only decent restaurant in town. There were flowers on the table, bought by Max. After I admired the flowers Max suggested we exchange napkins. I was puzzled, but I took his napkin. Out tumbled a diamond ring and a wedding license made out in both our names. 'Marriage is what you want, isn't it?' asked Max. I gasped out that whether we married depended on what he wanted too. Max replied that he thought marriage might be good for him. 'Medicine might be good for you,' said I, 'but that doesn't necessarily mean you want to take it.'

"On Monday morning we married. I extracted only one condition from Max. That there would be children. He wanted none. To me a marriage without children is meaningless. Indeed, if I'd had the choice, Max and I wouldn't have stopped with a family of three boys. We would also have had a girl or two.

"Max has always been an abominable father. When our oldest boy was born—Bill is now ten—Max wasn't proud and pleased. He sulked and refused to help me in my first difficult days at home. Home by then was a Quonset hut in Northern California; Max was still in uniform, but he had been transferred to the Pacific Coast. We were still in the Quonset hut when the other boys came along; I used to marvel all of us weren't turtle-backed. Max doesn't love or feel responsibility for any of our youngsters, I'm sure. He hasn't ever slapped or cuffed our sons—he wouldn't dare with me around—but he's never treated them as genuine members of the family with rights and privileges as well as duties.

"After his World War Two discharge, Max was content to work at a piddling, poor-paying job while he acquired a second college degree under the G.I. bill. I thought he had ample education and that his learning should be turned to some practical advantage. But in those days I kept my sentiments to myself. Max continued his efforts to improve and educate me. I love to read, but I don't want to read philosophy every minute; I used to hide my paper-backed mystery novels under the mattress.

"Then along came Korea; and Max, as a member of the Army reserve, was called back to duty. When Max sailed for the Orient he had spent ten successful years convincing me that I was too stupid to draw a breath without his advice. I was lonely at first, but I soon found out that other people didn't consider me a hopeless dumbbell. Within a few weeks I landed a defense job at high wages, I met another working wife at the factory with whom I could trade baby-sitting hours, and I began to save money. When the bank account reached sizable proportions, I made a down payment on a decent house and moved my youngsters out of the Quonset hut.

"For the first time—no thanks to Max—we had a pleasant place to live. Frankly, the boys and I enjoyed his absence. We enjoyed the blessed silence; no nagging, no complaining, no one to pick on us. I enjoyed entering a room without stumbling over a stack of books, without comments on my awkwardness and illiteracy. But on the day Max returned our peace was ended. He was fiercely critical of the house and the furnishings. He objected to my new friends and my new clothes. He jeered at my haircut. He demanded that I quit work and I refused. He took a low-paid job himself and once again resumed the college study that leads nowhere.

"Max can be generous at times—but always with a purpose. He gives me what he wants, and with a smirk on his face like an emperor tossing an emerald at a slave girl. On our first Christmas together—this was back in Oklahoma—he gave me an electric blender, an appliance very hard to locate in those days. I was delighted. On Christmas afternoon Max broke the blender beyond repair trying to clean it. I still think he ruined my blender on purpose. His object was to show the friends visiting us for the day—his friends, incidentally—how lavish and devil-may-care he could be handling expensive, rare appliances. Max is stuffed with idiotic false pride.

"As a bride, I was too impressed by him and too timid to comment on the absurdity of his pretenses. I'm not that timid any more. On my last birthday Max gave me a vacuum cleaner and invited company to dinner to applaud his generosity. I myself enjoyed displaying the gift. But I went in the kitchen a minute and Max and our guests and my birthday present went outside to the driveway. The first thing I knew Max had hooked up my brand-new vacuum cleaner and was using it for the first time to clean his guests' dirty car. I put a stop to the demonstration and rescued my vacuum cleaner. But I had to scream like a fishwife to do it and nobody had much fun at my birthday dinner. Three months ago Max wiped out his bank account to buy me a mink cape when the fur I admired and wanted was squirrel and squirrel is a whole lot cheaper.

"I just don't get the point of his silly vanity. I cut our sons' hair and I used to cut Max's hair, too, but he turns pale whenever I mention the fact in public. Some of our worst arguments have occurred over my barbering skill. Max doesn't like me to excel in such mundane things. Nobody will ever convince me it is smart pretending to be rich when you are not.

"Max is an intellectual snob, but, despite his book learning, many of his ideas aren't too hot. He prides himself on the fact that he is a freethinker; he has borrowed some of his notions on sex from Bertrand Russell and theoretically he believes in polygamy. Yet he is shocked by my interest in sex and by my wish to experience both passion and tenderness. He regards me as too forward in both speech and behavior. He used to hurt my feelings by criticizing the ardor of my response to his love-making. We gave up love-making long ago. In his heart Max thinks there are good women and bad women—and I guess he can't decide which category to put me in.

"In many ways he is an old-fashioned man. He can't afford to hire five servants to wait on me as he would like. Lacking servants, he has done his darnedest to turn me into a built-in cookstove, pressing machine and launderette. He wants to wear two clean shirts a day and knife-creased trousers and eat three-course meals by candlelight—with no children in evidence. Our children led to us splitting up. I came home from my job one afternoon very late and found our three boys sitting forlornly on the doorstep. Their father had locked them out of the house—my house—so he could read a book in quiet. It was then I told Max to find living accommodations somewhere else.

"We quarreled for two months before he finally took me at my word and went. The boys and I are better off without Max, and Max and I are more civilized and worth-while people when separated. I will be obliged if you will kindly tell him our marriage is finished."

Max Tells His Side:

"My reward for serving my country in Korea was to lose my wife," said thirty-eight-year-old Max. His face was sensitive, olive-skinned, narrow; his build was slight. "For ten years Jenny and I were happy together except for minor differences of opinion. For ten years Jenny respected my wishes, conceded that my intelligence was superior to hers and acknowledged that the man should be the master in his own home. While I was overseas Jenny changed into a different woman—a woman I hardly feel I know at all.

"Jenny now sports a man's haircut; she wears pants more often than she wears dresses. On the rare occasions she is in skirts she invariably chooses a color I dislike. Even in the old days Jenny had the habit of wanting to put on a blue dress when I preferred that she wear green, or a gray dress if I thought black would be appropriate. If I wanted veal for dinner the chances were excellent she would serve pork. She always overcooked the vegetables and she never learned to mix an acceptable salad dressing. For the most part, however, except where our sons were concerned, her character was gentle and yielding. At any rate, it seemed to be.

"Jenny has become a termagant and a shrew. She is determined to rule in everything. She flatly tells our sons not to obey my orders. In their presence she shouts that I am an overeducated egghead. It's hardly surprising they, too, are unmannerly and undisciplined.

"Jenny has completely forgotten the gratitude she used to feel at the pains I took to educate her. She now professes to be bored with Plato and Aristotle and the philosophers to whom I introduced her. In our honeymoon days she was fascinated by the world of ideas. She complains I waste my time on books and refuses to admit she is corroding her good brain by reading scores of trashy novels on the sly. Furthermore, she wastes her time working for the telephone company when she should be at home caring for her family. She declares our boys need the money she earns. What they need is more of a mother's company, a different type of mother from Jenny, a mother who would teach them to pay heed to their father's wishes, a sweet and gentle mother who could still be firm and maintain control.

"Jenny has become mercenary in spirit and intolerably penny-pinching. The two years I was in Korea I regularly sent back enough money to support her and our boys on a modest scale. She wasn't satisfied with that arrangement. She took a job without my permission and without my knowledge. She then proceeded to bank two hundred dollars a month until she had a sufficient sum to make the down payment on a house. I was overseas when she informed me in one of her infrequent and misspelled letters that she was the owner of a seven-room house. None of the other G.I.'s I soldiered with had wives who invested in real estate without their knowledge. Naturally I didn't like it. Nor do I like the house. The construction is wretched. Nevertheless, it rather amuses me to hear Jenny grandly refer to my house. Surely, since I supported her and the boys during my absence, it would be graceful of her to speak of our house.

"Nowadays it pleases Jenny to laugh at me because I respect spiritual and intellectual and, let us say, romantic values. I'm no money grubber, but it did appeal to my sense of pride a few months ago to give my wife a mink cape even though we were living apart. Jenny belittled my gift and humiliated me in the eyes of the saleswoman by announcing she preferred a cheaper fur, and then she stated bluntly that on my mediocre earnings I couldn't afford even the cheapest fur.

"As a boy I never intended to marry at all, but once married I certainly did not intend to degrade myself by becoming involved in a divorce. There was too much divorce in my childhood, far too much. My father was responsible. On the surface he was an educated man, a cultivated man, a philosopher, a student, but his marital antics matched those of an international playboy. Before I was twelve years old I had five different stepmothers. I've never understood my father. All I know is that I despise him. In my boyhood, as I was shifted from one household to another, carried here, carried there, by his amorous peregrinations, I used to put myself to sleep by imagining new methods of torturing him to death.

"My mother allowed my father custody rights because in those days a European divorced woman of her class found it difficult to marry a second time, and virtually impossible if she was burdened with a child. I never blamed my mother for giving me away, although long before I became a political refugee I well knew what it meant to be lost and adrift. I was obliged to adapt to one stepmother after another—none was as harsh and unkind to me as my father—and very early I had to learn to accustom myself to hideous quarrels. My quarrels with Jenny are ugly, God knows, but the quarrels of my childhood were worse.

"There was something pathologically amiss in my father. I was the only child of his many marriages, yet he had no affection for me. My scholarship was always high, but never high enough to suit him. He delighted in calling me stupid. On two occasions when he abandoned a wife he abandoned me with that wife. The humiliation, the fear, the lack of security was, I believe, harder on me than the ever-present threat of the war that hung over my youth.

"My father's conduct, combined with my upbringing, made me wary of women. Frankly, as a young man, I thought of sex as a commodity to be bought and paid for. As a young man I didn't dream of a wife and family. I didn't want to bring children into a world as troubled as the world I knew. I shrank from the idea of any permanent entanglement.

"In looking back, I sometimes think Jenny puzzled me into marriage. I assure you I was astounded to find a girl so casual and easy living in the Middle West, a region I'd supposed was provincial and strait-laced. I wasn't altogether charmed by her freedom of action; later, in the years I was overseas, I used to remember back and I would wonder and worry.

Dieting doesn't always do it

By CAROL L. SCHLESINGER

Before		After
5'8	Height	5'8
175	Weight	174½ ★
36	Bust	36
29	Waist	29
43	Hips	43

For years I'd been reading success stories about "fatties" who had become sylphs through careful diet. For years I'd been comfortable in size 18. Well, comfortable except for occasional shortness of breath, and a strong reluctance to appear anywhere in a bathing suit. My children referred to me as "jolly mom," and my husband said, "Stay as round as you are; that's the way I like you."

Thus, with no incentive, I began my rigorous three-month schedule.

My diet left me cheerful, and my appetite satisfied.

My diet also left me weighing the same as when I'd started.

Somewhere, somehow —— Well, perhaps you can help me discover why I failed.

Here is a sample of three typical diet meals. You will notice that the total number of calories is slightly in excess of 1030 per day. The diet, of course, varied, but each day's total was pretty much the same. Except for an occasional pizza on Saturday nights, and a waffle or two on Sunday, I was most consistent.

Breakfast	No. of Calories
Orange juice	65
Boiled egg	70
Coffee, black	0
Total	135*

*Add a few extra. While cleaning table, I finished daddy's doughnut, Bobby's (age 5) oatmeal, and John's (age 3) buttered toast. (Hate to see things go to waste.)

Lunch	No. of Calories
Chicken bouillon	20
Chicken salad	270
Fruit gelatin, ½ cup	100
Coffee, black	0
Total	390*

*Add a few extra. Ate other half of Bobby's peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwich, and John's chocolate cupcake.

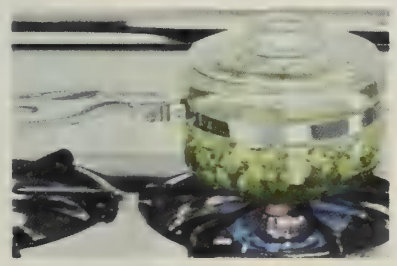
Dinner
Grapefruit	75
Hamburger patty	150
Broccoli	20
Rye wafers (3)	90
Skim milk	85
Total	420*

*Add a few extra. Finished both children's butterscotch pudding (won't make that again). Tasted daddy's spaghetti and meat balls, and helped with the garlic bread (well, you can't keep that for second day).

Before Retiring
1 glass of skim milk	85*

*Just this once, had a piece of cherry pie neighbor brought to have me sample.

Total for Day 1030+ Calories*



*Oh, yes, John was cranky at the supermarket, so we shared a box of chocolate-chip cookies.

As you can see, my diet is similar to many published in the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, and I really stuck to it—sort of—for three full months.

"As a girl Jenny was amusing and original; she was the only person in the wretched, flea-ridden town where she was reared who was capable of speaking the king's English. Also, she knew the whole world wasn't contained in the county where she was born.

"Jenny now declares all twelve years of our marriage were a prolonged misery. It isn't true. I was a good husband to her and I am a far better father to my sons than my father was to me. Yet when I came home from Korea she and the boys made it painfully clear there was no room for me. They greeted me as though I were a stranger. They scorned and ignored me. My sons talked back to me while Jenny hurled insults. Once again I had the same lost, sick feeling I used to have when I was shunted among the many homes of my many stepmothers. Jenny didn't care.

"I've made concessions to her. I've given her dozens of presents since our separation. Women like gifts, don't they? Jenny loves gardening. I hate it. But last Sunday I stopped at a nursery and went to our house and planted two pear trees in the yard. Jenny promptly came storming out and told me there was no use bothering, that I would never live there to enjoy the shade.

"Jenny didn't used to be an unjust woman, nor was she greedy and grasping. I consider it most unfair of her to take away my sons and my house, but I don't see how to stop her from doing it. I've reached the point where I agree our marriage is done for. It's her fault, not mine."

The Marriage Counselor Says:

"Sometimes almost miraculous results are achieved in a few hours. Some cases of unhappy marriage that are reviewed in my office seem at first glance to be hopeless. But after a minimum of discussion and analysis, aided by a process that can seem as mysterious as the laying on of hands, the couple go on their way reconciled and headed in the right direction. Such surprises, pleasant but fairly rare, offset the many disappointments we counselors encounter in our profession.

"No pleasant surprise greeted me in the case of Jenny and Max, nor did I expect such good fortune. At our initial interview I felt certain that to meet the challenge presented by Jenny and Max would involve much hard work. I didn't anticipate that the three of us would be consulting for nearly three years before the couple's affairs were straightened out and their marriage was salvaged and put on even keel.

"Jenny and Max came from different cultures and had very different traditions. Both had obstinately decided their particular conceptions, notions, values were correct. Both were what I call 'angry people.' They were long out of the habit of being at peace with each other and living in harmony with their children. Engaged in a struggle to dominate, they ate, slept and breathed conflict. A prolonged feud between a married couple is wasting and damaging, but feuds can be fascinating and absorbing.

"Jenny and Max believed their flaming, destructive quarrels were ignited by differences over money, sex, tastes in clothes, household decorations, friends, differing opinions on how to spend their time, bring up their children to the best advantage, and so on. In actuality the two were quarreling over who should be the boss. There are no bosses in a successful marriage, there are only partners.

"When I met Jenny and Max it had been months since they had held an adult conversation. The most casual remark immediately provoked one or the other into fierce rehashing of the injuries of the past. In an atmosphere of recriminations and accusation, marital problems cannot be solved. Both Jenny and Max had been deeply affronted by jeers and epithets hurled by the other. In this connection, however, in talking to Max, I did detect one hopeful note. Although Jenny seemed to have run through the whole encyclopedia of insults in denouncing Max, not once had she taunted him on the score of his religion. On this point, a point where Max, a refugee from Hitler's Austria, was acutely sensitive, Jenny felt no superiority to a man over whom she claimed superiority in nearly every aspect. Jenny's strident claims to one hundred per cent perfection of course cloaked her feelings of inferiority, feelings that Max, who himself felt inferior, had managed to exploit for many years.

"One other hopeful note was that both Jenny and Max, although emotional infants, ranked well above the average in intelligence. In the beginning, I had no opportunity to work with Jenny. Stubbornly insisting she didn't need assistance and wanted nothing except a divorce, she refused counseling. However, with a characteristic lack of logic, she then told Max he could no longer visit her house or her sons unless he accepted psychological aid.

"After I spent six months advising and consulting with Max, Jenny was so struck by the changes in his outward behavior, particularly in his relationship with the boys, that she agreed to see me. The welfare of the children was important to her, more important to her than defeating and destroying their father. She was bright enough to know that children need two parents.

"But let's revert briefly to Max. A novel-length book wouldn't cover our extensive consultations. A European upbringing had convinced him that the female of the species is inferior to the male, a handicap to any American husband. In addition, Max was a seriously disturbed person. Back in his disorderly childhood, he had acquired a perverse appetite for dissension and discord. In my opinion, some of the imaginary tortures he devised as a young boy to annihilate his detested father left an imprint on his personality. It took Max a long while to perceive that even in the early days of his marriage, the days when an awed and browbeaten Jenny strove to please, there was no faintest possibility she could satisfy him with the food she served, the dress she wore, the words she spoke. For it was his peculiar joy to torment and demean his wife and he battened upon her humiliations.

"It was easier for Max to acknowledge the truth about his unsatisfactory relationship with his sons. It wasn't the perilous state of the world, as he had believed, that made him a reluctant father. (In these uncertain days the birth rate everywhere is rising.) His personal history was responsible. Himself an unwanted child, Max wanted no children. Having acquired the family, Max endeavored to ensure that his three sons fare no better than he had fared. Once Max recognized that he had modeled himself into an autocratic father and husband—a father less cruel than his own but without tenderness and love—he was able to smash the mold, for he had no desire to resemble his father. He then became able to understand Jenny's fiery reaction to his treatment of their children. With her background, with her painful memories of shivering on a porch, she simply couldn't tolerate that her children should be locked out of their home so he could read a book in quiet. Upon reflection, Max also acknowledged that some of her impatience at his constant studying with no definite objective might be justified.

"In my belief, Jenny's eventual revolt from the pressures to which Max subjected her was inevitable. It was only her timidity and lack of self-confidence that kept her under his thumb so long. In many ways, even in their early years together, she had subtly defied his wishes and played little feminine tricks to lessen the shaky self-esteem screened by his arrogance. Max's absence in Korea presented her with a perfect opportunity to stage an all-out rebellion. When Jenny bought the house I think it likely she had an extra motive beyond providing a good home for the boys. She wanted to show Max how much better she could manage financially than he had done. Certainly he interpreted the purchase in that fashion.

"The first time Max took a box of candy to his sons—it was his own idea, not mine—Jenny returned to my office for counseling. She readily recognized that in her childhood home, like Max in his many homes, she had become habituated to a pattern of quarreling. Then, too, as a small girl dissatisfied with her looks and seeking individuality, she began to take pride in her 'frankness.' Jenny's conception of frankness was explosive indeed. It was based on a maxim that curiously enough she had picked up from an innocent Sunday-school teacher: that it is as bad to think something as to say it. By this reasoning if you think your friend's new baby is homely you may as well go ahead and tell her so. I seldom offer concrete advice. I did advise Jenny that very often people can't restrain themselves from entertaining uncomplimentary thoughts, but they can certainly refrain from making uncomplimentary, cutting remarks without becoming insincere. Indeed, I told Jenny that the sooner she began to hold her tongue the better off she would be.

"A year after our counseling began, Jenny and Max went back to living together again. Their troubles were by no means ended. Slowly they learned the damage of name calling, learned that vituperation may be an escape from problems but is no solution to them. Slowly they learned that marriage is a two-way partnership where both partners truly rank first. They learned that both of them could use every ounce of their leadership ability in an appropriate area. Gradually they learned to explore their differences of opinion with gentleness and tact instead of succumbing to a passion of rage and thus destroying any possibility of reaching a compromise and a solution. There is some anger in all people. Anger doesn't mean the end of a relationship, but Jenny and Max were obliged to learn that for them anger was a warning signal to tread warily and cautiously.

"In the end Jenny and Max achieved an unusually successful marriage. As they grew to understand themselves and each other their personalities and attitudes changed startlingly. They found there was pleasure to be had in mutual appreciation and consideration. Max stopped mocking Jenny's native state and her fondness for paper-backed novels. For the first time he allowed a television set to be installed in the home. Watching some of the programs with the boys brought him closer to them and their interests.

"For her part, Jenny allowed her hair to grow and saw to it that the number of skirts in her wardrobe balanced her numerous pairs of slacks. Conceding the value of Max's masculine pride, she also resigned from her job as soon as it was financially feasible. Her resignation occurred at the time Max stopped being a scholastic dilettante, permanantly quit college with an engineering degree and went to work as a well-paid engineer.

"By means of calm discussion Jenny and Max eventually worked out their individual spheres of influence to the satisfaction of them both. Their reward was personal content, the happiness of their sons and the realization that without all their hard work it was highly probable they would have drifted into marriage with other partners burdened with the same unsolved problems."

Tempting low-cost meals for a family of six. Weekly budget, including 30 quarts of milk, $25.00.

By MARY JANE ENGEL

"Free hot school lunches are a wonderful help to my budget," says Fern Morlang. "Without them I would not be able to manage as well as I do."

Fern allows herself $25.00 a week for food—sometimes a dollar or two more. This allowance does not include the lunches for her four school children, as they are supplied without cost at school. The allowance covers lunches for herself and Peggy, the preschooler, breakfast and dinners for six during the weekdays, and the full three-meal schedule for the weekends.

Fern prepares her weekly menus on Friday, checking the local newspapers for best buys. Saturday is shopping day. Buying fresh vegetables and fruit when they are plentiful is a money saver, as well as using canned or dry milk in cooking, and margarine. Beef liver is a favorite with her children, and since it has excellent food value and is reasonable in price, she serves it weekly. Eggs, too, are very reasonable and used often.

Mealtime is family time with the Morlangs. Eager hands peel and scrape, and equally eager tongues chatter on about the events of the day. We have prepared a week's menus, typical of the Morlang family, that please the children and keep them well fed.

THE EXECUTIONERS

They had held him over for the court-martial. The girl was fourteen, big for her age. Her father had been sick in the night and she had been on her way to her aunt's house to get help when the drunken soldier, Max Cady, had caught her and pulled her into the alley.

"Didn't they hang him?"

"No. But it was close. He was a twenty-five-year-old staff sergeant with seven years of service, and over two hundred days of combat in the islands. He'd been pulled out with a bad case of jungle rot and jungle nerves and sent to a rest camp near Melbourne. It was his first trip into the city. He was drunk. She looked older, and she was out on the street at two in the morning."

"But even so."

"They gave him life at hard labor."

He remembered how the sergeant had looked in court. Like an animal. Sullen, vicious and dangerous. And physically powerful. Sam looked at him and knew how lucky the punch had been. Cady had looked across the court at Sam as though he would dearly enjoy killing him with his hands. Dark hair grew low on his forehead. Heavy mouth and jaw. Small brown eyes set in deep and simian sockets. Sam could tell what Cady was thinking. A nice clean non-combat lieutenant. A meddler in a pretty uniform who'd never heard a shot fired in anger. So the pretty lieutenant should have backed right out of the alley and gone on his way and left a real soldier alone.

"Sam, darling, are you trying to say that——" She had a frightened look on her face.

"Now don't get jumpy. Don't get nervous, baby."

Liberty is always dangerous, but it is the safest thing we have.

HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK

"Did you see that man on Thursday? Did they let him out?"

He sighed. "I never get a chance to finish anything. Yes. They let him out."

He had not expected Cady to come bobbing up out of ancient history. He had nearly forgotten the whole affair. Too many other impressions during those overseas years had blurred the memories of Cady. He had come home in 1945 with the rank of captain. He had got along well with his colonel, a man named Bill Stetch, and after the war he had come to New Essex at Bill's invitation and had joined the law firm.

"Tell me about it. What is he like? How in the world did he find you?"

"I don't think it's trouble. It can be handled. Anyway, when I headed for the lot on Thursday, a man fell in step with me. He kept grinning at me in a funny way. I thought he was crazy ——"

"Can we go in now? Can we? Is it time?" Bucky yelled shrilly, racing toward them.

Sam looked at his watch. "You've been goofing off, my small untidy friend. You could have been in five minutes ago."

"Hey, Jamie! It's time."

"Bucky, wait a minute," Carol said. "You don't go out beyond that rock. You or Jamie. Understand?"

"Nancy goes way out."

"And when you pass the lifesaving tests she's passed, you can go way out, too," Sam said.

They watched the boys go into the water. Nancy and her friend stood up. She waved at her parents. She tucked her dark hair into her cap as she walked to the stern of the Sweet Sioux. Sam looked at her and felt sad and ancient as he saw how quickly her slim figure was maturing. And, as always, he thanked private gods that Nancy took after her mother. The boys took after him. Sandy-red hair, knobby bone structure, pale blue eyes, freckles, oversized teeth. It was evident that at maturity both boys would be like their father, incurably lean, shambling, stringy, tall men of physical indolence and ropy toughness. It would have been tragic if he had willed his only daughter such a fate.

"It was that same sergeant, wasn't it?" Carol said in a small voice.

"The same. I'd forgotten his name. Max Cady. His sentence was reviewed. He was released last September. He served thirteen years at hard labor. I wouldn't have recognized him. He's about five nine, wide and thick-set. He's more than half bald and deeply tanned, and he looks as though you couldn't hurt him with an ax. The eyes are the same and the jaw and mouth are the same, but that's all."

"Did he threaten you?"

"Not in any explicit way. He had control of the situation. And he was enjoying himself. He kept telling me I never had the word, I never saw the picture. And he kept grinning at me. I can't remember ever seeing a more disconcerting grin. Or whiter, more artificial-looking teeth. He knew he was making me uncomfortable. He followed me into the lot and I got in the wagon and started it up. Then he moved like a cat and snatched the key out and leaned on the sill looking in at me. I didn't know what to do. I couldn't try to take the key away from him. That's nonsense."

"Could you have got out and gone after a policeman?"

"I guess so. But that didn't seem very . . . dignified. Like running to teacher. So I listened. He was proud of the way he found me. When his defense officer was questioning me, it came out that I got my law degree from Penn. So Cady went to Philadelphia and got somebody to check the alumni records for him and got my home address and business address that way. He wanted to give me the word on what thirteen years of hard labor was like. He called me 'lieutenant.' He used it in every sentence. He made it sound like a dirty word. He said that because it was June it made it sort of an anniversary for us. And he said he'd been thinking about me for fourteen years. And he said he was glad I was doing so well. He said he wouldn't have wanted to find out I had a lot of problems."

"What . . . does he want to do?"

"All he said was he wanted to make sure I had the word, the big picture. Finally when I demanded my car key, he handed it to me. And he tried to give me a cigar. He had a shirt pocket full of them. He said they were good cigars. Two bits each. As I backed out he said, still grinning, 'Give my best to the wife and kids, lieutenant.'"

"It's creepy."

Sam wondered whether he should tell her the rest of it. And then he knew he had to. She should know the rest of it so that she would not be careless—if it came to that.

He patted her hand. "Now brace yourself, Carolbug. This may be only in my mind. I hope so. But this is what has been chewing on me. You remember that I was late on Thursday. Cady used up a half hour. I had a lot of chance to observe him. And the more I listened, the more a little warning bell rang, louder and louder. You don't have to be a trained psychoanalyst. Somehow, when a person is different, you know it. I suppose we all run in a pack, in a sense. And there are always little clues to the rogue beast. I don't think Cady is sane."

"Good heavens!"

"I think you should know that about him. I may be wrong. I don't know what words the doctors would have for it. Paranoid. I wouldn't know. But he can't blame himself. I tried to tell him it was his own fault. He said if they're big enough they're old enough, and she was just another tramp. I didn't have the word. I couldn't see the picture. He's come around to believing that incident in the alley was perfectly normal. So I took thirteen years out of his life, and I should pay for it."

"But he didn't say that?"

"No. He didn't say that. He was having a dandy time. He knew I was squirming. . . . What's the matter?"

Her eyes were very wide, and unfocused. She looked beyond him. "How long has he been in New Essex?"

"I don't know. I got the impression he'd been around a few weeks."

"Did he have a car?"

"I don't know."

"How was he dressed?"

"Khaki pants. not very clean. A white sports shirt with short sleeves. No hat."

"Something happened over a week ago. Maybe it doesn't mean anything. A week ago Wednesday, I think it was. In the morning. The kids were in school. I heard Marilyn barking her fool head off and I figured she had some horribly dangerous game treed—a chipmunk or something. So I didn't pay any attention until she gave a shrill yelp. So I went out into the yard. She was circling back through the field, tail tucked under, staring back toward the road. There was a gray car, sort of beat up, parked on the shoulder, and there was a man sitting on our stone wall, facing the house. He was well over a hundred yards away. I got the impression he was a heavy man, and he was bald, and he was smoking a cigar. I stared at him, but he didn't make a move. I didn't quite know what to do. I guessed Marilyn had been barking at him, but I couldn't be sure he'd thrown a stone or anything at her. If he'd just pretended to throw a stone, our courageous dog, friend of man, would have reacted the same way. And I didn't know if sitting on the wall is trespassing. The wall marks our line. So Marilyn and I went back into the house and she went under the living-room couch. The man made me sort of uneasy. You know, kind of alone out there. I told myself he was a salesman or something and he liked the view so he stopped to sit and look at it awhile. When I looked the second time, he was still there. But the next time I looked he was gone. I don't like to think it could have been . . . him."

"Neither do I. But I guess we better assume it was. We ought to get a better dog."

"They don't make better dogs. Marilyn isn't exactly brave, but she's sweet. Look at her."

Marilyn, awakened from her sleep by the whooping and splashing of the kids, had gone into the water. She was a spayed red setter with a beautiful coat and good lines. She churned around after the swimming children, yipping with her spasms of joy and excitement.

"Now that I've depressed you," he said with a heartiness he did not feel, "I can get over onto the bright side. Even though Dorrity, Stetch and Bowden do corporation and estate work and handle tax matters, I do have friends in the police force. And yesterday I had lunch with Charlie Hopper, our bright young city attorney. I told him the story."

"And I'll bet you made it sound like some kind of a joke."

"My hands weren't trembling and I didn't look haunted, but I think I made him see that I was concerned. Charlie didn't seem to think it would be a special problem. He took down the name and description. I believe the dainty phrase he used was to have the boys 'put the roust on him.' That seems to mean that the officers of the law find so many ways on the books to lean heavily on an undesirable citizen that he departs for more comfortable areas."

"But how could we be sure he leaves, and how would we know he wouldn't sneak back?"

"I wish you hadn't asked that question, honey. That's what I've been thinking about."

"Why don't they put him in jail?"

"What for? For what he might do? Honey, listen to me. I always use the light touch, I guess, when I talk about the law business. But I believe in the law. It's a creaking, shambling, infuriating structure. There are inequities in it. Sometimes I wonder how our system of law manages to survive. But at its base, it's an ethical structure. It is based on the inviolability of the freedom of every citizen. And it works more often than it doesn't. A lot of very little people have been trying to whittle it into a new shape during these mid years of our century, but the stubborn old monster refuses to be altered. Behind all the crowded calendars and the overworked judges and the unworkable legislation is a solid framework of equity under the law. And I like it. I live it. I like it the way a man might like an old house. It's drafty and it creaks, but the timbers are as honest as the day they were put up. So maybe it is the essence of my philosophy that this Cady thing has to be handled within the law. If the law can't protect us, then I'm dedicated to a myth, and I better wake up."

"I guess females are more opportunistic. I would be capable of taking that deer rifle of yours and shooting him right off our stone wall if he ever comes back."

"You think you could. . . . Shouldn't these two old parties try the water with the youngsuns?"

They walked toward the water. Carol looked up at him and said, "Don't get out of touch again, Sam. Please. Let me know what goes on."

"I'll let you know. And don't worry. I'm just superstitiously afraid because we have it so good."

"We have it very good."

As they stepped into the water, Nancy was clambering up over the stern of the Sweet Sioux. Water droplets sparkled on her bare shoulders. Her hips, so recently lanky, had begun to swell into woman lines. She balanced herself and dived off cleanly.

Carol touched Sam's arm. "That girl. How old was she?"

"Fourteen." He looked into Carol's eyes. He took her wrist and held it tightly. "Look now. Stop any of that kind of thinking. Stop it now."

"But you've thought it too."

"Just at this moment, when you drew your little conclusion," he said. "So we'll both discard that sickening little thought, right now."

"Yes, sir." She smiled. But the smile was not attached in the proper and usual way. They held the look a moment longer, and then waded in. He swam out with furious energy but he could not swim away from the sticky little tentacle of fear that had just fastened itself around his heart.

Sam Bowden was in his office the following Tuesday morning when Charlie Hopper phoned and said he was in the neighborhood and would it be convenient if he dropped in for a couple of minutes.

Charlie was a man in his early thirties, with a good-humored and ugly face, considerable energy and ambition, and a calculatedly indolent manner. He sat down and reached for his cigarettes and said, "Well, I started the wheels rolling on your old buddy. He's living in a rooming house at Two-eleven Jaekel Street, near the corner of Market. He checked in on May fifteenth. He's paid ahead until the end of June. This being only the eleventh, he had it in his mind to stay awhile. Our boys in blue check the registrations down there frequently. He drives a gray Chevvy sedan about eight years old. West Virginia plates. They plucked him out of a Market Street bar yesterday afternoon. Captain Mark Dutton says he made no fuss. Very mild and patient about the whole thing."

"Did they let him go?"

"They either have, or they're about to. They checked Kansas and found out he was released last September. They made him explain where he got money and where he got the car. Then they checked back on that. He comes from a little hill town near Charleston, West Virginia. When he was released he went back there. His brother had been working in Charleston and holding onto the home place. When Max came back, they sold it and split. He's got about three thousand bucks left and he carries it in a money belt. Charleston cleared him and Washington cleared him. His car registration and license are in order. They searched the car and his room. No gun. Nothing out of line. So they had to let him go."

"Did he give any reason for coming here?"

"Dutton handled it the way we decided he should. Your name wasn't brought into it. Cady said he liked the looks of the town. Dutton told me he was very cool, plausible."

"Did you make Dutton understand the situation?"

"I don't know. I think so. Dutton doesn't want that type drifting in any more than you do. So they'll keep an eye on him. If he spits on the sidewalk it will cost him fifty dollars. If he drives one mile an hour over the limit, it will cost him. They'll pick him up on a D and D when they see him coming out of a bar. He'll catch on. He'll move along. They always do."

"Charlie, I appreciate what you've done. I really do. But I have the feeling he isn't going to scare. I think he's psycho."

"If so, Dutton didn't catch it. What do you think he wants to do?"

"I don't know. I have the feeling he wants to do something to hurt me the worst way he can. When you've got a wife and three kids and you live in the country, it can make you a little shaky." He told Charlie the incident of the parked car and the man on the stone wall. The fact that Carol remembered its being a gray car made it seem more likely that it had been Cady.

"Maybe he just wants to give you a bad case of the jumps."

Sam forced a smile. "He's doing fine, then."

"Maybe you can try something else, Sam. Do you know the Apex people?"

"Yes, of course. We've used them."

"It's a national organization and in some places they're weak, but they've got some good people here. I'm thinking of one boy in particular. Sievers, his name is. He's well trained. CIC background, I think. And police work too. He's rough as a cob and cold as a snake. It'll cost you, but it might be a good place to spend money. Do you know the manager over there?"

"Anderson. Yes."

"Call him up and see if he can give you Sievers."

"I think I'll do that."

"Have you got Cady's address?"

"I wrote it down. Two-eleven Jaekel Street, near the corner of Market."

"Right."

Sievers came to the office at four-thirty. He sat quietly and listened to Sam's account. He was a square-headed, gray-faced man who could have been anywhere between thirty-five and fifty. He made no needless movements. He listened and made Sam feel as though he were being an alarmist.

"How long do you want Cady covered?"

"I don't know. I want . . . an outside opinion as to whether he's planning to harm me or my family."

"We don't read minds," Sievers told him.

Sam felt his face get hot. "I realize that. And I'm not a hysterical woman, Sievers. It had occurred to me that by watching him you might get some clue as to what he has in mind. I want to know if he comes out to my home."

"And if he does?"

"Give him as much leeway as you think safe. It would help if we could get enough evidence of his intention to convict him."

"How do you want the reports?"

"Verbal reports will be adequate, Sievers. Can you start right away?"

Sievers shrugged. It was his first gesture of any kind. "I've started already."

The rain stopped just before Sam left the office. The evening sun came out as he edged his way through traffic and turned onto Route 18. The route followed the lake shore for five miles. Then it turned southwest toward the village of Harper, eight miles away.

He drove to his home just beyond the village limits. They had looked for a long time before they found the farmhouse in 1950, and hesitated a long time over the price. And had several estimates made on what it would cost to modernize it. But both he and Carol knew they were trapped. They had fallen in love with the old house. It sat on ten acres of farmland, all that was left of the original acreage. There were elms and oaks and a line of poplars. All the front windows overlooked a far vista of gentle hills.

The architect and the contractor had done superb jobs. The basic house was of brick painted white, and was set well back from the road. The long drive was on the right-hand side of the house as you faced it, and went back to what had once been and was still called the barn, even though it was primarily to house the Ford wagon and Carol's doughty and honorable and purposeful MG. The barn was of brick, too, painted white. The upstairs, which had been a hayloft, was children's area.

When Lassus, one of the wise men of Greece, was asked what was necessary to render life pleasant and comfortable, he gave this laconic answer: "Experience." BUCK

Marilyn, never without a whimper of alarm, could climb the wall ladder, but had to be carried down, tail furled, eyes rolling.

As Sam turned into his driveway he found himself wishing for the first time that they had close neighbors. They could see the peak of the roof of the Turner house. There were many houses along the road, but widely spaced, no houses very close.

He drove into the barn. Marilyn came scampering in, pleading for the expected attention. Sam, as he patted her, made a bicycle count and saw that of the three of them, only Bucky was home. It made him uneasy to think of Nancy and Jamie out on the roads. It was always a worry because of the traffic. But this was an extra worry. Yet he did not see how he could restrict them to the area.

Carol came halfway across the back yard to the barn, met him and kissed him and said, "Did you hear from Charlie?"

"Yes. It's a long story." He stared at her. "You're looking ominously dressed up, woman. I hope there isn't a party I've forgotten about."

"Oh, this? This was for morale. I was worried, so I got all fancied up."

He showered and changed. When he was out of the shower, Carol came and sat on the edge of her bed and listened to his account of the talk with Charlie and the employment of Sievers.

"Does he look . . . efficient?"

"I wouldn't know. He isn't the warmest guy anybody ever met. Charlie seems to think he's tops."

"Charlie would know, wouldn't he?"

"Charlie would know. Stop looking so strained, baby. The wheels are in motion."

"Isn't it going to be terribly expensive?"

"Not too bad," he lied. "Where are the kids?"

"Bucky is in his room. He and Andy are designing an airplane, they say. Jamie is at the Turners', and he is invited to stay for dinner. Nancy ought to be back from the village any minute."

"Is she with anybody?"

"She and Sandra went in on their bikes."

He looked at Carol. She smiled. "I guess we can't help it, darling. The early settlers had it all the time. Indians and animals. That's what it's like. Like an animal hiding back there in the woods near the creek."

He kissed her forehead. "It'll be over soon."

"It better be. I was hungry this noon, but all of a sudden I couldn't swallow. And I wanted to go down to the school and look at each one of them. But I didn't. I dug weeds in an absolute frenzy until the bus let them off in front of the house."

He could see the drive from the bedroom window and he saw Nancy cycling toward the barn, turning to wave and yell something back at someone out of sight. Sandra probably. She wore blue-jean shorts and a red blouse.

"There's ole Nance," he said, "right on the dot."

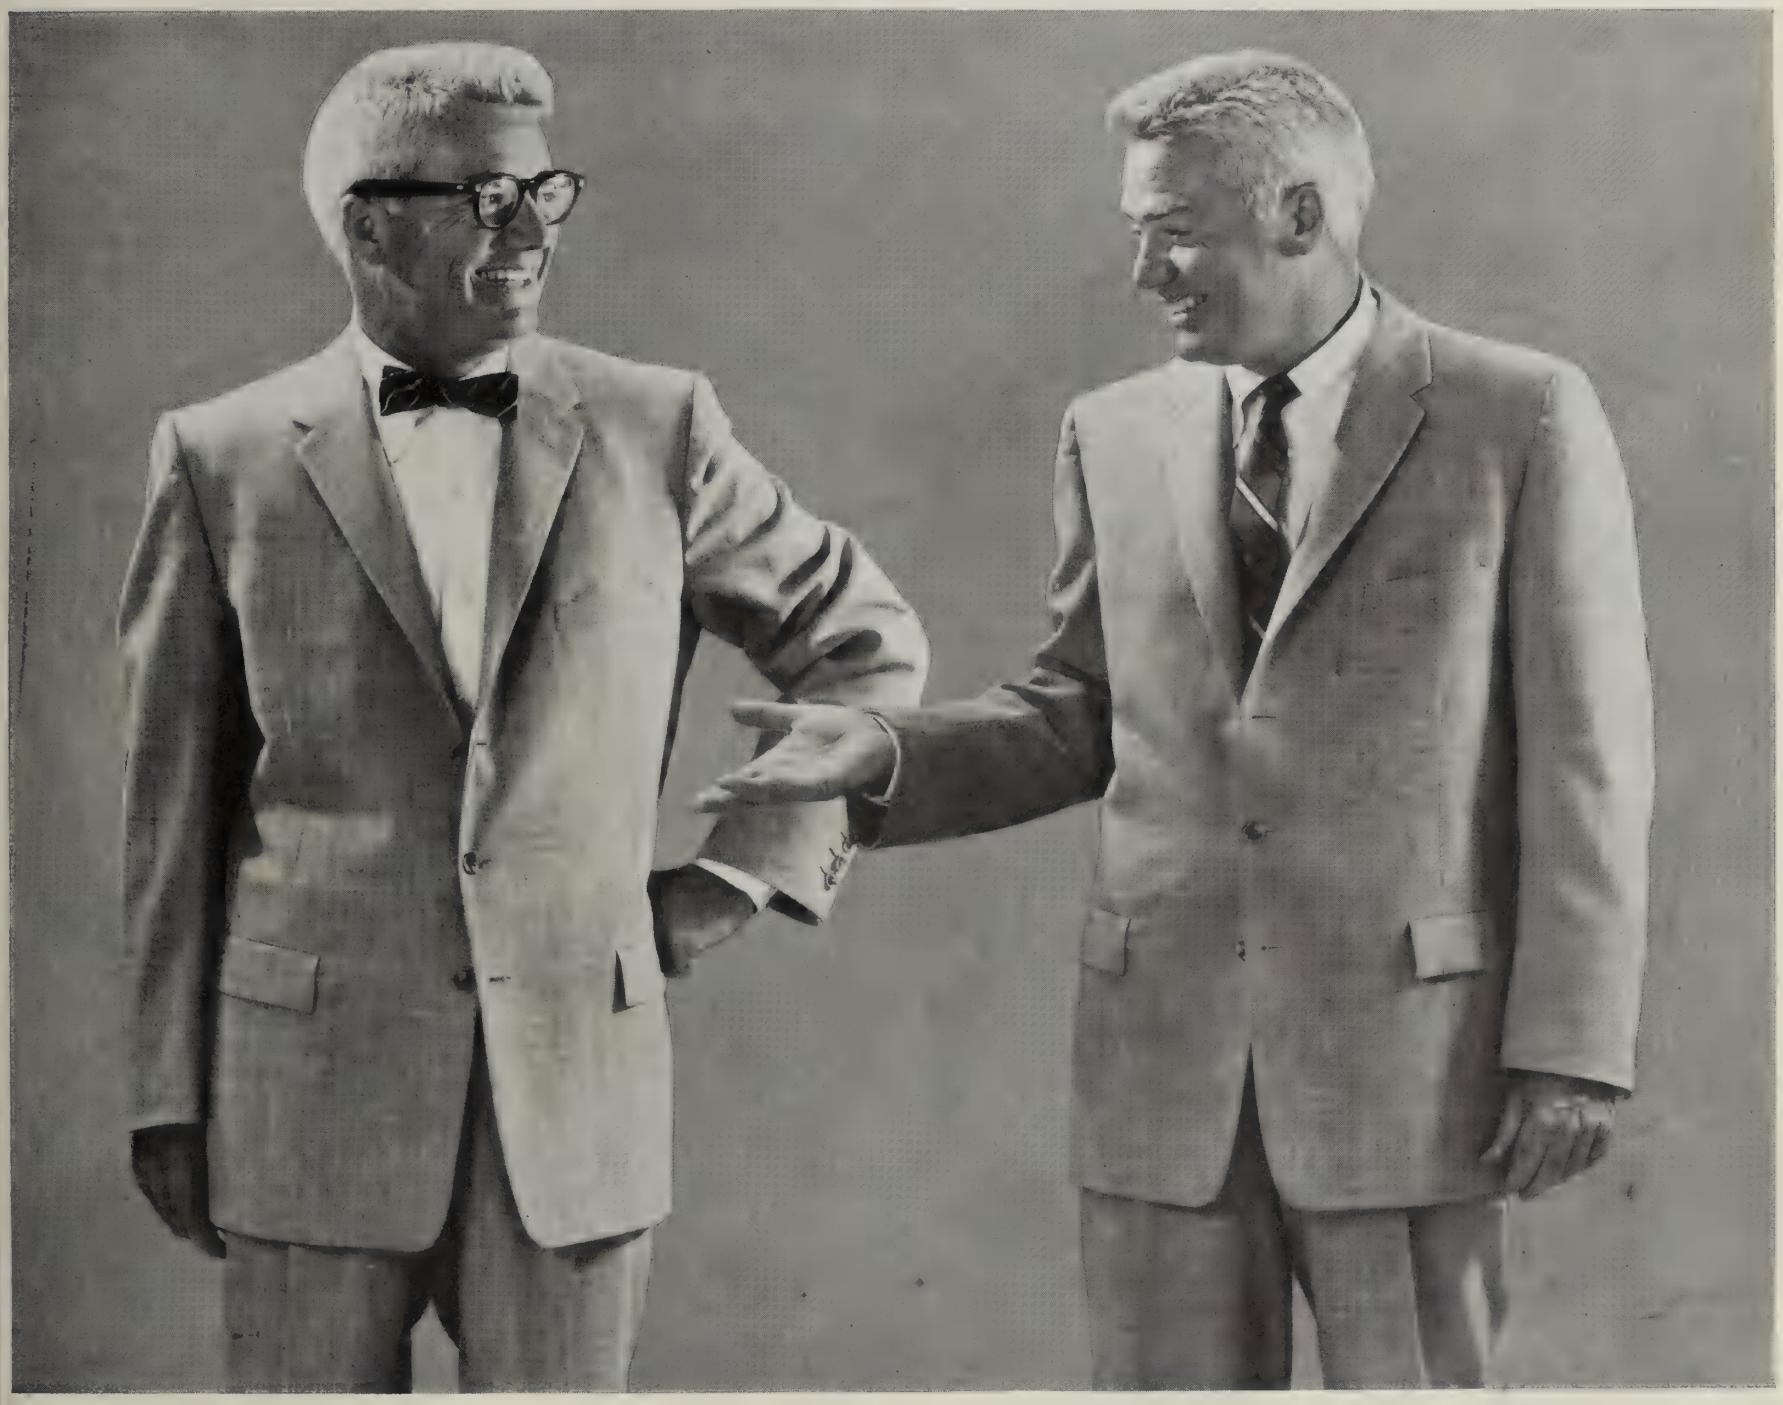
"She is, to use her own words, in a wild rage at Pike. There seems to be new talent at the school. Something with almost platinum hair. So now Pike is a thod."

"Thod?"

"It was new to me too. It seems to be a combination clod and thud. The translation was given with vast impatience. 'Oh, *mo*therrr!'"

They went downstairs. Nancy was sitting on a counter in the kitchen, talking on the phone. She gave them a look of helpless boredom, covered the mouthpiece and hissed, "I simply must study tonight."

"Then hang up," Sam said.



There was a sound like that of a rather underfed horse tumbling down the rear stairs. Bucky and his best friend, Andy, churned across the kitchen and out the screen door and down the steps, heading for the barn. The cylinder on the screen door sighed.

"Hello, dad," Sam said. "Hello, son. Hello, Andy. Hi, Mr. Bowden. What are you boys up to? Why, we're on our way to the barn, dad. Fine. Run along, boys."

Nancy, listening raptly to the voice on the other end of the line, had kicked her right sandal off. With her bare toes she was absently trying to work the latch on the cupboard under the counter. Carol had opened the wall oven and she was looking in at whatever was in there.

Sam spread out the evening paper, but before he started to read he took a look around the kitchen. It was a big room. A center island, with sink and burners, divided the work area from the eating area. The cupboards and cabinets were of dark pine. A big window looked out at the wooded hill behind the barn. Graduated copper pots hung against a pine wall. There was a small fieldstone fireplace near the trestle table. It was the most used room in the house.

When Nancy hung up and retrieved her slipper, Sam said, "Hear you have some competition, Nance."

"What? Oh, that! Mother told you. She's an utterly rancid little thing. All frilly and with the cuteth little lithp and dreat big boo eyes. We all suspect she's trying out for Alice in Wonderland. The boys were positively clotted around her. A monstrous sight. Nauseous. And poor old Pike. He has absolutely no conversation, so all he could do was circle around her, bunching all his muscles. I'm in no sweat."

"Now there is an enchantingly feminine expression."

"Everybody says that," she said pityingly. "I've simply got to study. Really."

"What comes up tomorrow, dear?" Carol asked.

"History exam."

"Will you want any help?" Sam asked.

"Maybe on dates, later. I despise learning all those flabby old dates."

He looked at the doorway through which she had gone. Such a precious and precarious age. Half child and half woman. And when she was all woman, she was going to be extraordinarily lovely. And that would create its own special set of problems.

Just as he was finishing the paper he heard Carol dialing. "Hello, Liz? Carol. Is our middle child being reasonably civilized? . . . They are? Good. Your Mike is a perfect angel when he's here. I guess they all tend to react that way. . . . Could I please? Thanks, Liz. . . . Jamie? Dear, I don't want you and Mike to goof off on the studying. You hear? . . . All right, dear. No elbows on the table, no audible chomping, and home by nine-thirty. Good-by, honey."

She hung up and turned and gave Sam a guilty glance. "I know it's stupid. But I started worrying. And it's so easy to phone."

"I'm glad you did."

"If I keep this up we're all going to turn neurotic."

"I think it's a good idea to keep a closer check on them."

"Would you please call Bucky and send Andy home, dear?"

At nine o'clock, after seeing that Bucky was bedded down, Sam went down the hallway to his daughter's room. There was a fresh stack of records on her changer and the music was turned low. Nancy was at her desk; book and notebook open. She wore her pink terry-cloth robe. Her hair was rumpled. She gave him a look which implied that she was utterly exhausted.

"Ready for dates?"

"I guess so. I'll probably miss half of them. Here's the list, daddy."

He went over to the bed and moved the indispensable kangaroo and sat down. She had got Sally for her first birthday, and it had shared her bed wherever she was ever since.

"Do we do this to the background music of the gentleman with all the adenoids?"

Nancy leaned far over and turned off the player switch. "I'm ready. Wheel and deal."

He went through the list and after twenty minutes she had them all, no matter how he mixed up the order. She was a bright child, and highly competitive. In her own special way her mind was keenly logical, orderly, not creative. Bucky seemed to be like Nancy. Jamie was the dreamer, the slow student, the imaginative one.

He stood up and gave her the list, hesitated, and sat down again. "Parental department," he said.

"I think I have a very clean conscience. At the moment, that is."

"This is instruction, honey. Strange-men department."

"Gosh, we've been over that a zillion times. Mom too. Don't accept rides. Don't go off in the woods alone. Don't hitchhike ever. And if anybody acts funny, run like the wind."

"This is a little bit different, Nance. This is one specific man. I'd half decided not to tell you, but I think that would be a little stupid. This is a man who hates me."

"Hates you, daddy!"

He felt slightly annoyed. "It is possible for somebody to hate your mild, lovable, shabby old father."

"I didn't mean it like that. Why does he?"

"I was a witness against him a long time ago. During the war. Without my help, he wouldn't have been convicted. He's been in a military prison ever since. Now they've let him out. And he's in this area. Your mother and I believe he came out here one day a couple of weeks ago. He may do nothing at all. But we have to assume he might."

"Why did they put him in jail?"

He looked at her for a moment, gauging her fund of knowledge. "Rape. She was a girl your age."

"Golly!"

"He's not as tall as I am. He's about the size of John Turner, and just as big around as John, but not as soft. He's bald and quite tan, with very white cheap-looking false teeth. He dresses poorly and smokes cigars. Can you remember that?"

"Sure."

"Don't let any man answering that description get anywhere near you for any reason."

"I won't," Nancy said. "Golly, this is pretty exciting, isn't it?"

"That's one word for it."

"Can I tell the kids?"

He hesitated. "I don't see why not. I'm going to tell your brothers. The man's name is Cady. Max Cady."

"I can't wait to tell all the kids. Wow!"

He grinned at her and tousled her hair. "Big deal, hey? Drama enters the life of Nancy Ann Bowden, subdeb. Danger stalks. Tune in tomorrow for another chapter in the life of this American girl, who smiles bravely while ——"

"Stop it, now!"

"Want your door closed?"

"Hey, I nearly forgot. I saw Jake in the village. He says he's got room to pull the boat out now, and you know how he is, so I told him to go right ahead and we can work on her this weekend. Is that all right?"

"That's fine, chicken."

When he went downstairs Jamie was back home. Carol was in the process of shooing him off to bed. Sam told him to wait a moment.

"I just told Nance about Cady," he said.

Carol frowned and said, "But do you think —— Yes, I see. I think that's wise, Sam."

"What's happening?" Jamie demanded.

"Listen very carefully, son. I'm going to tell you something and I want you to remember it."

He explained the situation to Jamie. Jamie listened intently. Sam concluded by saying, "We'll tell this to Bucky, too, but I'm not sure how much difference it will make to him. He lives in his own Martian world. So I want you to stick closer than usual to your little brother. I realize that may cramp some of your fun, but this is for real, Jamie. This isn't a television show. You'll do that?"

"Sure. Why don't they arrest him?"

"He hasn't done anything."

"I'll bet they could arrest him. The cops have guns, see, that they've taken off dead murderers. Then they go up to the man and they shove a murder gun in his pocket and then they arrest him for carrying a gun without a license and put him jail, see. And then they put the gun in the laboratory and they look at it through a thing and they find out it was a murder gun and so then they electrocute him, real early in the morning sometime."

"Brother!" Carol said.

"James, my boy, the reason this is a very fine country is because that kind of thing can't happen. We don't jail innocent men. We don't jail people because we think they might do something. If that could happen you, Jamie Bowden, might find yourself in jail sometime because somebody lied about you."

Jamie thought it over scowlingly and then nodded. "That Scooter Prescott would have me locked up in a minute."

"Why?"

"Because I can do twenty-eight push ups now, see, and when I can do fifty I'm going up to him and I'm going to punch his fat nose."

"Does he know that?"

"Sure. I told him."

"You better go to bed now, dear," Carol said.

At the foot of the front stairs Jamie turned and said, "But there's one trouble. Scooter is doing push ups, too, darn it."

After he was gone Carol said, "How did Nancy take it?"

"Intelligently."

"I think it's wise to tell them."

"I know. But it makes me feel a little ineffectual. I'm the king of this little tribe. I should be able to go put the fear of God in Cady. But I don't see how I could. Not with this office-type physique. He looks like he's got muscles they haven't named yet."

"Is that Marilyn?"

He went out into the kitchen and let her in. She waggled and beamed at him and flounced over to her dish, stared with shock and disbelief at its emptiness, then turned and looked up at him.

"No dice, girl. You're on a diet, remember? Got to get your girlish figure back."

She rolled an eye at him and the long red brush of tail flapped twice. She yawned, with a little yowl at the end of the yawn.

He wandered back into the living room, yawned. Carol looked at him and yawned.

"I caught it from Marilyn and you caught it from me."

"So I'm taking it to bed."

"Make sure Nance has hit the sack," he said. "I'll be right along."

He turned off the lights, started to lock the front door and then opened it again and went out into the front yard. The air had the smell of June. The stars looked newly polished. He heard the dwindling snarl of a truck on Route 18 and, after it died, the remote song of a dog on a far-off farm across the valley.

The night was dark and the world was a very large place. And a man was almost excessively small, puny and vulnerable. His brood was abed.

Cady lived somewhere in this night, breathing the darkness.

He walked back across the damp grass to the house, locked up, and went up to bed.

Sievers reported to Sam in his office at ten on Thursday morning. He did not change expression as he spoke in his flat, bored voice.

"I picked him up at six o'clock coming out of the rooming house. He walked to Nicholson's bar three blocks down Market Street. He came out alone at seven-thirty and walked back and got his car. A woman came out and got in the car with him. A fat blonde with a loud laugh. I followed them. He started turning too many corners. I couldn't tell if he'd made me or he was being cute or maybe they were just looking for a place to eat. I had to hang way back. Finally they headed out of town on Route 18 east. He turned onto a secondary road. No traffic. He bluffed me by slowing down after he was around a bend. So I had to pass. When I was out of sight I turned off and cut the lights, but he didn't come along. So that means he was cute. I came back fast, but he had too many choices of turns. So I went back to Nicholson's. He goes there a lot, I found out. They know him only as Max. The woman is one of those Market Street characters. Bessie McGowan. He brought her back at three in the morning to the rooming house. I knocked off. Last night they went back to Nicholson's. He came out alone at nine and started walking down toward the lake front. He can see in all directions at once. And he can move. I lost him. I thought I'd lost him. Then he lit his cigar, right next to me. I nearly jumped out of my shoes. He gave me a good look and grinned and said, 'Nice night for it,' and walked back to Nicholson's. He took her to dinner at a steak house five miles out of town by the lake. They got back to the rooming house at three again. I guess they're still there. I goofed and I've got no apologies. What do you want next?"

"Should the agency use a different man?"

"I'm the best, Mr. Bowden. I'm not trying to kid you. Drop it. You're wasting your money. He expected to be covered. So he was looking for it. He'll keep on looking for it. And any time he wants to shake loose, he'll figure out a way. This one is cool and smart."

"You aren't much help. You don't seem to understand that this man wants to harm me. That's why he came here. He may try to get at me through my family. What would you do?"

The slate eyes seemed to change color, turn lighter. "Change his mind."

"How?"

"Don't quote me. I'd make some contacts. Bounce him into the hospital a couple of times, he gets the point. Work him over."

"But maybe he isn't planning anything."

"This way you're sure."

"I'm sorry, Sievers. Maybe it's a weakness with me, but I don't think so. I can't operate outside the law. The law is my business. I believe in due process."

Sievers stood up. "A type like that is an animal. So you fight like an animal. Anyway, I would. If you change your mind, we can have a private talk. This wouldn't be through the agency. You'll waste money keeping me on his tail." He paused at the door and looked back, hand on the knob. "You have to figure one angle on this. You've alerted the law. If he does anything, he is going to be picked up."

After Sievers was gone Sam tried to lose himself in his work, but his attention kept wandering back to Cady. As he drove home Thursday night, he decided there would be no point in telling Carol that Sievers was no longer on the job. It would be difficult to explain and would alarm her unnecessarily.

Carol called him at three o'clock on Friday afternoon. When he heard her tone of voice his hand clamped tightly on the phone. She was nearly incoherent.

"Carol, are the kids all right?"

"Yes, yes. They're all right. It's that—that fool dog." Her voice broke. "Could you come home? Please."

On his way out he stopped in Bill Stetch's office and told him there was trouble at home. The dog had probably been run over, and he was leaving for the day.

He made good time on the way home. It was a gray day. Carol came walking quickly out to the barn, the kids trailing after her. Carol looked haggard and gray. Nancy was a pasty white, her eyes swollen and red. Jamie held a trembling mouth clamped tightly shut. Bucky stumbled along, fists in his eyes, bellowing in such a hoarse way that Sam knew he had been crying for a long time.

Carol turned around, her voice sharp, and said, "Nancy, you take the boys back in the house, please."

"But I want to ——"

"Please!"

They went back toward the house. Bucky was still roaring. Carol turned back to him and her eyes filled with tears. "God deliver me from another forty minutes like I had today."

"What happened? Run over? Is she dead?"

"She's dead. But she wasn't run over. Doctor Lowney came right out. He was perfectly wonderful. We couldn't get her in the MG to take her in. The timing was absolutely superb. I heard the school bus stop and then pull away, and then I heard Nancy screaming. I came running out like I was shot out of a gun. I found out later that when the bus was coming to a stop Jamie looked out the window and saw Marilyn in the front yard, gobbling something down. She came prancing over to meet the kids as she always does, and then she started to whine and run in circles and bite herself in the side. Then she went into a kind of convulsion. That's what started Nancy screaming." The tears ran down Carol's face. "When I got there the dog was in agony. I've never seen anything so pitiful or frightening. And all three kids watching. I tried to get near her, but she snapped at me so viciously I didn't dare touch her. I told the kids not to touch her and I ran in and phoned Doctor Lowney and you. She was rolling and writhing and making the most awful screaming noise I ever heard a dog make. I didn't want the kids to watch, but I couldn't get them away. Then she began to run down, like a clock or a machine or something. Doctor Lowney arrived just before the end. She died about a minute later. So he took her in with him. That was about twenty minutes ago."

"He said she was poisoned?"

"He said it looked like it."

His eyes were stinging. "Can you handle the kids for a little while?"

"Where are you going? Oh, down to the vet's?"

"Yes."

"Please don't be long."

Doctor Lowney was a big placid man with white hair and an easygoing manner. When Sam went in, Lowney stood at a workbench. Marilyn was on a table in the middle of the small room. The life had gone out of her coat. She lay like a dull red rag, one white slit of eye showing.

Lowney turned from the bench. There was no greeting, no affability. "I haven't got the best lab resources in the world, Sam, but I'm pretty sure it was strychnine, and a walloping big dose of it. It was administered in raw meat. Probably just cut a slit in a piece of meat and stuffed the crystals in."

One of her ears was folded back. Sam unfolded it. "It makes me so mad I feel sick," he said.

Lowney stood on the other side of the table and they both looked down at the dead dog. "I don't get much of this, thank God. It's a dirty shame the kids saw it."

"Maybe they were meant to see it."

"What do you mean by that?"

"I don't know. I don't know what I mean."

"Sam, I wish you'd have let me talk you into taking her to obedience school last year. Then she'd never have touched that meat."

"We had her on a diet. She was an incorrigible beggar. And scared of her own shadow. But she was a wonderful dog. She had personality. Damn it all."

"Why don't you go back and decide where you want to bury her and get a big enough hole dug, and I'll drop her by after I close up here at five. I'll wrap her in something. No need for the kids to have to look at her again."

When Sam walked into the house Carol had managed to get Bucky quieted down. He was in the living room staring woodenly at television. His face was bloated and at intervals a strangled sob shook him like a massive hiccup. Carol was in the kitchen. He noted with instant approval that Marilyn's dishes and rug had been put away out of sight.

"Where's Nance and Jamie?"

"In their rooms. Did Doctor Lowney know what ——"

"Strychnine."

They were speaking in hushed voices. She turned into his arms and he held her. She spoke against the side of his throat. "I keep telling myself it was just a fool dog. But ——"

"I know."

She turned back toward the sink. "Who would do such a horrible thing, Sam?"

"It's hard to say. Somebody with a twisted mind."

"But it isn't like she was ranging around killing chickens or digging up flower beds. She never went off the place unless she was with the kids."

"Some people just don't like dogs."

She turned around, wiping her hands on a dish towel, her expression grim and intent. "You're never home when the school bus comes, Sam. Marilyn knew the sound it makes when it comes up the hill. And wherever she was, she'd head for the end of the drive and be there waiting when it stopped. If somebody followed the bus in a car they'd know about that. And then the next time they could go ahead of the bus and throw that poisoned stuff out where she'd be sure to find it when she came to meet the bus."

"It could have been just a coincidence ——"

"I think you know better than that. I think you feel the same way I do. I'm not being hysterical. There are dogs all along Milton Road. We've lived here seven years now, and I've never heard of such a thing happening. So, the first time it happens, why was it our dog?"

"Now, Carol ——"

"We're both thinking the same thing and you know it. Where was that wonderfully efficient private eye?"

Sam sighed. "He's not on the job any more."

"When did he stop?"

"Wednesday night."

"And just why did he stop?"

He explained Sievers' reasons to her. She listened intently, mechanically continuing to dry her hands on the towel.

"I should have told you. I'm sorry."

"So now this Cady can roam around at will and poison our dog, and work his way up to the children. Which do you think he'll start on first? The oldest or the youngest?"

"Carol, honey. Please. We haven't any proof it was Cady."

She threw the towel into the sink. "Listen to me. I have proof it was Cady. It's not the kind of proof you would like. No evidence. No testimony. Nothing legalistic. I just know. What kind of a man are you? This is your family. Marilyn was part of your family. Are you going to look up all the precedents and prepare a brief? You tell me the man hates you. You don't think he's sane. So do something about him!"

She had taken a step closer to him, glaring at him quite fiercely. And then her face crumpled and she was in his arms again, shivering this time. He held her and then he took her over to the bench by the trestle table and sat beside her, holding her hand.

She tried to smile and said, "I despise sniveling women."

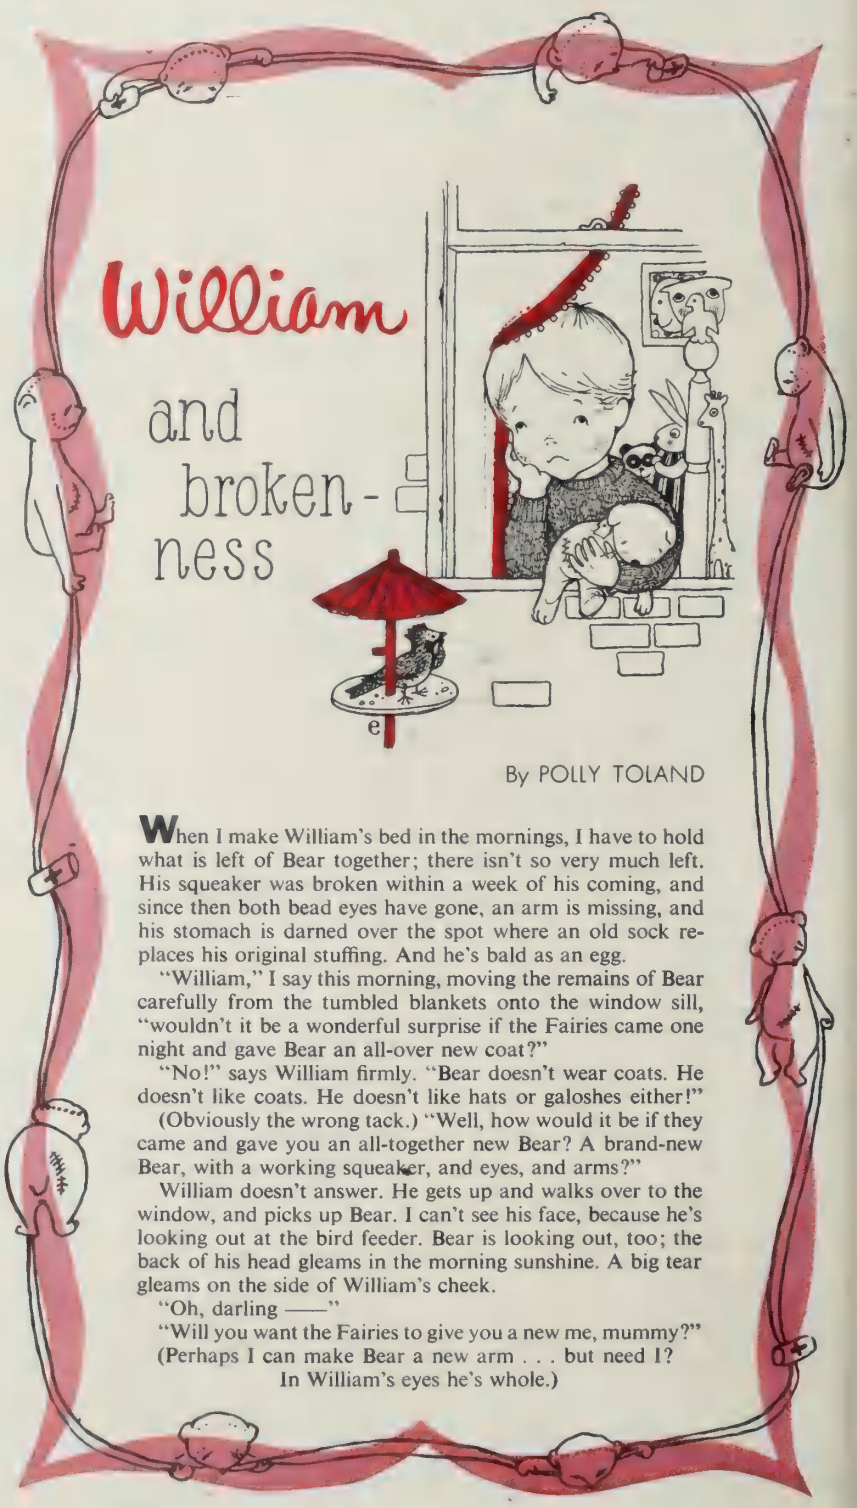
"You have the best reason in the world to be upset, honey. I know how you feel. It would be a lot easier to handle Cady in more primitive times, or in a more primitive part of the world. I am a member of a social complex. He is the outsider. I would rally my gang and we would kill him. I would very much like to kill him. I might even be able to manage it. You are reacting on a primitive level. That is what your instinct tells you I should do. But your logic will tell you how impossible that is. I would be sent to prison."

"I—I know."

"You want me to be effectual and decisive. That is precisely what I want to be. I don't think I can frighten him away. I can't kill him. The police are being less help than I thought they would be. There are two things I can think of. I can see Captain Dutton on Monday and see if he'll co-operate the way Charlie promised he would. And if that doesn't work out, then we'll move out of his range."

"How?"

"School will be over next week, Wednesday is the last day. You can take off with the kids and find a place to stay and phone me at the office when you get located. We can close the house and I'll take a hotel room in town. I'll be careful. This thing can't last forever."



"But between now and then ——"

"I'm not certain of anything. But I can make a guess about how his mind works. He isn't going to rush. He's going to give us some time to think this over."

"Can we be carefuller anyway?"

"I'll use the MG next week. You can drive the kids in in the wagon and pick them up after school. I'll give orders they're to stay on

When I make William's bed in the mornings, I have to hold what is left of Bear together; there isn't so very much left. His squeaker was broken within a week of his coming, and since then both bead eyes have gone, an arm is missing, and his stomach is darned over the spot where an old sock replaces his original stuffing. And he's bald as an egg.

"William," I say this morning, moving the remains of Bear carefully from the tumbled blankets onto the window sill, "wouldn't it be a wonderful surprise if the Fairies came one night and gave Bear an all-over new coat?"

"No!" says William firmly. "Bear doesn't wear coats. He doesn't like coats. He doesn't like hats or galoshes either!"

(Obviously the wrong tack.) "Well, how would it be if they came and gave you an all-together new Bear? A brand-new Bear, with a working squeaker, and eyes, and arms?"

William doesn't answer. He gets up and walks over to the window, and picks up Bear. I can't see his face, because he's looking out at the bird feeder. Bear is looking out, too; the back of his head gleams in the morning sunshine. A big tear gleams on the side of William's cheek.

"Oh, darling ——"

"Will you want the Fairies to give you a new me, mummy?"

(Perhaps I can make Bear a new arm . . . but need I?
In William's eyes he's whole.)

the place. And tomorrow you get some target practice with the Woodsman."

She linked her fingers in his. "I'm sorry I blew up. I shouldn't have. I know you'll do everything you can, Sam."

"I've got to dig a grave for Marilyn. Where do you think?"

"How about that slope behind the barn near the aspens?"

"I'll go change."

He put on faded paint-spattered dungarees and his old blue shirt. He sensed that Carol was right. Instinct told her Cady had poisoned the dog. He found it curious he should be willing to accept that with so little proof. It was contrary to his training, to all his instincts.

He looked in on Jamie in his room. Jamie sat on the bed leafing through one of his dog-eared gun catalogues. He looked up at his father and said, "It was really poison, wasn't it?"

"Yes, it was."

"And that man that hates us did it?"

"We don't know who did it, son."

The young eyes were pale and blue and hard. He held the catalogue out. "You see that thing? It's a blunderbuss. With a brass barrel. I'm going to put a double load in it and I'm going to fill it all the way up with dirty old rusty nails and stuff and I'm going to hit that old Cady right in the gut. Pow!" Tears stood in his eyes.

"Want to help me pick a spot for the grave?"

"O.K."

They got a spade from the barn. Sam got the hole well started and then let Jamie take his turn. The boy worked with dogged violence, grim-faced. As Sam stood watching, Nancy came up to him, walking slowly.

"This is a good place," she said. "Did you bring her back?"

"Doc Lowney is going to bring her."

"I saw you from my window. Mother thinks that man did it."

"I know she does. But there's no proof."

Jamie stopped digging. "I could dig a bigger hole. I could dig a hole for him and drop him down in it with snakes and things, and fill it with rocks and stomp it all down on him."

Sam could see the boy was winded. "I'll take a turn now. Let's have the shovel."

They stood and watched him finish it. Lowney arrived. He had the dog wrapped in a tattered old khaki blanket. Sam lifted her out of the car and carried her to the hole. He covered her quickly and shaped the mound with the shovel.

Dinner was a cheerless affair. During dinner Sam outlined the new rules. He had half expected objections. But the kids accepted without comment.

After the children were all in bed, Sam and Carol sat in the living room.

"It's so hard on them," Carol said.

There was a distant grumble of June thunder. Marilyn had always had a standard reaction to thunder. The head would go up and tilt. Then the ears would go back. She would stand up and give a vastly artificial yawn, lick her chops, eye them in a sidelong way and saunter in the general direction of the couch. With one more apologetic glance she would crawl under the couch. Once when a loud clap of thunder had come without previous warnings from the distance, she had shot across the room and miscalculated the clearance and banged her forehead mightily on the bottom edge. She had rebounded, staggered, recovered and scrambled under, and everybody had laughed except Bucky.

"It was like a charmed circle," Carol said. "And now something has come in out of the darkness and struck one of us down. The charm isn't working any more."

All five Bowdens had breakfast, for once, at the same time. Marilyn was not mentioned.

"Schedule," Sam said. "Attention all Bowdens. Nancy will help her mother swamp out the kitchen and make the beds while you boys help me find the stuff for the boat and load it in the wagon. Then we shall have a spot of target practice. You are in charge of hanging up the cans, Jamie. Then we go work on the boat."

The range was part way up the gentle hill behind the house. The backstop was a claybank. Jamie got a half dozen empty cans from the rubbish and tied cord on them and hung them from a red-maple limb in front of the claybank. They used up a box and a half of longs in the .22 automatic. Sam and Nancy were the best shots. Jamie, as usual, became infuriated with himself when Nancy outshot him. Carol listened with care to the hints Sam gave her. She did not flinch. Sam saw the set of her jaw and her frown of concentration. The kids were much quieter than usual. This had been a game they had played often. Today it was more than a game. There was a new flavor to it, sensed by all of them.

On Bucky's final turn he hit three of the riddled cans at sixty feet with an eight-shot clip. He flushed red with pride at the congratulations.

SO MANY CHILDREN

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

I heard the old woman who lived in the shoe
Bewailing the fact she knew not what to do
With so many children. "Oh dear and oh dear,
I've too many children to nourish and rear!
There's too many toothaches and noses to blow
And squabbles to settle and patches to sew
And bonnets to tie on and bruises to salve.
No woman should have all the children I have!"

I asked the poor woman so worried and worn,
"Then which of your brood do you wish were unborn?"
She looked at her moppets: the elfin, the grave,
The dimpled, the rosy, the shy and the brave.
She robed them with love and she crowned them with pride.
"There isn't a one I could spare!" she replied.

"Shall I take the cans down now?" Jamie asked.

"Leave them up," Sam said. "Maybe we'll get a little more practice in tomorrow. If we finish the boat."

"How about their homework?"

"Tonight and tomorrow night," Sam said.

"I was going to the drive-in tonight," Nancy said in a complaining tone.

"Forgotten the new rules already?" Sam asked.

"No; but gosh, dad, I'd already said yes."

"And just who has a car to take you to the drive-in?"

"Well, his name is Tommy Kent and he's a senior and he's eighteen, so he can drive at night, and it's a double date, sort of, and Sandra is going with Bobby."

"Is that the family that has the furniture store?" Carol asked.

"Yes, and it would be all right, honestly. They'll pick me up right here and we'll come right back after the movie. It's with John Wayne. I was going to ask about it Friday, but on account of Marilyn I forgot. Can't I go, please? Just this time?"

Sam looked at Carol and saw the almost imperceptible nod. "All right. But just this once. . . . You kids run along and get ready. We're going to the boatyard right now."

They ran down the hill. Sam and Carol followed more slowly. Sam said, "You crossed me up."

"I know. But I think this will be all right. And you would have no possible idea of how much I've heard about Tommy Kent, Tommy Kent, Tommy Kent. Before and during the Pike Foster era. He's a school figure. A big athlete. It's quite a coup for a junior-high girl to get a date with him. Tommy waited on me at the store one Saturday. He's quite a poised young man. She'll be safe and it will be better than having her gloom around. Pike's desertion hurt her morale. And this date built it back up again."

Jamie had let the two others go ahead. He stood by Marilyn's fresh grave, waiting for them. "Ever since I got up I keep feeling like I see her around. Sort of over to the side. Like if I turned my head quick enough I could see her."

Carol hugged him against her side. "I know, dear. We all feel the same way."

Jamie looked at his father from the circle of his mother's arm. "We could find where he eats and sneak in the kitchen and put something in his food and then when he eats it we could be looking through those round windows they have in the doors of the kitchens in restaurants and he'd be rolling around knocking tables over and everybody screaming until he's all quiet and dead."

"Those pants are too good for boat work," Carol said. She gave him a little push. "You run in the house and put on the rattiest pair of jeans you can find in your closet."

Jamie ran off. Carol said, "I wonder if it's healthy, the way his imagination works. Some of the things he comes out with are shocking."

"At eleven civilization is still a thin coating. Underneath is all savage."

"Sir, you are speaking of the children I love. But Jamie has such violent ideas."

"Speaking of violent ideas, can you manage to keep the automatic handy without being obvious about it?"

"I think so. My big straw bag."

"It won't make you feel too melodramatic?" Sam asked.

"My brood is threatened and I'm turning just as primitive as Jamie. While I was shooting up there I kept wondering if I could point it at a human being and pull the trigger and keep the sights lined up and not flinch. And I thought about Marilyn and I know I can."

The Harper Boat Club was on the lake shore between New Essex and Harper. The club building could more accurately be called a shack. The boat basin was small and crowded. Jake Barnes' boatyard was next door to the club. It was a cluttered, informal enterprise. Most members of the Harper Boat Club were ardent do-it-yourself addicts. Sam parked the station wagon in the rear of Jake's boatyard and checked off the things they had brought. Sandpaper, calking compound, antifouling marine hull paint, deck paint and varnish.

Jake ambled over to meet them as they came around the side of the main shed.

"Hi, Sam. Howya, Mizz Bowden. Hello, kids."

"Did you get her out?" Nancy asked.

"Sure did. Right down there on the last cradle. She needs some work, all right. Looked her over yesterday."

They walked down to the Sweet Sioux. Sam apportioned the work. They all began to work, using the sanding blocks. The sun was hot and it was tiring work. After a half hour Sam took off his shirt and hung it on a sawhorse. The slight breeze off the lake cooled the perspiration on his lean back.

Sam looked idly at his family. Nancy wore very short red shorts, old and faded, and a yellow linen halter. Her legs were long and brown and slim, beautifully shaped. She worked the sanding block with both hands, turning lithely at the waist. The smooth young muscles bunched and lengthened under the sheen and texture of her back.

They worked steadily, and by one o'clock Carol announced it was time for a lunch break. They would run home and eat and come back. It was then that Nancy announced, quite demurely, that she had told Tommy Kent what they'd be doing and he had said he might stop around and help, so if it was all right, she would stay and keep working and they could bring her back a sandwich, please.

Sam drove Carol and the boys home. Carol made hefty sandwiches and a giant pitcher of iced tea. As she was wrapping Nancy's sandwich, Carol said, "You itching to get back to work?"

"I'd like to get that hull painted before dark."

"I'm going to make Bucky take a nap. He's completely pooped. He'll yelp at the idea, but he'll cork off in ten seconds. You go on ahead and I'll bring the boys down in an hour or so."

He took the MG and drove back to the boatyard. He walked around the shed, carrying the sandwich and a small vacuum bottle of iced tea. Nancy was sitting on her haunches, sanding the undercurve of the hull, a difficult place to get at.

She smiled up at him. "Please just set that stuff down, daddy. I want to finish this one place first."

He went over and put the sandwich and vacuum bottle on the sawhorse. As he was unbuttoning his shirt, he had his back to Nancy. He stopped, motionless, his finger tips touching the third button. Max Cady sat on a low pile of timbers thirty feet away. He had a can of beer and a cigar. He wore a yellow knit sports shirt and a pair of sharply creased slacks in a shade of cheap electric blue. He was smiling at Sam.

Sam walked over to him. It seemed to take a long time to walk thirty feet. Cady's smile didn't change.

"What are you doing here?" Sam kept his voice low.

"Well, I'm having a beer, lieutenant, and I'm smoking this here cigar."

"I don't want you hanging around here."

Cady looked quietly amused. "So the man sells me a beer and I'm thinking about maybe renting a boat. I haven't fished since I was a kid. Fishing any good in the lake?"

"What do you want?"

"That's your boat, hey?" He gestured with the cigar, winked with obscene significance and said, "Nice lines, lieutenant."

Sam looked back and saw Nancy sitting on her heels, the short red shorts pulled to strained tightness around the young hips.

"Cady, I ——"

"A man has a nice family and a boat like that and a job where he can take off when he feels like it, it must be nice. Go out into the lake and mess around. When you're locked up you think of things like that. You know. Like dreaming."

"What are you after? What do you want?"

The small deep-set brown eyes changed, but the smile still exposed the cheap white teeth. "We started pretty near even back there in 'Forty-three, lieutenant. You had a fancy education and a commission and little silver bars, but we both had a wife and a kid. Did you know that?"

"I remember hearing you were married."

"I got married when I was twenty. The boy was four when you got me sent up. I saw him when he was a couple weeks old. Mary dumped me after I got life. She never even visited. They make it easy to do when you're in for life. I signed the law papers. And I never got another letter. But my brother wrote how she got married again. Married a plumber there in Charleston, West Virginia. Had a whole litter of kids. My brother sent me clippings when the kid got killed. My kid. That was in 'Fifty-one. He was twelve, and he fell off his motor scooter under a delivery truck."

"I'm sorry about that."

"Are you, lieutenant? You must be a nice guy. You must be a real nice guy. I looked Mary up when I got back to Charleston. She near dropped dead when she recognized me. The kids were in school and the plumber was out plumbing. You know, she's still a pretty woman. I had to bust open the screen door to get to talk to her. She got one of those fireplace things and tried to hit me over the head with it. I took it away from her and bent it double and threw it in the fireplace. Then she came out quiet and got in the car."

"Why are you telling me this?"

"I want you to get the picture, like I told you last week. By then she was doing just what I told her, and I had her write me a love note and date it, asking me to take her away for a while. I made her write it full of dirty words. I stayed with her about three days in a hotel. By then I got tired of her sniveling all the time. All the fight was gone, but she was marked up from that first day when she was still trying to get away. Are you getting the picture, lieutenant?"

"I think so."

"I told her that if she ever tried to yell cop, I'd mail a photostat of the note to the plumber. And I'd come around and see if I could throw a couple of the plumber's kids under some delivery trucks. She was impressed. I had to put near a fifth of liquor into her before she passed out. Then I found one of those rough little roadhouses. I lifted her out and put her in an old heap parked there. About a mile back up the road I threw her shoes and her dress in a field."

"This is supposed to scare me?"

"No, lieutenant. This is just part of the picture."

"I don't want to listen to all this," Sam told him.

"But you'll listen, lieutenant. You want the word. I got this word for you. After I found out from my brother about her marrying again, I planned the whole thing, just exactly the way I did it."

"So?"

"You're supposed to be a big smart lawyer, lieutenant. I thought about her and I thought about you."

"And made plans for me?"

"Now you're getting warm. But I couldn't make plans for you because I didn't know how you were set. I wasn't even sure I could locate you."

"Are you threatening me?"

"I'm not threatening you, lieutenant. Like I said, we started pretty near even. Now you're a wife and three kids ahead of me."

"And you want us to be even again."

"I didn't say that."

They stared at each other, and Cady was still smiling. He looked entirely at ease. Sam Bowden could find no way to control the situation. "Did you poison our dog?" he demanded, and immediately regretted asking the question.

"Dog?" Cady's eyes went round with mock surprise. "Poison your dog? Why, lieutenant! You slander me."

"Oh, come off it!"

"Come off what? Now I wouldn't poison your dog any more than you'd put a plain-clothes cop on my tail. You wouldn't do a thing like that."

"When a couple of young people strongly devoted to each other commence to eat onions, it is safe to pronounce them engaged.
JAMES M. BAILEY

"You did it, you filthy ——"

"I've got to be careful. I can't take any punches at you, lieutenant. I get sent up for assault. Want a cigar? They're good ones."

Sam turned helplessly away. Nancy had stopped working. She was standing looking intently toward them, her eyes narrowed, and she was biting her underlip.

"There's a real stacked kid, lieutenant."

Sam turned back blindly and swung. Cady dropped his beer can and caught the punch deftly in the palm of his right hand.

"You get one sucker punch in a lifetime, lieutenant. You've had yours."

"Get out of here!"

Cady had stood up. He put the cigar in the corner of his mouth and spoke around it. "Sure. Maybe after a while you'll get the whole picture, lieutenant." He walked toward the shed, moving lightly and easily. He grinned back at Sam, then waved his cigar at Nancy and said, "See you around, beautiful."

Nancy came over to Sam. "Is that him? Is it? Daddy! You're shaking!"

Sam, ignoring her, followed Cady around the shed. Cady got behind the wheel of an old gray Chevvy. He beamed at Sam and Nancy and drove out.

"He is the one, isn't he? He's horrible! The way he looked at me made me feel all crawly, like worms do."

"That's Cady," he said. His voice was unexpectedly husky.

"Why did he come here?"

"To put a little more pressure on. God knows how he found out we'd be here. I'm glad your mother and the boys weren't here."

They walked back to the boat. He glanced down at her as she walked beside him. Her face was solemn, thoughtful. She looked up at him. "What are you going to do about it?"

"I don't know."

"What is he going to do?"

"I don't know that either."

"Daddy, do you remember a long time ago when I was little and the nightmares I had after we went to the circus?"

"I remember. What was the name of that ape? Gargantua."

"That's right. The place where they had him had glass walls and you held me by the hand and he turned and he looked right at me. Not at any of the other people. Right at me. And I

The Picture of Health for October

by MAXINE DAVIS

Fighting the battle of the bulge? Keep it up! These excess pounds cause all sorts of trouble, for instance, if you're pregnant. If you are pregnant they're a serious menace. Today obstetricians control gain, and thin down overweight to avert complications and make pregnancy and childbirth safe.

Extra pounds are depressing. The fat girl isn't really jolly, knowing she's not attractive, ashamed of her lack of self-restraint.

Extra pounds are expensive. You have to feed and clothe them; pay higher life insurance; spend so much energy toting them that you're inefficient; you don't earn the income you might without them.

They're uncomfortable, unhealthy; hard on the feet. They overwork all the vital organs; cause ailments ranging from headache to heart trouble. In so many ways, they're bad news!

Your doctor may advise thinning down; you've become used to over-eating. A great help will be a bottle of KESSAMIN #14 tablets. These contain essential nutritional vitamins and iron as well as a neutral food additive. Together with enjoyable Kessamin menus, they make up the New KESSAMIN PLAN. I've found the New KESSAMIN PLAN the only way to be perfectly satisfied with small servings, even of gourmet foods. My doctor told me about Kessamin! I find it really works.

It's been a good summer—our family has stored up health. The job now is to keep it. So I think it's smart to supplement my family's diet with Bexel Vitamin-mineral capsules. Get them for the entire family—small fry and grown-ups too. For adults, keep them as handy as sugar or salt at breakfast. The young will enjoy the gay red child-size BEXEL capsules or pleasant BEXEL syrup.

Vitamins provide the additional nutritional elements that can help make you feel top of the world. With BEXEL (in her formula) the baby gets what doctors advise. Maybe vitamins will even help your husband break par! The family's on the up-beat!

But Ann has problems! You worry about that young one. She's sulky and miserable, afflicted by adolescence and acne. And her dresses are pulling out at the seams.

Whether her pimples and pounds are the reason or result of those appalling soda fountain messes she consumes is neither here nor there. Ann is sadly in need of help.

You can't cure adolescence, or acne either; but, thank goodness, with UTOL you can make those twin trials relatively painless. UTOL, an antiseptic antibiotic ointment is invaluable; it helps relieve the minor irritation and itching that keeps reminding Ann of her "spots", and also prevents re-infection. UTOL is flesh-tinted to hide blemishes. So have her apply it as a foundation cream under her make-up.

With UTOL she'll be OK, her gay un-self-conscious self again. She'll try for the Junior High Girls Hockey Team after all!

Now you can relax. You've taken the basic preventive measures to guard the family against autumn ailments. So if your husband brings a rough throat and croaking voice home from a smoke-filled conference room, don't get the thermometer; get NEO-AQUA-DRIN. Those antibiotic anti-pain lozenges are just what he needs.

Now from the laboratories of McKesson comes the first antibiotic deodorant

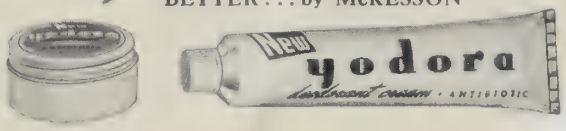
...used over 2 years by thousands of women to give longer, safer protection!

Fluffy, white Yodora won't irritate delicate skin. So mild, so gentle you could actually use it for underarm shaving.

AMONG the great medical discoveries in recent years is the use of antibiotics to wipe out bacteria.

Now, for the first time, an antibiotic is used to end perspiration odor. For what causes odor in perspiration, is the bacteria that breed there—and remain in your clothes, to make them objectionable too.



McKesson scientific research now ends this old problem with New antibiotic Yodora. New Yodora stops perspiration bacteria up to 48 hours. And gives this lasting protection without harsh chemicals so it does not injure clothing or irritate your skin. In fact, it is so mild and gentle that you could actually use this fluffy, white cream for underarm shaving.

It is only natural that McKesson laboratories, after years of dedicated research, should pioneer this amazing new principle to take care of unwelcome perspiration odor.

Ask your druggist, whose professional training you can trust, about New antibiotic Yodora. He can tell you why New Yodora is years ahead . . . why it does a better job, naturally, to keep you and your clothes fresh and odor-free. New antibiotic Yodora, in jars or tubes, is economically priced. It is just another example of McKesson's great conscience for perfection, which always strives to "make it better—better for you." © 1957, McKesson & Robbins, Inc., N. Y.

felt like something inside me curled up and died. It was something savage that didn't have any right to be in the same world I was in. Do you know what I mean?"

"Of course."

"That man is like that. I think that man is all bad."

Never before, he thought, have we been able to talk on an equivalently adult level without a mutual shyness. "I suppose I could understand him, if I wanted to. He was a combat-fatigue case, and he went right from that into life imprisonment at hard labor. There had to be somebody to blame. And he couldn't blame himself. I became the symbol. He doesn't see me. He doesn't see Sam Bowden, lawyer, homeowner, family type. He sees the lieutenant, the young J.A.G. full of puritanical righteousness who ruined his life."

"In our psychology class Mr. Proctor told us that all mental illness is a condition where the individual can't make a rational interpretation of reality. I had to memorize that. So if Mr. Cady can't be rational ——"

"I believe he's mentally sick."

"Then shouldn't he be treated?"

"The law in this state is designed to protect people from being wrongly committed. A close relative can sign commitment papers which will put a person away for a period of observation, usually sixty days. Or if a person commits an act of violence or, in public, acts in an irrational manner, he can be committed on the basis of the testimony of the law officers who witness the violence or irrationality. There's no other way."

She turned and ran her fingers along the sanded hull. "So there isn't much to do."

"I would appreciate it if you'd break your date tonight. I'm not ordering you to. You would probably be safe, but we wouldn't know if you were safe."

She thought it over, frowning. "I'll stay home."

"I guess we can break out the paint."

"All right. Are you going to tell mother about this?"

"Yes. She has the right to know everything that happens."

Tommy Kent appeared a few minutes before Carol and the boys came back. He was a rangy, good-looking boy, polite, amusing and just deferent enough. He was given a brush. He and Nancy painted in the same area of the hull, each objecting to the other's sloppy work. Sam was glad to see how she handled him. She was fencing with him with pert confidence and the sure-footedness of self-respect, quietly aware of her own attractiveness. He heard her break the date. She was just sufficiently apologetic to avoid being rude. And just vague enough to awaken suspicion and jealousy. Sam saw the black scowl on Tommy's face after Nancy turned away from him and thought, Young man, she just sank the hook. Pike Foster never had a chance, and now she's ready for bigger game.

After Carol arrived and made Nancy take time off for her sandwich and tea, and the four young ones were busily painting, Sam took Carol down to one of Jake's sagging docks and sat beside her, feet dangling just above the water. There he told her about Max Cady.

For a moment Sam was tempted to keep the story of Cady's wife to himself. But he plodded through it, trying to do an unemotional job of straight reporting, looking down at the green bay water. Carol did not interrupt. When he looked at her he saw for the first time how she would look when she became old.

"It's hideous!" she said. Her head was bent and he saw the tears clinging to her black lashes. He put his hand on her arm.

"It will be all right," he said. She shook her head violently. "Look. It's Saturday. The sun is shining. There's the whole brood. We'll make out. They can't lick the Bowdens."

Her voice was muffled. "You go back and help. I'll stay here a little while."

After he picked up his brush he looked back. She looked small out on the dock. Small, humbled and dreadfully afraid.

On Monday morning after he had finished his mail and switched some of his appointments around, Sam made an eleven-o'clock appointment with Capt. Mark Dutton at New Essex police headquarters. Dutton had gray hair and a quiet manner. He could have been broker, insurance agent, advertising man—until he looked directly at you. Then you saw the cop eyes and the cop look—direct, skeptical and full of a hard and weary wisdom.

After they shook hands and Sam was seated, Dutton said, "This is the same thing Charlie Hopper saw me about?"

"Yes. About Max Cady. Charlie seemed to think that you people would be able to . . . badger him. I don't want to ask special favors, you understand. But I think he's dangerous."

"Charlie is a politician. The first aim is to make people happy. The second aim is to make people think they're happy."

"You didn't promise him anything?"

"We pulled Cady in and held him while we checked."

"Charlie told me. He isn't wanted anywhere."

"No. Like they say, he's paid his debt to society. He can account for the car and the money. He's not indigent. Because of the nature of the only conviction on his record, we set up a card for him in the known-deviate file."

"Is it possible for you people to . . . force someone to leave town?"

Dutton nodded. "We've done it, not frequently. The last time was three years ago. This is a clean town. Cleanest of its size in the state. That doesn't mean spotlessly clean, Mr. Bowden. But it means that we've kept the syndicate type of operation out. Three years ago two of the big Chicago-Miami-Las Vegas types rolled into town with their sunglasses, their pigskin luggage, their lavender Cadillac and a pair of the kind of blond secretaries who can't quite type. They took suites at the New Essex House and started to circulate. They wanted to sell syndication. Chief Turner and Mayor Haskill and Commissioner Goldman and I had ourselves a conference. We interpreted the law our own way. Leave them alone and we'd have trouble. Big bad trouble.

"So we gave them trouble first. They couldn't turn around without breaking some ordinance they'd never heard of. It took four days and fifty-six hundred dollars in fines before they gave up. We checked the route they took out of town and alerted the county boys and the state boys. They were grabbed four times for speeding before they hit the state line. Speeding and drunken driving. They all had licenses, and we lifted all but one so there'd be one driver left, one of the girls to get them over the state line. They haven't been back."

"You couldn't do that to Cady?"

"It could be done. It would take a bunch of men and a lot of time. I checked him over myself while he was in the shop. He won't scare and you can't hurt his dignity because he hasn't got any."

"Will you do it?"

Dutton looked sharply at Sam and said, "No."

"Can you give me a reason, captain?"

"I can give you a lot of reasons. One: We're undermanned, underequipped, underpaid and overworked. Two: This is something which, as a lawyer, you can understand. It would set a curious precedent. We used extralegal methods and a lot of time and man power to avert a definite threat to the whole city, not to just one individual. Were we to do this, there would be questions asked. If Cady should employ the right shyster—forgive the term—it could get very hot around here. Three: You are not a resident of this city. You work here, but your home is not here. You pay no city taxes. Your firm does, but this is not the business of your firm. As an individual, you pay no fractional part of my salary."

Sam flushed and said, "I didn't know it would sound ——"

"Let me finish. Lastly, I got a look at the man. He looks clever. He doesn't seem to be in any murderous rage. I think he's just trying to pressure you a little. But I don't want you to go away from this office thinking you're getting no co-operation at all. If this Cady steps out of line anywhere inside my area of authority, I will see that the arresting officers and the judge are properly informed. And they will whack him with the stiffest deal the law allows."

"Thank you very much, captain. Have you got time to listen to what he's done so far?"

"I'd be very interested."

Sam told him about Sievers, and the dog, and the meeting at the boatyard.

Dutton leaned back and frowned and rubbed the eraser end of the yellow pencil against the side of his nose. "If he made Sievers that fast and shook him that easy, then he's got a talent for the game. Do you have any proof about the dog?"

"No. But after talking to him, I'm certain."

"That's outside our boundaries, of course."

"I know that."

Dutton thought a few more moments. "I'm sorry, Mr. Bowden. I can't offer you any more than I've already told you I'd do. If you're genuinely alarmed about this, I suggest you pack your family off somewhere."

"We've talked about that."

"It might be a good idea. He'll get tired of his game and leave town after a while. Let me know any new developments." He stood up and held his hand out. Sam thanked him and left.

At three in the afternoon as he was passing Bill Stetch's office he glanced in and saw that Bill was alone. On impulse he went in and told him the whole story. Bill was shocked and sympathetic and completely without any constructive suggestions. Sam had the curious feeling that Bill did not want to be pulled into the situation in any way.

"It puts you in a pretty uncomfortable position," Bill said.

"It's doing some funny things to me—going to the police and politely asking them to do something outside the law."

Stetch chuckled. "You're a smart attorney, Sammy. You are a good man who believes in himself and the law. Too few do. Keep your regard for the lady with the scales. But don't get too appalled at yourself when you ask the police for an extralegal favor. Life is a continual process of compromise, Sammy. The idea is to come out the other end still clutching a few shreds of self-respect. End of lecture for today. I hope you solve your nasty problem."

Back in his own office, Sam sat behind his desk and thought of himself with contempt. The dreamer with the starry eyes. Stop bleeding, Bowden. Stop marching around waving all your little flags. Cady shoots your kids while you cry onto your diploma and look through all the dusty books for a way to slap his wrist legally.

He phoned Apex and left his number for Sievers to call him back.

At quarter to six, as he was leaving, Sievers phoned and they made arrangements to meet at a bar three blocks from Sam's office in ten minutes. Sam phoned Carol and said he would be late. She said the children were all right.

Sievers was standing at the bar when Sam walked in. He nodded and then walked to a rear booth.

"I talked to Captain Dutton today. He won't do anything."

"I don't see how he could. Do you want to go ahead with what we talked about?"

"I—I think so."

Sievers had a thin smile. "No more talk about the legal way?"

"I've had enough of that kind of talk today to last me quite a while."

"You're sharpening up."

"Because of what has happened. Friday he drove out and poisoned my dog. The children's dog. There's no proof. Saturday he came to the boatyard, bold as brass."

"He'll soften up."

"Can you do what you said?"

"It can be done right for three hundred bucks, Bowden. I won't dig up the talent myself. I've got a friend. He's got the right contacts. He'll put three of them on him. I know the place too. Out in back of Two-eleven Jaekel Street. There's a shed and a fence near where he parks the car. They can wait in the angle of the shed and the fence."

"What will they do?"

"What do you think? They'll beat him. They'll do a professional job. A hospital job." His eyes changed, became remote. "There isn't one man out of fifty—and understand, I've seen these figures work—who is ever worth much after a thorough professional beating. They have rabbit blood for the rest of their lives. You're doing the right thing."

"There isn't any chance they might kill him by accident?"

"These are professionals, Bowden!"

"When do you think it will happen?" Sam asked.

"Tomorrow night or Wednesday night. No later."

Sam smiled crookedly and said, "Does this sort of thing happen often? I'm pretty naïve, I guess."

"It happens. People get too wise. They have to be straightened out, and sometimes this is the only way you can give them the word."

"That's one of Cady's favorite expressions."

"Then he'll be real pleased."

"At what?"

"To get the word."

He saved all three stories until both the boys were in bed and Nancy was in her room studying for her last exam of the year. Carol listened, her face quite still and remote.

"So you're going to pay three hundred dollars to have him beaten to within an inch of his life."

"Yes. I am. But don't you see, it's the only ——"

"Oh, darling, don't try to explain or apologize. I don't mean it that way. I'd mow lawns and do other people's laundry to get that three hundred dollars."

He stood up and moved about the room restlessly. "It's still a wrong thing to do," he said. "It's wrong that it should be possible to do a thing like this. It makes the world sound like a jungle. There's supposed to be law and order."

She followed him and linked her arms around his waist and looked up at him. "Poor Samuel! Darling, maybe for us, right now, it is a jungle. And we know there's an animal in the jungle."

After Carol was asleep he got quietly out of bed and moved to the bedroom window, pulled the blinds up with silent cautiousness and looked out. The night was empty. His four incredibly precious hostages to fortune were in deep sleep. The earth turned and the stars were high. This, he told himself, was reality. Night, earth, stars and the slumber of his family. And the other thing that had seemed so valuable was just a dusty and archaic code which enabled men to live close together in reasonable peace and safety. In olden times the village elders punished those who broke the taboos. And all the law was a vast top-heavy superstructure built on the basic idea of the group enforcing the punishment of the nonconformist. Law was a tribal rite, with white wigs, robes and oaths. It just did not happen to apply to his own situation. Yet two thousand years ago he could have sat in council with the elders and explained his peril and gained the support of the village, and the predator would be stoned to death. So this action he had taken today was a supplement to the law. Thus it was right. Yet when he go back into bed, he still could not accept hi rationalization.

Sievers made no report on Wednesday, an Sam could find nothing in the paper. O Thursday morning at nine-thirty he received call from Dutton.

"This is Captain Dutton, Mr. Bowden. got some news for you on your boy."

"Yes?"

"We got him for disorderly conduct, dis turbing the peace and resisting arrest. He go into a fight last night at about midnight in th yard in back of that rooming house on Jaeke Street. Three local punks jumped him. They marked him up pretty good before he got untracked. One got away and two are in the hospital. He threw one through the side of a shed and gave him a sprained back and multiple bruises. The other one's got a broken jaw, a broken wrist, concussion and some ribs kicked loose."

"Will he be put in jail?"

"Definitely, Mr. Bowden. He was dazed, I guess, and it was dark in the yard, and he swung on a patrolman when he came running across the yard and gave him a nose as flat as a sheet of paper. The second patrolman dropped him with a night stick and they brought him in. He's yelling for a lawyer."

Sievers phoned at four. "You should get a refund."

"What happened?"

"They got careless. And he purely scared those boys. The word is going around. It's going to be hard to line up boys for a second shot at him. I'm sorry it was handled so badly, Mr Bowden."

"But he will go to jail."

"And he will be released."

"Then what do I do?"

"I guess you pay for another treatment. You better set aside a thousand for this one. He isn't going to be caught napping a second time."

By the time Sam got home Carol had most of the information from the evening paper, a single paragraph on a back page that gave the names of the two in the hospital and told of Cady's arrest.

Cady pleaded guilty to striking the officer. The two other charges were dismissed. He was sentenced to pay a hundred-dollar fine and spend thirty days in city jail.

It was thirty days of grace. Thirty days without fear. And thirty days of anticipation of the fear to come. As far as the Bowdens' morale was concerned, Cady could not have planned it better.

School had ended. The restrictions on the children were lifted. Cady's thirty days began officially on the nineteenth of June. He would be released on Friday, the nineteenth of July.

They had planned that Nancy would go again to summer camp. It would be her fourth year at Minnatalla, and would begin on the first day of July. Jamie would return for his second year to Gannatalla, the boy's camp that was three miles away and under the same management. The camps were on the shore of a small lake in the southern part of the state, a hundred and forty miles from Harper.

Nancy became vibrant about the plan, excited, going about with tiptoe pleasure. She confessed that Tommy Kent had a job as assistant director of athletics at Gannatalla.

"She'll be fifteen on the twentieth," Sam reminded Carol. "What day does that come on?"

"A Saturday this year. We can drive down, bearing gifts." She paused and gave him a sudden stricken look. "I didn't think before. That's the day after ——"

"I know."

"What about them down there? Jamie and Nance. Will they be safe?"

"I suppose he could find out where they are. Almost any contemporary in the village would know where they go. I've thought about that. You know how it is down there. They travel in packs. Great yelping packs, full of muscular enthusiasm. I've planned to instruct the kids and have a talk with the management when we drive them down. But having Tommy there may simplify it. I can talk to him. I think I like

A Special Introduction

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

"Never buy a one-occasion dress" is one of Barbara J.'s firmest convictions. But there's an exception to every rule, and especially when it comes to her own Saturday night "at home" with guests for dinner. Strictly informal, Barbara still feels she wants something bright and festive to put her in exactly the right frame of mind. A fashion check of her winter wardrobe-in-the-making, however, tells her she needs a practical costume for casual wear as a final fill-in. The problem (not really one at all for Barbara) she solves in a lunch hour of shopping. She buys a skirt, in a wonderful fabric, at a wonderful price, $10.95—a full sweep of a wool blanket plaid in varying shades of brilliant blues. The skirt, introduced at a party, will be seen innumerable times and places thereafter.

By BET HART

The party— a guaranteed success, at least as far as Barbara's fashion menu is concerned. Barbara wears the white jersey blouse she made last month, thinks it takes on an added elegance tied to the front. (It's Vogue Design No. 9278, and can be worn the other way around just as easily.) The skirt, held out by a soft petticoat, shows off the huge squares of blue, fringed front, and three pearl buttons.

PRIGENT

Autumn and outdoors. Right in the city or away on a weekend, the "special occasion" purchase worn as a very practical casual. The skirt could be pretty with Barbara's white sweater, but she has further ideas, and invests a few fashion $'s in a blue pullover, $4.95. The neckline can be buttoned, or as shown here, open and filled with a scarf. The sweater picks up the darkest shade of the plaid, and a pretty one it is.

that kid. There's a look of competence about him."

"He and Nancy have a date tonight. They're going to the benefit barn dance at the firehouse. He's picking her up at eight."

"I never knew this routine was going to start so soon."

"We gals with Indian blood grow up early."

That evening Nancy raced through her dinner and was ready by quarter to eight. Sam cornered her in the living room. "Very rustic," he said approvingly.

"Do I look all right?"

"What are those things called?"

"These? Ranch jeans for girls. They're cut sort of like men's."

"Sort of. But just to humor the idle curiosity of your senile male parent, just how do you get into them?"

"Oh, that's easy! Concealed zippers from your knee to your ankle."

"Very effective with that shirt. It looks like a tablecloth from an Italian restaurant. Nance, honey, I assume you've told Tommy about our . . . problem."

"Heck, yes."

"When he arrives do you mind pretending you're not ready yet? So I can have a little chat with him?"

When Tommy arrived, Sam came down from the porch and met him. "Farmer Brown, I presume," Sam said. Tommy wore bib overalls, a blue work shirt and a straw hat.

"Pretty corny outfit, isn't it, sir?"

"A proper uniform for the occasion. Nancy will be ready in a few minutes. I want to talk to you a minute, Tommy."

"Yes, sir?"

"Nancy says she's told you about a man who is giving us a bad time?"

"Yes, she told me."

"Cady is in jail now. But he'll be released next month on the nineteenth. You're old enough so I can lay it on the line. I think the man is dangerous. I know he is. He wants to hurt me through my family. That's the way he could hurt me the worst. He may go down to camp. I want to give you an extra responsibility. I want to tuck Jamie under your wing. Make sure he isn't ever alone. Give the other people down there the word. I think you could achieve the best degree of alertness down there if you tell them there's been a kidnap threat. My wife and I talked this over, and we think he'll be safer there than here. Are you willing to do this?"

"Yes, sir. But what about Nancy?"

"You'll be three miles away from the other camp. I'm going to talk to them when we take the kids down. She's older than Jamie, and less likely to forget to be cautious. But I think . . . she's a more logical target. I'm going to try to handle the problem here when Cady is released. If it is handled, I'll get word to you at once, Tommy."

"I understand there aren't many men over at Minnatalla," Tommy said dubiously.

"I know that. You will see Nancy off and on, I assume. Keep reminding her to stay with the pack. She's seen Cady. That's going to be a help to her." He gave Tommy a detailed description of the man and said, "If a situation should come up, don't try to be impulsive and heroic. You're husky and you're an athlete, but you'd be no match for the man. He's got the size and speed and ruthlessness of a bear. And I don't think you could stop him with a pipe wrench."

"I understand."

"And understand this, too: I'm not being dramatic."

"I know that, sir. I know about the dog. I never heard of anything like that before. I'll make certain they'll both be all right, Mr. Bowden. I won't goof it."

"I know you won't. . . . Here comes the farmer's lady."

He watched them walk out to the car. After they left, waving and yelling, Sam went back to the porch. Carol came out and sat on the railing near him. He said thoughtfully, "I suspect we're near the end of the glamour days of juvenile delinquency. I think a very unusual crop of kids is coming along. They've become bored with the dissipations of their elders and the animal philosophies of some of their contemporaries. They are tired of using the bogeyman of military service as a built-in excuse for riot and disorder. This is a very moral crop of kids. They are sophisticates, but they practice moderation by choice. They seem to have a sense of moral purpose and decent goals, which, God knows, is something difficult to find in the here and now. They are all right. Tommy is a good kid."

She clapped solemnly. "Hear, hear."

They sat in silence while night came. Jamie and some of his friends were playing in the barn. The shrilling of their voices merged with the insects' song. He tried to submerge himself completely in the subtle rhythms of the summer night, but he could not halt the ticking of the clock in the back of his mind. Each second brought them closer to the return of danger. And he knew that Carol, too, listened to that clock. It was, he thought, somewhat like the knowledge of a mortal illness. It made the immediate beauties more vivid, all pleasures sharper, while at the same time it stained beauty and pleasure with a distressing poignancy.

They left early for camp on Monday, the first day of July. They arrived at eleven, going to Minnatalla first. Nancy's friends of other summers waved and called to her. After Sam and Jamie had off-loaded Nancy's gear into her cabin, he drove to the administration cottage and had a talk with the camp supervisor, a new man, younger than the man he had replaced. The man's name was Teller. He was gently patronizing, and it was clear that he thought he was dealing with an overprotective parent.

"All our campers are carefully supervised, Mr. Bowden. They're busy every moment of the day. Lights out is strictly enforced, and we have a very competent night watchman who makes a tour of the entire camp area four times a night. We permit all wearers of the Minnatalla merit button to go into Shadyside on Saturday afternoons. One of our staff supervises the junior campers, but the senior girls can ——"

Sam interrupted. "Nancy is not to go into Shadyside at any time."

Teller looked pained. "But surely that is unfair to the child, Mr. Bowden. When she sees others being given permission ——"

"Nancy is perfectly willing to forgo those trips. She is . . . mature enough to recognize the fact she may be harmed."

Teller flushed. "I do not know how wise it is to frighten a child, Mr. Bowden."

"I haven't made a special study of it myself. Are we in agreement? No trips to Shadyside for Nancy?"

"Yes, Mr. Bowden."

The situation at Gannatalla was more reassuring. After Jamie was unloaded, Sam looked up Mr. Menard. He recognized Sam from the previous year. "Hello, Mr. Bowden. Glad to have Jamie back."

FIRES

By OLIVER HALE

We brought up twigs and branches to the fire, as much as we felt that it would require,
then gathered around watching it grow hazy and brighten up at times; till we were lazy with desultory talk and each mind wandered on a private travel, or perhaps pondered over some little or big thought.

My own thought was that fire is not fulfilled until caught by wind, and that it is the same with people who dream of heights and reach the village steeple.
All of us burn with some flame, and require a wind to make it break into a fire;
but the thing is, the wind must be within us, or else the flame dies with the spirit in us.

"I wanted to talk to you about ——"

"A possible kidnaping deal? Tommy Kent gave me the word. I've advised everybody on the staff. I told them how to handle it. We won't treat Jamie differently than we treat anybody else. But, without being obvious about it, we're going to keep a special eye on him, and be on the lookout for anybody hanging around. We don't want you people worrying about him. There's no need to. And I'm going to talk to him about how he can cooperate."

"I certainly appreciate this. Over there at the female department, Mr. Teller made me feel as if he thought I was making the whole thing up."

"Bert is new and he's taking himself a little seriously right now. I'll have a little talk with him."

"I'll appreciate that very much. This sort of thing . . . isn't very good for the nerves."

"Anybody who goes after a man's kids hits him where he lives."

They were home by four. Bucky rose up in stuporous condition and drunk-walked to the house. The sky was dark and low and the clouds that hurried by seemed just above the tops of the elms. The wind was gusty and humid. It rattled the windows of the house. The house had a feeling of emptiness. At six the heavy rains came. July had come too quickly. And nineteen days could not be made to last.

Sievers phoned Sam on Monday morning and came to his office. "Something has come up," he said. "I'm being transferred. California. It won't be possible for me to arrange the deal we were talking about."

"Can't you arrange it before you go?"

"Too far ahead. But I did a little fixing for you. Want to write this down? Joe Tanelli. Eighteen-twenty-one Market. It's a candy-and-cigar store, and a small-time horse room in the back. He'll expect you on Wednesday, the seventeenth. Don't give him your name. Mention my name. He'll know the score. He'll want five hundred down. That's all right. Give it to him. And he'll want the other five after it's been taken care of. He'll round up better talent than last time."

To Sam the situation was curiously unreal. He had not thought such a conversation possible in his office. And there was nothing particularly conspiratorial about Sievers' attitude. He could have been talking about the best place to buy fresh eggs.

"I appreciate this."

Sievers looked at Sam. "I don't want to make you any more nervous than you are, Mr. Bowden, but I might as well tell you this: Just out of curiosity I had Apex in Wheeling run a check. Max Cady wasn't any angel. None of the four Cady boys was. Max got in the Army after he cut a man badly with a broken bottle. It was a fuss over a woman. The court gave him the choice of enlisting or going to prison, so he enlisted. The old man was in and out of prison his whole life. He was a moonshiner with a violent temper. The boys' mother has been feeble-minded her whole life. The oldest brother was shot to death eight years ago in a running gun battle with Federal agents. The next oldest was killed in a prison riot in Georgia. He was serving a life sentence for felony murder. My pride was hurt when I did so bad tailing Cady. Now I don't feel so bad. He's one of the wild ones. They don't think the way people do. He was headed for jail whether he got caught on that rape charge or not. People like that have no comprehension of right and wrong."

"Isn't there a word for that?"

"Psychopathic personality. They make us learn the terms. But that's a classification where they put people they don't know what else to call. People they can't treat. People who don't respond to any appeal you can make to them. Except maybe the one we're trying to make." He stood up. "I've got a lot of stuff to clean up before I take off in the morning. Joe will fix it up for you."

It was a long time after Sievers left before Sam could get his concentration back on his work. He respected Sievers for giving him all the unpalatable facts, but they served to make Cady even more ominous than he had been thus far. It was like when you were a child and a frightening shadow seemed to grow larger and blacker and more threatening as you watched it. He told himself Cady was human and vulnerable. He told himself it was shameful to be frightened of a man. And he decided there was no point at all in telling Carol what Sievers had learned. He would tell her of the new arrangement, but she needed no new reasons to be afraid of Cady.

On Friday, the twelfth of July, after the dinner dishes were done, Sam looked up from his book when he heard Carol make an odd sound. She was sitting on the couch, reading the paper. She lowered the paper and stared at him with an odd expression.

"What's the matter?"

"What was the name of the man you have to see next Wednesday night?"

"Tanelli. Joe Tanelli."

"Come and look at this."

He sat beside her and read the obituary of a Joseph Tanelli, age fifty-six, who had died the previous night in Memorial Hospital of a heart attack. Mr. Tanelli had been a retail merchant in New Essex for the past eighteen years.

"It's probably not the same one, dear."

"But what if it is?"

He spoke confidently. "Even if it is, I can make contact with somebody else at the address Sievers gave me."

"Are you sure?"

"Practically positive."

But underneath his assurance he knew it was the same man. A malicious fate was dealing Cady every joker in the deck.

Market Street was a neighborhood where you automatically locked the car. No. 1821 displayed a few weary soft-drink posters and cigar ads. In peeling gilt across the window was painted Cigars—Magazines—Candy. A half dozen stone steps went up to the entrance of the neighboring building. A fat woman with red hair sat on the top step.

He tried the door, but it was locked.

"It's locked on account of Joe," a loud brassy voice informed him. He looked up into the round face of the fat woman. "Joe died."

"Have any idea when they'll open up again?"

"They're open. It's just the front door locked sort of like a courtesy to Joe. You know. If you want to get in you go down there to the first alley and take a left and count three doors and knock on the third one."

He thanked her and followed her instructions. It was a door of heavy construction, with no window in it. It opened six inches and a round white face of uncooked dough with raisin eyes looked out at him and said, "Yah?"

"I—I want to talk to whoever is in charge." He could hear a rumble of voices beyond the door.

"What about?"

"I . . . Sievers sent me."

"Hold on." The door closed. A full minute passed. It opened again. "Nobody ever heard of no Sievers."

"Joe Tanelli knew him."

"That's great." The raisin eyes seemed to be looking through him and beyond him.

"Listen to me. Joe was going to do something for me. Now he can't. But I still want it done and I still want to pay for it, and I want to know who to see."

"Me. So what was it?"

"I can't stand here in the alley and tell you," Sam said.

"Look, Mack, I don't make private deals. Joe made private deals. He had his way and I got my way." The door started to shut and then opened again. "And don't hang around, Mack, and don't knock on the door any more or somebody comes out and reasons with you." The door banged shut.

Sam did not leave the Market Street area. It was always so effortlessly accomplished in the movies. Sinister types were always available to the hero. He hit the roughest-looking bars he could find. He tried to select suitable-looking types and start a conversation and steer it around to the point where he could state his problem in a hypothetical way.

One sad-faced bartender gave him a low-key lecture. "Chief, you better stay away from that television set. We got tough, smart cops here."

Sam knew from the way his mouth felt that he was getting slightly drunk. "I'll tell you what I really want."

"I don't want to hear it. I don't want to know nothing about what you've got to buy or sell. The less I know, the better I sleep."

He drove carefully home. "I was a great success," he told Carol bitterly. "I was overwhelmed by my own competence. It was like trying to sell dirty post cards at a Sunday-school wienie roast."

"How much have you had to drink?"

"Plenty," Sam told her. "It was an occupational hazard. I skulked through low dives, my collar turned up. I've been called Doc, Mack and Chief."

"Can't you do anything?"

"I can call Sievers Monday morning."

"What a ghastly piece of luck, Mr. Tanelli dying like that."

The last drink seemed to be having more effect than all the others. He swayed and peered down at her. "Ghastly luck for good old Joe too."

"Don't be nasty to me."

"I've got it figured out. You know what it is, don't you? It's the finger of fate diddling little Sammy Bowden. That good man. That noble and righteous man. Ah, how he's slipped. Now he goes forth to hire assassins."

"Darling, please."

"Law and Order Bowden, we all called him around the office. He could break but not bend. He would never compromise with his honor. And what a pitiful sight he is these days. Slinking through the slums ——"

The crack of her small hard palm against his cheek was loud and shocking. The sting made his eyes water. He looked down at her and she did not look angry or hurt. She stared up at him quite calmly.

"Hey!" he said.

"Drinks or no drinks, I don't think it is an awfully good time for us to start feeling sorry for ourselves, dear."

"But I was just ——"

"Mad at yourself for not being able to do something entirely out of your line and contrary to what you believe in. So you were starting to roll in bathos."

"That's a sneaky right you've got there, pardner."

"Well, were you?"

"I guess."

"I need a lot of strength to lean on at this point. Up until a few minutes ago there's been plenty."

"It's back now. Resume leaning."

To his astonishment she began to cry. All our emotional reactions are becoming shrill and raggedy, he thought. Tension is washing the sand from under our castle walls.

On Monday morning the local branch of Apex gave him the information he needed in order to phone Sievers in California. Though the connection was clear, Sievers had a sound of remoteness, of lack of interest.

"Heart attack? That's too bad."

"It makes it pretty awkward for me, Sievers."

"I can see how it would."

"Who shall I contact for the same kind of service?"

"I don't think there's anybody else to go to."

"What do I do? Maybe I can find somebody on my own."

"I don't think you can. And it would be a bad risk. You might better just . . . get your people out of the way."

"I—I see."

"Sorry I can't be more helpful."

It was a most unsatisfactory conversation. And it meant the end of a possible line of defense. They would have to fall back to another defensive position.

He talked it over on Monday night with Carol. She took it more calmly than he had anticipated.

"I know that it makes a certain kind of sense," she said, "but we will be so dispersed. Nance and Jamie down at camp. Bucky and me off God knows where. It leaves only you and that frightens me, darling. What good will any of us be if something happens to you?"

"I'm going to be the most devout coward you ever heard of, honey. I'll take a room at the New Essex House and I won't go out after dark, and I won't open the door unless I know for sure who has knocked."

"And then suppose nothing happens? When do we come back? When do we know it's over?"

"I don't think he's going to be very patient when he gets out. I think he'll make a move and I think he'll make it at me, and I'm going to make certain it will be unsuccessful; and if he does, then we'll have the evidence that will send him back for a long time."

"Oh, yes. For a year, or three years, and then we can have such a fine time planning just what we'll do when they let him out again."

"It will work out. Tomorrow I am becoming a dashing and dangerous figure, with the help of Captain Dutton."

"What do you mean?"

"He is arranging the permit for me. He wasn't as reluctant as I expected him to be. At lunchtime I go pick up a very ugly and efficient device manufactured by Smith and Wesson. And when the harness is properly fitted, it will hang right here. It will nestle in a thing called a spring-clip holster. Nobody can snatch it away, but when I reach for it properly it will, Dutton claims, jump right into my hand."

She looked at him in a level way. "So many gay little jokes. And such a wide, glassy, self-conscious smile."

"What do you want me to do? Clench my teeth and look steely-eyed? Of course I'm self-conscious about it! It isn't exactly my line, you know. I'm scared of Cady. I'm scared the way a kid having a nightmare is scared. The thought of him makes my hands sweat and makes my belly feel hollow. I'm so scared I'm going to wear that gun and tomorrow night I'm going to take so many cartridges up on the hill that by the time I'm through I'm going to be able to draw and fire and hit what I aim at.

"Now then. Back to scheduling. We leave early Friday morning. We find a place for you and Bucky. We stay there Friday night. Saturday we see the birthday girl. I stay with you Saturday night at the place we find and Sunday I drive back into town and ——"

"Why don't we take both cars, dear? When we go to camp we can leave the MG at the place where I'm going to stay, and then on Sunday you can drive it back to the city when you check into the hotel."

He wore the short-barreled revolver home on Tuesday night, feeling vastly foolish, and suspecting that everyone who glanced at him on the street saw the suspicious bulge under his left arm.

He stood inspection while Carol circled him. Finally she said, "I know it's there, so I can see the sort of lump it makes, but actually, darling, I guess you're the type. You're thin and you like your jackets cut loosely anyway."

He went up to the range with three boxes of shells, and a piece of sheeting and some twine. He tied the sheeting around a tree thick enough to simulate a man's torso. He penciled a crude heart on the left side of the chest. At first he was discouragingly slow, awkward and inaccurate. The weapon had a flat gutty bark, much more authoritative than the snapping of the .22. He fired a couple of dozen rounds for accuracy, and then went back to the routine of drawing and firing, improving doggedly.

Carol came up the hill.

"Does the demonstration make you feel any better?"

She nodded. "It does, Sam. It really does. But it's funny to think of you . . . I mean ——"

"If you mean I don't consider myself a dashing figure, you're right. I am a sedentary forty-year-old office worker, with a mortgage, a family and an insurance program. I am not suited to this new aroma of violence and menace."

She came up to him and held his wrists. "You are as brave as any man. You have warmth and strength. You know how to love and be loved. That is a great and rare art. You are my man, and I wouldn't want you changed in any way."

He kissed her and then stood, holding her in his arms. He looked down over her shoulder and the dark gleam of the gun in his right hand looked incongruous. He was holding his wrist canted so the weapon would not touch her. And beyond the gun he could see the white target and the penciled heart.

On Friday they left early and drove southeast toward the pleasant little vacation villages in the lake area. Bucky seemed willing to accept the idea that Carol wanted a vacation from doing all the housework and he could come along too. It was, they told him, the next best thing to going away to camp.

They drove slowly in the two cars and arrived at the town of Suffern, ninety miles from Harper, at lunchtime. They had a good lunch in the quiet dining room of a lakeside inn called The West Wind. It was an old-fashioned frame building, with the tall and awkward dignity of the Victorian period. A busy little cricket of a man showed them two third-floor rooms on the lake side with connecting bath. The weekly rate was reasonable and the rooms, with maple furniture and rag rugs, were clean and cheery. The rate included breakfasts and dinners, the use of the tiny beach, the hotel rowboats when available, the English croquet course, and the two tennis courts. There were other children in the hotel.

It was not at all necessary, Sam decided, to use a different name. It would be theatrical, ludicrous and unnecessary. Carol said she would write directly to Sam's office and, as an additional precaution, use envelopes not marked with the return address of The West Wind.

After Carol and Bucky had unpacked and changed, they went for a walk through the village.

That night, after they were in the big double bed, Carol said, "I wish it could stay like this. I mean so safe. I don't want Sunday to come and I don't want to stand out there making my mouth smile while you drive away."

"Don't think about it."

"I can't stop."

As had been prearranged by letter, they picked Jamie up at his camp before lunch. He was brown and thin and scrubbed to a startling state of cleanliness. Then they drove three miles along the lake-shore road to Minnatalla to get Nancy. Nancy looked overwhelmingly healthy, and she had stars in her eyes.

They drove thirty miles due east to the small city of Aldermont for a festive meal in the dining room of the Hotel Aldermont. The hostess gave them an alcove off the dining room, where they had more privacy.

After lunch Sam went out and got the presents out of the car. Nancy was delighted with everything. There were the traditional small consolation presents, one apiece for Jamie and Bucky. Consolation for its being somebody else's birthday.

Carol, by prearrangement, took Bucky off and left Sam at the table with Nancy and Jamie so he could tell them about the new arrangement. They could know their mother and Bucky were at The West Wind in Suffern, but they were to keep it to themselves. Nancy asked if she could tell Tommy, and Sam told her she could. In the event of serious emergency they could phone their mother in Suffern, and phone him at either the office or the New Essex House.

Jamie looked somberly at his father and said, "It's just like running away, isn't it?"

"You hush!" Nancy said.

"Never mind, Nance," Sam told her. "Yes, son. In a sense it is. But I'm not hiding. I'm going to be careful, but I'm not going to hide. They put the women and children in the lifeboats first."

"Tommy and Mr. Menard keep telling me to stay with the other kids all the time," Jamie said.

"Don't either of you get careless," Sam said. "The man has a car. He's out of jail. When he finds the house closed, he can easily find out in the village where you kids go in the summer. I know he knows Nancy by sight, and I'd guess he knows you by sight too. Ready to go? Your mother and Bucky will be out in the lobby."

"It's funny to think about nobody being home," Nancy said. She touched her father's arm shyly as they stood up. "Please be careful, daddy."

"I will."

On Sunday night Sam had dinner in the grillroom at the New Essex House by himself and then went to bed. He felt very alone in the world. At the end of the drive that went up to the side entrance of The West Wind he had stopped and looked back and waved. Carol and Bucky, standing close together on the green grass of the lawn, waved back. He drove the little car too fast all the way back to New Essex.

Nothing happened on Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday. Sam followed his cautious routine. He called Carol twice from the office. She had a determined cheerfulness plastered over her tension and her loneliness. But the camouflage was imperfect. On Wednesday morning there was a long chatty letter from her. She described the other guests in the hotel. She had found a tennis partner, a rangy powerful girl whose husband was a marine captain on overseas duty. Her game was rusty but it was beginning to come back. Bucky had shown such an interest she had found him a small racket and she was teaching him the basic strokes. He was learning quite quickly. Bucky was contemptuous of the poor television reception in the lounge. There was a good loan library in the big drugstore in the town. And she missed him. They both missed him and missed the house and missed the campers.

On Thursday afternoon he decided that he had had enough of waiting and wondering. It was time the white mouse ventured out of the hole and found where the cat was.

He arrived at Nicholson's Bar on Market Street at six o'clock. The bar had a scuffed, worn look. The mirrors and the chrome were peeling. The television over the bar was on and there was an out-of-order sign on the jukebox. There were three men sitting at the far end of the bar, heads close together, talking in low important voices. There were no other customers.

The bartender stood endlessly polishing a glass and watching the television screen. Sam took a stool on the curve of the bar near the door, then, feeling self-conscious, he moved to the end stool around the curve where, by sitting sideways, his back was to the wall and he could see the door.

The bartender drifted over to him, looking at the screen until the last possible moment. He wiped the bar in front of Sam and said, "Yes sir?"

"Beer."

"Coming up."

He brought the beer and a glass, picked up Sam's dollar, rang it up, put a half dollar and a nickel on the bar.

"Pretty slow?"

"Always is, this time of day. We do a late business."

"Has Max been in lately?"

He saw the bartender look him over more carefully. "What Max do you mean? We got a lot of Maxes."

"The bald one with the tan."

The bartender pulled at his underlip. "Oh, that Max. I see him one time lately. Let me

"I know I asked you, Ronald, but that has nothing to do with it! I'm not going out with anyone who can't be more tactful about his honest opinions!"

think back. Sure, it was last Saturday night. He had some trouble, you know. He slugged a cop and they put him in city jail for thirty days."

"How about Bessie McGowan? She been in?"

"She's always in, mister," the bartender told him. "I wish that she'd pick another spot for a change. She ought to be coming in any time now."

Ten minutes later a woman walked in. She could not have selected anything to wear which could have made her look more grotesque. She had on white pumps with four-inch heels, skin-tight black bullfighter pants, a wide white leather belt with a gilt buckle, a tight sweater-blouse in a red-and-white horizontal candy stripe. A woman with a perfect figure might have been able to carry it off with a certain amount of theatrical success. But this was a woman in her middle years, with a mop of hair so abused by dyes that it was the color and texture of sun-bleached hemp. She had a puffy chipmunk face, square red lips painted boldly on. She was grotesque, ludicrous and incredible. Yet there was nothing pathetic about her. She was carrying on her own war against time in her own way.

She plopped a white bag on the bar and said in a voice worn by tobacco, whisky and long use into a texture that was like a stage whisper by a baritone, "Jolt and water, Nick."

"The check come?" the bartender asked warily.

"Yes, yes, the check came." She slapped a five-dollar bill on the bar.

As he reached for the bottle the bartender said, motioning toward Sam, "Friend of yours asking after you, Bessie."

She turned and stared at him and then walked over to him. He saw that her eyes were large and gray and exceptionally lovely. She sat on the stool next to him, and studied him, puzzled. "I draw a blank. Clue me."

The bartender put the shot glass of whisky, a glass of water and her change in front of her.

"Well over a month ago, Bessie. You were out at one of the joints on the shore east of town. With a bald man named Max. You told me this was your favorite spot."

"I remember that Max. I was with him. But what were we doing talking to you?"

"What do you mean?"

"You've got a haircut and clean fingernails and a press in your suit, mister. You talk like your folks sent you to college. You could be a doctor or a dentist. Max would talk to bums. Nobody but bums. You gentlemen types made him ugly."

"So since you recommended the place, I thought I'd stop and get a drink."

"So you thought you'd stop and get a drink." She looked at him with a compelling and horrible coquetry.

He said quickly, "Seen Max around lately?"

"No thanks. He was in jail. I guess he's out now. Let me tell you about that Max Cady. He's all man. I got to give him that. But he's mean as a snake. He doesn't give a damn for anybody in the world but Max Cady. You know what he did to me?" She lowered her voice and her face hardened. "He beat me. I thought he was going to kill me, honest. All the lights went out. When I woke up he was gone. I got the doc over and told him I fell downstairs. I've never yelled cop in my life, but I was close. Three cracked ribs. Forty-three bucks dental. I looked so awful it was a week before I stirred out of the place. He isn't a human being. That Max is an animal. All I did was ask questions. All he had to do was say shut up."

"So he's no friend of yours, Bessie."

"If I saw him dead in the street, I'd buy drinks for the house."

"He's no friend of mine."

She shrugged. "How do you mean, just seeing us that once?"

"I didn't. I made that up."

The gray eyes turned very cold. "I don't like gags."

"My name is Sam Bowden."

"So what's that got to do with —— Did you say Bowden?"

"Maybe he called me the lieutenant."

"Yes, he did."

"Bessie, I want you to help me. I don't know what to expect. He's going to try to hurt me. Somehow. I want to know if he gave you any clue."

She kept her voice very low. "He was a funny guy, Sam. He didn't have much to say. But twice he talked about Lieutenant Bowden. And both times it gave me the cold creepers, right up and down my back. Part the way he looked. He didn't say anything that made any sense, though. One time he said you were an old Army buddy and to show you how much he liked you, he was going to kill you six times. He said he was going to make you last. He was drinking, and I tried to, you know, kinda laugh it off like telling him he wouldn't kill anybody for real."

"What did he say?"

"Nothing. He just gave me a look and he didn't say any more that time. Do you know what he meant? How can you kill anybody six times?"

He looked down into his beer glass. "If a man had a wife, three kids and a dog."

She tried to laugh. "Nobody'd do that."

"He started with the dog. He poisoned it."

Her face turned chalky. "Dear sweet Jesus!"

"What else did he say?"

"There was just the one other time he talked about you. He said something like 'By the time I get around to the lieutenant, I'll be doing him a favor. He'll be begging for it. That kind of fits with the other, doesn't it?'"

"Would you come with me to police headquarters and sign a statement about what you heard him say?"

She looked at him for ten seconds. "I've seen the inside of that place too many times already. They wouldn't listen to anything Bessie McGowan says. I'm sorry if you got problems, but that's the way the ball bounces."

"I'll beg you to ——"

She got off the stool. "I don't have to do anything about anything."

"Not so loud, Bessie," Nick said.

She picked up her change. "I'm finding a better joint." She yanked the street door shut behind her.

Nick sighed. "Once upon a time she was Miss Indiana. She showed me the clippings. Well, come back and see us."

Sam walked down to Jaekel Street. No. 21 was a square three-story frame house painted brown with yellow trim. A window sign announced Room for Rent. He pushed the door bell and heard it ring in the back of the house. There was a smell of mold and acid and cabbage and soiled bedding. There was a screaming quarrel going on upstairs.

A gaunt old woman came down the hall a way toward him. "Yay-yuss?"

"Does Mr. Cady live here."

"Nope."

"Mr. Max Cady?"

"Nope."

"But he did live here?"

"Yay-yuss. But he don't no more. I want no truck with fighting and police and jail folk. That's where he was. Jailed. Come back Friday and got his stuff. He didn't want to pay me rent for parking space ahind the house but I said as how I'd have the law right back on him in a minute and then he paid me and he drove his car off and that's the last of him."

"Did he leave a forwarding address?"

"Now that would be downright stupid for a man never got any mail at all, wouldn't it?"

"Has anybody else come around asking for him?"

"You're the very first and I surely pray you're the last."

He phoned Dutton the next morning. Dutton said he would see if anybody could get a line on Cady.

Nothing happened on Friday. On Saturday he drove down to Suffern and on Sunday they visited Nancy and Jamie. He was back at his desk on Monday morning. He had not told Carol about the story he got from Bessie McGowan. He did not want her to know he had gone down into Cady's area, nor did he wish to alarm her.

Nothing happened on Monday. Or Tuesday.

The phone call from Mr. Menard came through on Wednesday, at ten in the morning, on the last day of July, the day when Carol was to have gone down and picked Jamie up in the afternoon and taken him back to Suffern with her. It was his final day of camp.

When he realized who was calling, he felt as though his heart had stopped.

"Mr. Bowden? Jamie's been hurt."

"How was he hurt?"

"I think you'd better come down. He's on his way over to the Aldermont Hospital now and it will probably be best if you go directly there. It's not serious. He's not in danger. Sheriff Kantz will want to talk to you. I have to . . . give him what information I had, of course."

"I'll leave right away. Have you informed my wife?"

"She left before the call got through. I understand she's on her way here. I'll send her over to Aldermont and we could keep the little fellow here with us, if she agrees to that."

"Tell her I think that would be a good idea. Where's Nancy?"

"On the way over with her brother and Tommy Kent."

"Can you please tell me what happened to the boy?"

"He was shot, Mr. Bowden."

or Four-Eyes. Perhaps she's really upset. I don't know why, but every time I come home I am always afraid that something has happened. But even from the hall I can see that nothing has happened. Everything is normal. On the floor, right in front of the door, is my oldest son, stretched out on his back with his legs at a right angle and a comic book on his knees.

"Hi," he says, without looking at me. And bursts into a roar of laughter at something in his comic book.

They say that sons take after their mothers. In my home they all take after their mother, sons and daughters both. Proceeding along the corridor between banged-up tricycles and toy automobiles overturned like dying beetles, I meet a daughter one hand span tall and two wide, with the beginnings of a comma for a nose and four beginnings of commas for hair, with pink pants on inside out and somebody else's bib which covers her from her neck to her feet.

"Gianna ug," she informs me. "Ug Gianna."

Gianna is she, if I have figured correctly, but I am astounded that she calls herself ugly. She is usually very vain.

"Why?" I ask her suspiciously. The women in my family always make me suspicious.

"Gianna foon," she explains to me. "Mamma fooooooon!"

I told you that they all take after their mother. They are all abstract. Gianna foon. Mamma fooooooon—maybe it's an early poetic attempt. I continue on to the living room.

I find the usual scene there. My wife is sitting in front of her writing table and typing like ten typing people. She has a green handkerchief on her head, a pair of enormous ski pants, two tufts of cotton in her ears, a daughter drawing a picture seated on her feet and a son who is shooting rubber bands at her back.

The reason for the handkerchief on her head is plain: headache. All writers always have headaches, if you want to know. Whether they all put handkerchiefs on their heads I don't know. As for the tufts of cotton in her ears, they are acoustical insulation. ("My antibells" she calls them.) The result is that the children, to attract her attention, shout like ten shouting people or else pull violently at her elbow until she, defeated, removes the cotton, listens, solves, comments, praises, puts back the cotton and picks up the thread again.

Don't ask me why, in the month of July, my wife wears ski pants to write a story, because I don't know. She says that these ski pants—these and only these—bring her good luck. That they are magnetic and attract inspiration. "Who has seen my magnets?" she says when she has to begin writing. "A hundred lire to the first one who finds my magnets." And the whole family scurries to look for the magnets—that is, the pants—which, like everything else in this house, are never where they ought to be. When the magnets are found, she puts them on and inspiration is assured. Perhaps even Dante, while he was writing the Inferno, wore ski pants.

I look at her. Her "working" glasses, which are enormous, hide half her face and her nose, seen in profile, is more than ever like a comma. Hi, Four-Eyes. I feel something fluttering around me which dangerously resembles a cloud and I move forward a step.

She hasn't heard me arrive because of the cotton. I put a hand on her shoulder and she leaps a foot in the air. "Don't tell me it's dinnertime already!"

It's a cry from the heart. Other wives wait for their husbands, all dressed up and trembling, watching the clock and twisting their hands, and when he arrives they run to meet him with their heart in their eyes. All wives do it. Even the ones in her stories. And she—look at her there. Her devoted young husband comes home tired from work. She looks at him and what does she say? "Don't tell me it's dinnertime already!"

There's not a trace of cloud remaining. I see before me a creature with horrible glasses, horrible ski pants and a horrible handkerchief on her head. A presumptuous little monster to whom I have sacrificed, God alone knows why, the ten best years of my life.

"Well, I suppose I'd better go into the kitchen," she sighs, looking at the typewriter

When you get into a tight place and everything goes against you, till it seems as though you could not hold on a minute longer, never give up then, for that is just the place and time that the tide will turn.

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE

as an exile might look at the coast of his native land. "I'll finish it later."

The story, she means. That it is eight o'clock and I am as famished as ten famished people and that nothing is ready doesn't bother her in the least. Oh, but it won't end like this, I resolve while waiting for dinner. Who does she think she is? For a few scribbled stories that she writes, does she think she can treat me like a worm? Furthermore, if I weren't around to reread them and criticize them and correct all her millions of typing errors, does she think they would be published? Pff! Oh, but I'll make her understand, I who ——

Dinner is ready in less than a half hour. To compensate, it is terrible as it generally is. The older boy eats with his comic book leaning against his glass, the older girl eats with her left hand so she can draw surrealistic beasts with her right hand, the younger boy keeps firing without pause, the younger girl gives something to eat all around, to my arm, to h r mother's arm, to the twelve stuffed animals wi'h scanty fur among the dishes, to the napkins and to the glasses. "Papa, 'lasses, goo' 'lasses, papa." Their mother nibbles a finger and gazes at everyone from an infinite distance. That's my wife.

I get up and pretend to read a newspaper in my armchair, gritting my teeth to hold back my bitterness. Behind me the children carry on their abstract discussions, interspersed with sinister tinklings and frightful crashes which mean my wife is clearing the table.

"How hot it is," she says vaguely. But she doesn't take off the ski pants for fear that later inspiration may escape her. "Oh, heavens, how hot it is. Gianna, don't eat the knife. What will the knife's mother say if you eat it? She will cry, oh, how she will cry. What. Giorgio? What, Marina? One at a time, please, Eh? Who? Where? Don't shoot at the light bulb, Momo, because it will get mad and burst and then papa will get mad and burst too. What, Marina-Giorgio? Who? Why? One at a time, please. Oh, heavens, heavens, how hot it is!"

One last crash farther away informs me that my wife has moved into the kitchen. But not for long (she washes the dishes at two A.M. or even not at all). Another series of "Eh? What? Who? Where? One-at-a-time-please. Oh-heavens-how-hot-it-is," announces her return.

Here she is, tiny and crazy, with her handkerchief on her head. She resembles a pirate after three days of starvation. She looks at me; I look at her. The atmosphere between us could be cut with a knife.

"Hey," she says.

I turn to look at the paper. If she thinks she can set everything straight with a hey ——

"Hey you," she insists.

I raise my eyes and turn to look at her. In the space between the glasses and the commas a dimple has appeared. It's not fair. Now she'll take off her glasses, I think, and press my hands on the armrests to resist this injustice.

She doesn't take off her glasses. She doesn't even dream of it. She takes one hand from behind her back and in it there are some typewritten pages.

"If you want to read my story ——" she says magnanimously.

That's what she says, understand? During innumerable and rather animated discussions I have made clear to my wife my wholehearted masculine contempt for stories in general and hers in particular. If, however, she should send in a story without having me read it first she would offend me mortally and she knows it.

I get up slowly and I feel myself swelling like an avalanche. The air whistles around me.

"Blast your stories!" I shout like ten shouting people. However, instead of "blast" I use another word. More incisive and adapted to my state of mind.

Through the whistling air I hear Gianna's sweet voice, "Papa sout. Oh papa sout." And I see my wife bend over to pick up something that hasn't fallen. She is laughing—laughing at me, understand? I think I could commit murder.

"Perhaps you didn't understand me, my friend," I say, shaking her scrawny little arm. "I was speaking seriously. Blast your kitchenmaid stories and double blast you, you madwoman," I say, shaking her again. "You half-baked p-pirate!"

She jerks her arm free. "Well, then, get out!" she shouts, pounding her fist on the table. "You and your Grecian nose and your broad shoulders and your brain like a r-rooster! Good only to criticize and swear. What use are you to me? Get out. What are you waiting for?"

"Nothing," I say. "I'm not waiting for anything. I'm going."

And I slam the door too. Papa pam.

She said it herself, didn't she? Get out, she said. What use are you to me? she said. With your Grecian nose and your brain like a rooster. She said it herself. So it's fair, isn't it, that I am here at Floretta's bar? Since I'm no use to my wife, I, who gave up blondes for her. Possibly I might be of some use to someone else. Possibly my shoulders and my nose might make the eyes of twenty-two-year-old shapely blondes flutter. It may be. Take a look at the cashier's desk and see if Floretta is fluttering her eyes. Did you see? I need only stretch out my hand. And you may be sure that this time I will stretch it out. Oh, and how I will stretch it out. The bar is half empty. Watch.

"Look at Floretta," the bartender whispers confidentially. "Just take a look at her."

I take a look at her. She is not only fluttering her eyes; she is drying them with a handkerchief.

"It's always like that," sneers the bartender, tapping his forehead with his finger. "When she reads that stuff she always weeps."

"What is it?" I ask him. "The obituary page?"

"Worse," he says. "The stories of Minni Liccioli. . . . What's the matter, did you choke? Look up at the ceiling and it will stop. Look at the little bird, my mother used to say whenever I choked."

While I look at the little bird and the bartender beats me on the back Floretta finishes reading. She blows her nose once more, puts the magazine in her bag and comes toward me, undulating. She sits down on the stool next to me, smiles, and I stop looking at the little bird. I had almost forgotten what twenty-two-year-old girls are like when they are pretty.

"It's a lovely evening," I say. "Would you like to go for a stroll with me?"

The bartender coughs.

"Oh, I'd love to," she says. "I'd madly love to."

WHAT IS A BOY?

By HERBERT HOOVER

A boy has two jobs: one is just being a boy, the other is growing up to be a man. What is a boy made of and what does he need beside parents, food, clothes and shelter?

First: He has an unbelievable amount of dynamism in his muscles and is equipped with a complete self-starter. With his impelling desire to take exercise, what he will do next is unpredictable. He needs to exhaust these surplus energies in an indestructible place.

Second: He has an insatiable curiosity and a large supply of imagination. At times he seems to be an illuminated interrogation point. That requires that his newly discovered world be explored all over, including remote ideas. He needs a place for adventure.

Third: He has a yen for battle, strife and competition. The battle instinct needs to be channeled into constructive competition with due recognition of his prowess. He also needs companionship and friendship.

Fourth: He wants to belong to something. He likes to play games. He needs every implement from checkers to a baseball bat.

Fifth: He takes to water and should have a periodic bath. He is equipped with all the known physiological organs. They need to be occasionally inspected by a doctor.

Sixth: He has a sense of orderly conduct, or he can be instilled with it. He needs a place to try his hand in the problems of self-government.

Seventh: He must someday learn a skilled occupation at which he can earn a living. He needs a chance to taste many trades to find his occupational bent.

Eighth: He is an American citizen from birth. He must be taught the responsibilities of citizenship. He has a soul, and it needs moral and spiritual guidance. He comes from every race, color and religion. He needs to learn to respect the dignity of all of them.

These are the characteristic needs of all boys. Some boys are fortunate in their neighborhoods: some are not. Some have to live and play in an environment of bricks and pavement, in streets heavy with traffic. The Boys' Clubs of America help to meet the needs of these, the pavement boys of our congested cities, so that they may have an equal chance with other boys to grow to good and useful manhood.

A boy presents joys, hopes and especially paradoxes. He strains our nerves, yet he is a complex of cells teeming with affection. He is a periodic nuisance. He is a part-time wrecker, yet he radiates sunlight to all the world and can become a joy forever.

There are 437 boys' clubs in 287 communities. They provide opportunity for 420,000 boys. The results are difficult to measure, but one is certain: each year for fifty years the Boys' Clubs of America have given this nation an army of good citizens.

There! In the palm of my hand.

"Let's go," I say, gallantly helping her down m the stool. The bartender coughs again. I take her arm and I am a handsome young n without a past who is walking along the rm, empty streets in the evening with a per- ned blonde on my arm. It's a lovely feel- g—melancholy and stimulating and lovely. n't talk, Floretta.

But she talks.

"I've been wanting to ask you for a long ne," she says, "but you were so reserved that ever had the courage."

"Ask me what?" I inquire.

"About your wife," she says. "Please, uldn't you get me a photograph of your e?"

Oh, no! It can't be.

"How do you know that I am my wife's sband?" I ask brusquely.

"A friend of mine told me. She is the friend the sister of the niece of one of the tenants your building and she d to me, 'See that guy h the pug nose? He's husband of Minni ccioli.' 'No-o-o,' I d. 'Yes,' she said, 's the one. Honest.' d that's how I know."

I understand. Dreamy s, tender voice, a ousand smiles—not me at all but for my e's husband. I un- stand everything. A ment ago on this ewalk there was a ndsome young man h a Grecian nose, rsting with charm; w there is a heap of oble.

She speaks again. "I'd e wonderful care of The photograph, I an. I'd put it in a autiful frame and ng it up over the cash ister."

The photograph with sses over Floretta's h register! God of beciles, look down.

"I wrote to your e," she continues. aybe that letter of oretta's is pinned to wall.) "I wrote to twice, you know? e first time she didn't en answer me." (Then e must have lost the ter. It might be in the en closet. Or in the rigerator.) "But I kept on loving her just same. I'm a fan of hers like mad. I always l everybody, 'Minni Liccioli is a wonder.' read all her stories twice and sometimes ee times. She's marvelous. You can't help ing her like mad. But you know all that, ?"

It's strange, but I do know it. And suddenly eel frighteningly angry and frighteningly oud and frighteningly sad.

"And so I wrote her another time," she s. "And she answered me. A little note t's so cute I always carry it around with e. Look."

My wife's small, untidy handwriting. Her l love letters—funny as twenty funny letters, d so alive and so much hers and so much ne. Oh, Four-Eyes!

"However, she didn't want to send me a otograph," Floretta continues, carefully tting the note away. "She says she doesn't ve one," she adds, dubious.

But it's true. Those few snapshots which manage to take with our ancient family mera are all of the children and me. You are handsome, she says. Oh, Four-Eyes. I am t handsome. I am a guy with a pug nose d rocks in my head. Why did you marry me, ur-Eyes?

"And so I thought I'd ask you for the pic- e," Floretta goes on. "You'll give me one, n't you? Look, it doesn't matter if your wife is a little bit ugly. I love her like mad just the same."

"Ugly!" I say. "Who told you my wife was ugly?"

"No, no, nobody," she answers, frightened. "It's only that . . . since she didn't want to send me a picture I thought maybe ——"

Don't think, girl. Thinking doesn't suit you. My wife ugly! Now you listen to me, girl. "My wife ——" I begin.

I must have spoken for quite a while; my throat is dry. Dry and closed up. And there, in the warm air, among the neon lights and the people strolling and the evening voices, is my wife, born of my voice, alive and funny and mine as if she were really there and I really saw her. With her glasses and her commas and her disorder and her nerves and her gaiety. With her magnetic ski pants and her cotton in her ears and her glasses and her headaches and her laughs and her games. With her indomitable little body and her heart as big as a house. A big house, crowded and untidy and brave and alive. My home. Four-Eyes, let me come in.

"You must love her like mad," says a voice near me.

What is this creature with yellow hair doing here?

"You made me get a lump in my throat," she says. And means it. She's not a creature; she's Floretta, a girl who is fond of my wife. You're nice, Floretta.

"You'll give me that photograph?" she begs.

Certainly. I will take lots and lots of photographs, one more beautiful than the other, and then I will give you one, Floretta. To put over the cash register. And one of these days I'll bring my wife in for you to see.

"Honestly?" she says. "How wonderful! You promise?"

Yes, I promise. But now I am going home.

The typewriter is silent. The children's rooms are quiet. The lights are out. Where are you, Four-Eyes? Even if I am only a stupid piece of furniture with a pug nose and some complexes, let me come in, please.

I find her in our room, curled up in a chair, nibbling a finger. Mamma mia, she has put on her dress-up glasses. With rhinestones. And a stylish dress. And earrings and the air of being tired to death.

I look at her and inside me a savage wave of gratitude and prayer is released and I would like to do something for her that she might always see with her four eyes, always touch with her funny inky hands and know. I want to make a poem for her, a love poem for my wife.

"Hey!" I say. That is the poem.

"Hey," she breathes. She gets up and spreads out her hands like a lost child. "You didn't come back for ages," she says. And in those few words there is everything I needed to hear.

I open my arms and she comes inside them, my girl for always, with her tiny body and her heart big as a house, and I am not a piece of furniture. I am the master of the house. Tired and happy and frighteningly proud. I don't kiss her; I just hold her against me, inside the old cloud.

"Where've you been?" she asks sleepily, with her face tucked down in the hollow of my arm.

"With a girl," I answer.

I tell her about Floretta. And when I come to the key scene ("Can you let me have a picture of your wife?") she opens both her eyes wide, bigger than the glasses, and then starts to roll on the bed, laughing like ten laughing people. I start to roll myself and that makes twenty of us.

Finally I grab her by the hair.

"What a sight, Bob Taylor," she says. "I'll make a story out of it."

Blast! She's really capable of doing it, you know. She's capable of putting on those blasted magnets and running off to write it immediately. And while I squeeze her winking little face between my hands, I feel with a sharp, suffocating happiness, that tomorrow will be just like today and like yesterday and like ten years ago and like twenty years from now; the crazy fights and the crazy laughs and the tiredness and the merriment and the hard work and the children and us. Our funny, dear, limping marriage. Thanks, Four-Eyes.

"Hi, Dante," I say to her.

"Hi, Bob," she whispers.

She takes off her glasses and my legs are like piecrust.

"And the story?" I murmur, after that soft, amazed silence. "Aren't you going to write it?"

"Tomorrow," her voice replies inside the cloud. "I'll write it tomorrow." END

WHERE CHILDREN HAVE PLAYED

By BYRON BUCK

There is a silence where children have played,
A stillness you feel with your skin,
A quiet so lonely you're almost afraid
Where children have been.

Blocks that lie scattered where no child crawls
Form shifting designs as you stare.
The room is all corners and ceiling and walls
When the children aren't there.

The room is bewitched; the dolls will not wake;
Charmed all the toys you discern.
A spell has been cast that nobody can break
Till the children return.

GOOD SENSE FOR READING FAMILIES: A TRIAL SUBSCRIPTION

As a trial subscriber to the Book-of-the-Month Club you can fully experience—over ▪ short period of time—the unique benefits all members enjoy. There are at least three that are beyond question. First, as a member you share in more than $13,000,000 worth of free books (retail value) now distributed annually as Book-Dividends. This is actually ▪ form of member profit-sharing, similar to that of ▪ consumer co-operative. The offer outlined here really represents "advanced" Book-Dividends earned by the purchase of the books you engage to buy later. Second, you effectually keep yourself from missing, through overbusyness or procrastination, the new books you are most eager to read. (For example, see the list in the coupon.) Third, you get these books, which you will want to buy anyway, at a considerable saving—an average of 20%, plus the Book-Dividends. Thus, membership is plainly good sense for every reading family.

- ✶ The books you agree to buy can be chosen from at least 100 Club Selections and Alternates made available during the year.
- ✶ Each month you receive ▪ full report about the next Book-of-the-Month. If you judge it is a book you would not enjoy, you send back ▪ form (always provided) specifying some other book. Or you may simply say, "Send me nothing."
- ✶ If you continue after this trial subscription, you will receive a Book-Dividend, averaging $6.00 in retail value, with every second book you buy.
- ✶ The editions of these works printed for new members were necessarily limited. If the supply is exhausted, there will be a delay in fulfilling orders—at least four months, since it takes that long to print and bind any added edition of such works. For that reason, immediate acceptance is advisable if you are interested.

JOURNALITIES

Hamlen Hunt

If it weren't for the interesting people, we'd say don't bother looking at this column this month. We read it a moment ago, backward, beginning at the bottom of a blank sheet of paper, and all it does is point Morals, a boring thing to do. To avoid this at the start, let's point to HAMLEN HUNT, a Pretty Author who is not boring. She wrote Marry I Must (on page 72; but why not wait until you come to it, leafing through?). It's a short story about a girl named T. J. (that's all), whose only purpose in going to college is to get a man and home of her own. Well! You can't guess what happens to her! There's a moral to it—you'll see. The author's brief: "Born in New York City, of painter parents, attended Columbia University and Radcliffe College, married a doctor from Mobile, Alabama; we now live near Boston and have two daughters of notable charm."

Betty Hoffman

BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN frequently writes for the JOURNAL and is practically a member of the family, so we needn't pay much attention to her. She is a Wonderful Wife (of lawyer-husband Bob); a Wonderful Mother (of three); a Good Cook (she writes well too). About her inner life she says cats and reactionaries make her nervous and so do horses, only more so. This month she writes about the amazing Teddy Nadler and his family (How America Lives, page 161). Mr. Nadler is the $152,000 TV quiz-show winner whose photographic memory bested that of renowned scholars in many fields of knowledge. Yet, as former laborer Nadler explains, except for answering quiz questions, knowledge alone is useless and will bring you neither love nor fame nor money.

Tina Fredericks

Our photo editor, TINA FREDERICKS, was born in Berlin, Germany, and christened Anna-Katarina. Her father was in the publishing business and frequently brought home dozens of magazines. As a baby she ate a good many of them, she says, and that's how magazines got into her system. Her two daughters, Devon and Stacey, do not eat magazines. Tina is responsible for planning the series of cover photographs depicting episodes in the life of a Young Couple. Watch them. In time they will perform all the ordinary miracles. The miracle on this month's cover is a lopsided birthday cake—his. She is pleased; he is dubious, but he is going to eat it and like it. The moral is obvious. The photographer is MARK SHAW.

OUR READERS WRITE US

Most Fascinating Query of the Month

Victoria, Texas

Dear Editor of Ladies' Home Journal: I am a girl twelve years of age, and I would like to tell you something.

Many girls in this city like the JOURNAL. But most of the stories are for grownups. So we (our club) wrote three stories that we thought would interest twelve-year-olds. But we can't write these stories over and over. So we thought of your magazine. We decided to write you and ask if you could print one of our stories for others to read. Could you? American girls would love it. The titles are:

Shan—a story of a wild mare, tamed by a little boy.

The Courageous Cat—a story of a scientist woman in the African jungle, only a pet panther with her.

The Mysterious Teen-Age Girl—a teen-age girl is invited to the prom by the most popular boy in high school. Her friend, jealous, tries to compete, which causes lots of laughs.

Even if you can't print them, please write.

Sincerely,
CAROLE HALK,
Sec. and Treasurer

Loiter But Not Litter

Griswoldville, Massachusetts

Dear Editors: I thought of your timely and searching article on litterbugs (May JOURNAL) when I came across the following notice posted on the Esplanade in Sydney, Cape Breton:

"Loiter but not litter,
Rest but not molest,
Enjoy but not destroy."

Sincerely,
ADELAIDE R. KEMP

Well-Stocked Library

Streetsville, Ontario

Dear Editors: In June, 1896, the members of our library board included the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL among the list of subscriptions, and our readers have been enjoying it ever since. The only magazine to which our library subscribed before 1896 and which is still coming is the Illustrated London News; but for a while it was dropped, so your JOURNAL has the record.

Sadism in Delivery Rooms?

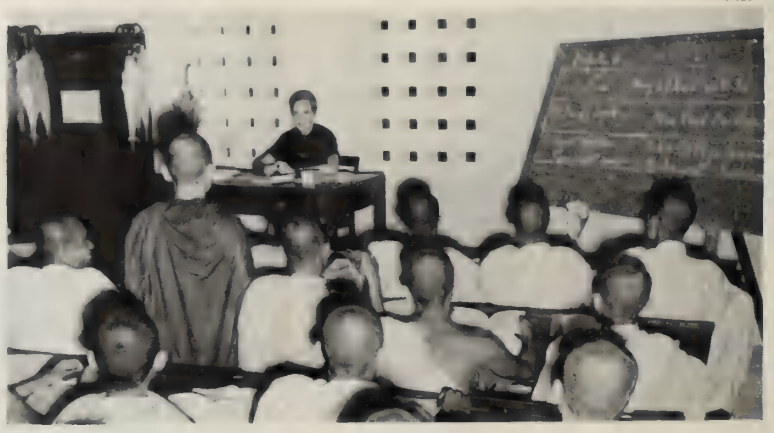
Chicago, Illinois

Dear Editor: I feel compelled to write you this letter asking you to investigate the tortures that go on in modern delivery rooms.

When I first started in my profession, I thought it would be wonderful to help bring a new life into this world. I was and am still shocked at the manner in which a mother-to-be is rushed into the delivery room and strapped down with cuffs around her arms and legs and steel clamps over her shoulders and chest.

At one hospital I know of it is common practice to take the mother right into the delivery room as soon as she is "prepared." Often she is strapped in the lithotomy position, with knees pulled far apart, for as long as eight hours. On one occasion, an obstetrician informed the nurses on duty that he was going to a dinner and that they should slow up things. The young mother was taken into the delivery room and strapped down hand and foot with her legs tied together.

I have seen doctors who have charming examination-table manners show traces of sadism in the delivery room. One I know does cutting and suturing operations without anesthetic because he almost lost a patient from an overdose some years ago. He has nurses use a mask to stifle the patient's outcry.



Great strides have been made in maternal care, but some doctors still say, "Tie them down so they won't give us any trouble." I know that thousands of women are expertly and considerately treated during childbirth for every one that endures cruel treatment. But that one is too many. You of the JOURNAL have long been a champion of women's rights. I feel that an exposé of this type of medical practice would go a long way to aiding child-bearing women.

The monks and I.

Richmond, Indiana

Dear Editors: On a hot, sultry day half a world away in Phnom Penh, Cambodia, a young shaven-headed Buddhist monk named Prum Chhon is sitting in his saffron-colored robe, balancing a pad of paper on his knee. He is struggling with the hardest job he has ever tackled—writing a letter.

This painstaking epistle is written to me, wife of an American architect and mother of four children. For I had the

HOME TO THANKSGIVING

ARE OUR TEEN-AGERS SO DUMB?

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

Social scientists at Purdue University have been studying American high-school pupils for years, using the sampling method to obtain from students themselves, in answer to questionnaires, or in letters from pupils, signed and unsigned, a picture of American high-school students. Their first report, issued as a book entitled The American Teen-ager, and published during the current year, is startling in many respects, discouraging in some ways, and encouraging in others.

This reader of the report was far more horrified than its authors appear to be to learn from the answers of high-school pupils, whether to specific questions or in more or less spontaneous letters, that the typical high-school student misspells even the simplest words, has not apparently the foggiest notion of grammar or syntax, has failed to learn from "social studies" even the most elementary facts about the American Constitution and American history, geography and science.

The height of illiteracy is struck by a high-school junior who writes in regard to his problems, "It seems like I never have nothing to do and when I got to do it, it bores me." One can only ask (which the authors don't): How did that boy ever pass grade after grade through eleven years of schooling? Why with his ignorance and boredom should he be in high school at all, instead of learning a trade by practice?

The boy is not typical. But there is hardly one communication from pupils that is written in correct grammar without egregious misspelling. Examples (a high-school senior): "The things that make me mad is ——" "I have tried many remmetics [remedies]." "Talking won't do no good." . . . "It worked out perfect."

A senior-high-school girl, complaining of parents, says, "[They] won't let children make up their own mines. Parents don't stop and think that maybe there children don't want to make there career in the same field." I don't know what "career" this young woman hopes for. But this again is typical. In speaking of their futures they invariably speak about "careers," never about work, and all of them expect to be able to pick and choose what they will do. A minor writes, "I'm still a miner." (Perhaps he also hopes to make up his own mine.) Another writes, "Now matter" for no matter, and remarks "as time gos by."

"I don't get to good a grade. . . . I trie to study," explains one youth, complaining of continual noise at home from TV, as does another who writes, "My school work is beging neglected and my marks show this neglegence. . . . Time [watching TV] go by so fast . . . many good as well as eductionally programs on . . . I'm shore many people of my age have the same handicap."

Written by D. H. Radler from the findings of the group headed by H. H. Remmers, the report is filled with interpretations and deductions which doubtless represent the sentiments of the group as a whole. I say "sentiments" advisedly, because the authors are not devoid of their own convictions or prejudices in interpreting the material. They express their own shock at some of the things they find, and are curiously indifferent to other things, finding them more humorous than serious. They appear to be far more concerned, for instance, about the adolescents' attitude toward civil liberties, sex, parents and future career than with their actual accomplishments for their age.

Because there are many complaints of not knowing how to study, the social scientists suggest that a course on study methods might be added to the high-school curriculum. But since when have elementary- and high-school teachers been unable to guide and help their pupils to study in the courses they teach? Or are they actually permitted to do so?

How about the teen-agers' knowledge of American history? Ten per cent of the cross section queried thought Lincoln wrote the Declaration of Independence. Of science? Over one third thought the earth the center of the universe. Of geography? Seventy-five per cent think Venezuela is south of the Equator.

A junior in California writes, to the evident satisfaction of the investigators, as far as her views are concerned, "Another one of my dislikes is the segregation in the southern school. Our Constitution says CONTINUED ON PAGE 14

Wilson's new Tender Made Ham loves Log Cabin Syrup!

NEW HAM

—makes ham an any-day meal. Wilson Tender Made Slice 'n' Serve Ham is solid lean meat—boned, rolled, no fat or waste. Meal size (1½ to 3 lbs.). Fully cooked—serve whole, heated through, or slice for sandwiches, frying, or broiling.

NEW GLAZE

—easiest, tastiest, prettiest ever with Log Cabin Syrup! See recipe below.

Log Cabin's "Glaze of Glory!" No brown sugar fuss! Just pour one cup of Log Cabin over ham, pop it into a 325-degree oven for 1 to 1¼ hours. Baste frequently. Log Cabin seals in all the ham flavor. The real maple sugar blended into Log Cabin makes it taste extra good.

New Ham Steak Fixin'—Melt two tbs. butter in skillet with one cup Log Cabin, pinch of dry mustard. Simmer 5 min. Add cooked sweet potatoes and turn for 5 min. Add thick slice of Wilson's new Tender Made Ham and canned apples. Heat 10 min., turning ham once.

erfect with Pancakes—Crisp Wilson Bacon curls with golden Log abin Syrup. Wilson Bacon has that tantalizing taste that comes from ardwood smoking. Perch bacon atop pancakes and cover with Log abin's maple goodness—blended with real maple sugar!

Wonderful with Waffles—New waffle idea! Add crumbled, crisped Wilson Bacon to waffle batter for that sweet-smoke flavor all through your waffles! Put more bacon on top, pour on lots of Log Cabin. You can't get enough of that real maple flavor.

Wilson Bacon loves Log Cabin, too!

that all men are created equal but the way thing are today, well, it a discrace. Just because thier skin is black doesn't mean thier different than white. They want an education, home, job just like anybody else." The authors do not catch her up on confusing the Declaration of Independence with the Constitution.

On the other hand, a sophomore in a North Carolina high school writes one of the most literate and cogently argued letters of those published, in favor of segregation. It contains not one misspelled word and only a very minor grammatical error. He argues that the Supreme Court decision, in his opinion—"I may be wrong"—has usurped the legislative power.

Clearly his views reflect the opinion of the white community in which he lives. But if his letter is at all representative of the literacy achieved in an all-white Southern school, and the girl's typical of the literacy of a California mixed school, the letters taken together do not successfully argue the case for desegregation.

In summing up the answers received on the subject of civil liberties, the researchers express real shock. They find that the typical teen-ager believes himself and large masses of adult people incapable of deciding what's best; that behavior can and should be scrutinized by police, using wiretapping; and that he endorses censorship of books, newspapers, magazines and other media. Twenty-five per cent would do away with warrants for search of private homes; one third believe some public assemblages should be prohibited; 13 per cent would restrict by law religious belief and worship.

It destroys one's nerves to be amiable every day to the same human being. DISRAELI

I find it dangerous to draw deductions from answers that must be made by "yes" or "no," without explanation or qualification, and significant that the researchers did not query the pupils at all about one item in the Bill of Rights (in the famous Fifth Amendment), namely, that "no person . . . [can be] deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

But how can young people be expected to defend the constitutional American liberties, or even recognize them as such, if they confuse the Declaration of Independence with the Emancipation Proclamation; do not recognize a slight paraphrase of the Constitution when they see it, and quite evidently have never been taught constitutional origins and background, or learned why the eighteenth-century men who wrote it wished to curb and check the powers of government?

Books, magazines and newspapers air the complaints of citizens and educators that American children, despite lavish expenditures on new luxury schools, are not getting a proper education at all.

In this debate it is clear that educators and citizens do not even agree on what should be the purpose of primary and secondary education. Is it to impart knowledge? If so, what knowledge? What factual knowledge ought an American child and adolescent have acquired before he is eighteen years old? Is its purpose to develop the individual personality and foster rugged self-reliance or to gear the child and youth to satisfactory conformity with society as it exists and is likely to develop? Is it to prepare youth for further studies in college or university, or to train them for an immediate vocation—and to do both in the same school?

American education is at cross purposes in the exact meaning of that phrase. It is attempting to do contradictory things with contradictory aims while, at the same time,

Does your child have trouble reading?

To read with ease, a child must read with understanding. But all too often, children fail to read well for the simple reason that they don't know the definition or recognize the spelling of the printed words they see.

You can correct this, and help your child now and for years to come, by encouraging the use of a dictionary at home . . . not an adult dictionary, but one compiled especially for children's needs. Ask at your department, book, or stationery store for Webster's Elementary Dictionary, the first ever written specifically for children in the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh grades. vastly extending the numbers of children and adolescents it is keeping in school. All but a small fraction of our young population now go to high school, and an ever-increasing number attend, or expect to attend, colleges or other institutions for further learning. If measured in terms of years spent in school, we are the most educated people in the world. Are we the best educated?

The researchers repeatedly betray their own biases. A majority of high-school students (57 per cent), and a much larger one (72 per cent) of college students, queried by Time agreed that "Democracy depends fundamentally on the existence of free enterprise." The authors comment, "The experts disagree with this statement because they are aware that individual rights [italics theirs] are more fundamental to democracy than free enterprise.

It is here that this reader agrees with the pupils and disagrees with the "experts," whoever they may be. (How can anyone be an "expert" on such a question?) Is not opportunity freely to engage in economic enterprise and accumulate and be secure in property also an individual right? And do the authors know of any country in which free business enterprise has been taken over in all sectors of the economy and other freedoms retained? "Our students," comment the authors, "seem to be poorly informed about the difference between economic and political systems." Our "typical" students appear to be poorly informed about nearly everything under the sun. But if they have a hunch that political and economic systems reflect each other, they show more sense than their critics.

Actually, answers to specific questions reveal that from 11 per cent to 62 per cent share one or another Socialist idea—that government should abolish inheritances, own basic industries, control railroads and mines, run all banks and credit; that the price of goods should be limited by the cost of production; that large idle estates should be divided among the poor for farming.

The researchers apparently see no danger in the prevalence of these ideas, and object to the prevailing view of the students that Communism and Fascism amount to the same thing, again saying that "the experts" think differently. But are not both as they have developed forms of national socialism? Can students unable to make even simple differentiations, or articulately to express themselves even on personal problems, be expected to make intelligent differentiations between various forms of the totalitarian state?

The researchers display other biases. They publish a really moving letter from a girl who, wishing to be popular with the boys, got a reputation (apparently deserved) for being all too easy, but who, after great effort, had decided against permitting any kind of sexual play and has finally found that although this attitude has limited her range of dates it has not precluded companionship with the best and cleanest boys. The researchers comment, "She might have profited from being taught that sex experience, if it stops short of intercourse, is conducive to growth and valuable as preparation for marriage." Just who should have taught her that promiscuous necking, if only interrupted at the critical point, is valuable in any way? Her mother? Her teachers? How many cases of rape rise from the frustrations of such interruptions? And how many high-school pregnancies from going one very short step too far?

The researchers have discovered that typical American teen-agers have strong religious leanings without being dogmatic, that "Don't be deterred by the visiting child who says, 'At home I don't have to do that.'"

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

The neighbors' children: visiting angels, or imps?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

The would-be guest can be told cheerfully, "We'd love to have you for supper, but it will have to be another time."

I want to bring up some common difficulties parents have with neighborhood children and adults. One mother asks, "What's the best treatment for the neighbor child who flatly disobeys a rule such as 'No playing with the power mower'? Do we scold or send him home or speak to mamma? What about the gang of ten-year-olds who stay around for half an hour's sport, leaving wrecked trikes and wagons in their wake? Do we stand guard or use a club? What about house rules such as 'No building sets in the living room'? We can't keep on sending children home. Or can we?"

Another writes: "What on earth do you do about other people's children? I don't know where my duty lies. I attended a teachers' college and took a lot of psychology and I love children. They always love me, too, no matter how I treat them, because I am fair. But when my three (ages six, four and one) are quietly sleeping or playing elsewhere, I hate answering the door time after time—or worse, having everybody walk in on me without knocking. I just wish I could in some way, have other children for one or two hours at a time. We have lived in a half-dozen communities in our eight years of marriage and have had the same trouble in all of them. Parents do not know where their children are or what they do because they do not watch them. It seems they just don't want to be bothered with them.

"Last year in another city, two little girls came before my children got up and stayed till we sent them home at night. Apparently their mother served no lunch at their house. I did not feed them, though they always asked me to. I had tried that before and ended up feeding certain children five times a week. I cannot manage or teach my children when there are others around all the time.

"If our garage is not locked, they help themselves. Then we can't find anything when we want it—toys, fishing equipment, lawn tools.

"I have been out four times this morning to tell a little neighbor boy to stop throwing rocks (from his yard, and both his parents home) at my daughter who is minding her own business in our yard.

"Today I missed my fountain pen. I have to lock all doors whenever I go out to hang clothes or weed the garden. I have to watch the children when they are inside. This is the third pen taken in this manner. Then I went outside and the spokes of two tricycles had been broken badly. Since my son is away today, the gang wants to borrow his new skates. I told them they could today, but never again. I can't know who destroys things when so many use them. We can't afford to buy toys for the whole neighborhood. Surely that should be understood by parents who can't replace the things their children have broken."

I can tell how harassed this mother feels by the way she jumps from subject to subject.

These letters bring up a number of angles worth considering.

There is no doubt that many children are not very welcome in their own homes. A mother who feels kindly toward children finds a lot of waifs on her hands. And one who gives them a good time draws them like a Pied Piper. Parents who keep their children well supplied with equipment—bikes, wagons, swings, sandbox—find they have created a crowded amusement park in their own back yard. (It was that way in our yard on Cold Spring Street in New Haven when I was growing up.)

It's not all disadvantage in running a popular home. It helps to teach your own child, particularly if he's an only one, how to get along with all kinds—not just how to put up with them, but how to enjoy them. Some of your own popularity and the popularity of the equipment rubs off on your child. In the long run he can't get very far in the world with reflected popularity, but still it may send him off to a good start and make it easier for him to build his own popularity.

A great advantage of having the children come to your house is that you can keep better track of who your own are playing with and what's happening. If I had to choose between having my child always elsewhere or having the whole mob in my yard, I'd much prefer the latter. (Perhaps that's partly because I'm not a mother and wouldn't have to take the consequences.)

There are simple rules which, if the parent sticks to them consistently, should avoid some of the problems raised in the letters. Of course they would differ in different families. I myself would make it plain, for instance, that my children don't come out to play until 9 A.M. when chores are finished, and that visitors don't come in before that. I'd also have a rule that my young children come in for supper at 5:30 and that the others are expected to go home at that time.

For families which are extremely popular or in which the children are always asking the mother if a visitor can come to supper, right in front of the visitor, a simple rule is: No guests to be invited unless mother and child agree to it in private, before anything is said to the guest. At all other times, the would-be guest can be told cheerfully, "We'd love to have you for supper, dear, but it will have to be another time."

If bold neighbor children were making nuisances of themselves in the garage, I'd close the doors, have a very firm rule that nobody was to go in, and make a big issue of it the few times the law was disobeyed. There's not only a lot of damageable stuff in most garages—there are usually several poisonous substances, too, nowadays.

I think a mother is entitled to be very definite about when she wants neighbor children inside her house, in which rooms,

All entries must be from a bona fide mother or contain the name of a mother to whom a prize could be awarded. Prizes will be awarded only to mothers. Duplicate prizes will be awarded in case of ties. doing what. When young neighbors try to get in at unwanted times, there are a half-dozen good excuses the lady of the house can give, like, "Helen is busy right now" or "Helen will be out in a little while."

The question of whether neighborhood children should be allowed to use the family's playthings, with the greater likelihood of damage, would be answered in the affirmative by most parents. They want their own children to share and to share graciously. And most playthings are subject to damage when used continually. But this answer doesn't cover the situation, for instance, when a group of older boys appear on the scene in a troublemaking mood and start deliberately to abuse the equipment. Then the parent has to come out and firmly interfere.

When other children come to ask to play with the possessions of a child who is not at home and who therefore can't protect his things against misuse, it seems fair all around for the parent to say, "I'm sorry, but Jackie isn't here. Why don't you come back tomorrow morning?"

As far as general principles are concerned, I think the most obvious one is that a mother is entitled to lay down the rules for all the children playing on her premises and that she doesn't need to be deterred by a visitor who says, "At home I don't have to do that." What do you do if a visitor deliberately disobeys a rule? I think that calling his mother is, for general use, an inferior method, because it implies that you aren't capable of managing him yourself—you're just a tattletale. In the long run he'll respect you much more and behave better if you show him that you feel quite confident in managing him. Of course there are exceptions, when the misbehavior is very serious and something that his own parents would definitely want to know about. Sending a visitor home is often a logical and effective punishment, but I think it is best saved as a last resort, for occasional use. It, too, implies that you've given up trying to control him, at least for today, and this weakens your own discipline. In theory, the most effective method—just as in the case of your own child—is to show by your assured and firm approach that you can make him behave and can even make him like it. But of course in actuality this is the hardest to accomplish.

How firm or how disagreeable is the parent entitled to become in making neighbor children behave? All of us can remember in our own childhoods certain adult neighbors who were particularly unpleasant. We hated them and were prejudiced against their children. Or we remember adults who were easily provoked, and, although we were generally law-abiding, we never lost an opportunity to tease them or make trouble for them. On the other hand, we can usually remember people who were strict but whose strictness we respected, especially if they showed that they liked us. There isn't too much connection between strictness and unpopularity. In fact, the too lenient, the timid neighbor will often be scorned or taken advantage of. The crux of the matter is the spirit with which the adult operates. If he is basically friendly and self-assured, he can get away with reasonably firm rules and have them obeyed. But if he acts as if he is expecting to have trouble, if he has a chip on his shoulder, if he's cross to begin with, he'll either be resented or persecuted or scorned, and his children will bear some of the brunt of these feelings.

The principles are the same that apply in the parent's management of his own children or in the officer's control over his men or in the executive's relationship with his subordinates. The leader who is agreeable but who isn't sure of what he wants or is afraid to ask for it runs a confused, inefficient outfit. The individuals under him are uneasy and demanding. The leader who is harsh, unfriendly, yet capable, keeps things in order, but he is heartily disliked. The leader who is unsure of himself and expresses it in an irritable, mistrustful attitude toward his charges usually has the worst organization of all. His subordinates take delight in living up to his worst expectations. They don't want to get along with him. They want to tease and provoke him. When he becomes punitive, it doesn't chasten them. They feel unfairly treated and react with more hostility.

So good leadership, I think, always has to combine the element of confidence in one's right to lead, a genuine liking for those being led, and definite ideas of what to expect from them. Then subordinates not only respect the leader and do their best, but they enjoy it too.

This brings us back to the woman who wrote the second frantic letter. She isn't having trouble with other people's children simply because she can't think up some sensible rules herself or because she hasn't read the right articles. The problem must lie in her own feelings. Something is making it impossible for her to protect herself from being imposed upon. Before we try to guess what her trouble is, we'll have to admit that there are always plenty of adults and children in every community who are ready to impose. Some of them are bold and completely insensitive. It seems as if you have to fend them off with a club. At least you have to speak very frankly and with a loud voice to be understood. Other people impose in a more sensitive manner. Unconsciously they are watching to be sure they don't go far enough to make you really angry. But they keep inching up when they sense they can get away with it (something like "Still pond, no more moving"). I guess it's more honest to say that almost all of us will take advantage of a too-willing victim. If he will always cheerfully run an errand for us or loan us his clothes and money or take care of our child, we will have to be extraordinarily scrupulous to resist the temptation to impose.

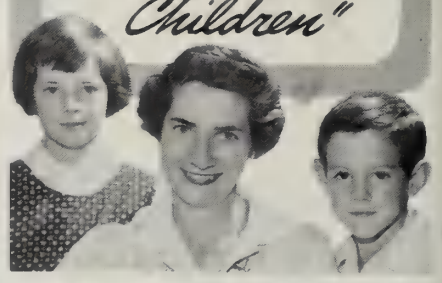
Some people never get imposed on, some people get imposed on all the time, and the rest of us know how to protect ourselves most of the time but get imposed on occasionally when we are caught off guard.



A very few individuals enjoy being willing slaves. It gives them a feeling of being appreciated which they can achieve in no other way. Most people who get imposed on, though, resent it, but they are afraid to resist.

The person easily imposed on is usually a sensitive individual who has been brought up close to his parents but in excessive awe of their disapproval. They, in training him, have relied heavily on the threat of not loving him. Instead of simply saying, "You mustn't be impolite or selfish," they have implied, "We won't love you any more (or nobody will love you) if you are impolite or selfish." I don't mean that the parents have necessarily used these words. They may have given him the feeling of being rejected merely by their look of severe disapproval. (They aren't just disliking the behavior, they are disliking the child.) This is a frightening feeling to a child who is close to his parents, especially in early childhood, because he senses that his entire security depends on their continued love. He gets mad at his parents occasionally, as any child does, perhaps more so, but any anger expressed toward them brings a shocked condemnation which is particularly disturbing. So the child grows up with an exaggerated fear of disapproval or anger, an excessive need to please, and an inability to stand up for his own rights. As an adult he or she accepts inferior merchandise without outward protest, lets himself in for tough assignments in the office or on a committee, is easily pressured by door-to-door salesmen, and by relatives and neighbors wanting loans of money or equipment or food. He fumes and kicks himself afterward, but the next time he finds himself saying, "Of the Hitchcock Chair

2057-1D

The Boston Rocker was the first rocker ever made . . . way back about 1800. This reproduction faithfully copies the high gilded top rail, the slender tapering back spindles, and the low-slung saucer seat of an early model.

The original Hitchcock also dates back 100 years or more, and is here exactingly reproduced in fine detail. Even the genuine rush seat is hand-woven, just as it was done by the Colonists themselves.

John Hancock Ladder Back
2022-1

The high, braced comb-back, with its carved head rest, and the sweeping armrail of this comfortable rocker are characteristic of the many and varied Windsors of pre-Revolutionary times.

With its four slightly curved back slats, sausage-and-ring turnings, and its hand-woven flagg seat, the John Hancock Ladder Back is obviously of colonial New England origin . . . and is also available in manor house armchair style.

TAKEN FROM COLLIER'S, 3/11/50—BY HANK KETCHAM

"Ever see such nervous people?"

"We've learned what happens to young boys. . . . A four-and-a-half year-old blonde named Cleo (in nursery school) had had her eye on Johnny. On Monday she gave him a penny. On Tuesday she gave him a Davey Crockett button. On Wednesday she pushed him into a box and broke his arm in two places. Clearly this girl means business, and I think Johnny should keep the heck away from her. I asked him recently whatever happened to Cleo and he replied solemnly, 'I don't know, but I hear she's going to have to sit in a corner for the rest of her life.'"

Jean Kerr, the mother of Johnny and three other sons, all under seven, has written a record of their pursuits in a therapeutic book called PLEASE DON'T EAT THE DAISIES (Doubleday). I giggled all through it and insisted on reading passages aloud. How the four boys will feel about it fifteen years from now is another matter.

R. C. Hutchinson fans will be happy to know that he has a new novel out, MARCH NINTH (Rinehart). For those who haven't yet sampled Hutchinson, let me say that here is a writer of the James Gould Cozzens, Henry James, Joseph Conrad school, whose novels are long, carefully woven, intense; they always have considerable suspense, built up, as in life, on a gradual disclosure of persons and of motives. Like Conrad, Hutchinson always places his stories against strange moody backgrounds. March Ninth is set in Yugoslavia, and although a novel of today, its motivation lies in a terrific occurrence of the past, a bloody reprisal of the Germans against the Partisans, and the undying resentment of a whole village.

(I. A. R. Wylie used much the same theme in The Undefeated, about a French village.)

Another fine book about Yugoslavia is THE HERETIC, by Sir Fitzroy MacLean (Harper). This is a biography of Tito, the report of a dedicated Communist, from secret agent to national leader. MacLean, sent over by Churchill, was close to Tito during the war; he apparently knows him well now; and if anyone can grasp the subtleties of Balkan politics, it should be he.

But the most important political book, perhaps, of our generation is THE NEW CLASS: An Analysis of the Communist System, by Miloran Djilas (Frederick Praeger). Here is a long-time Communist, close friend and adviser of Tito, who came to realize through his own practical experience, and through a study of its forty-year trial, that Communism is never going to gain its professed aims in any country. Thrown into prison by Tito for expressing these (to Tito) traitorous revelations, Djilas wrote this new book, this amazingly keen and honest re-evaluation of Communism, and consented to its publication even though he knew it might cost him his life.

But to get back to America. Here are two appealing country books, not brand-new, but sure to be popular.

First, Leonard Hall A COUNTRY YEAR (Harper), a leisurely personal account of his one-family experimental farm, Possum Trot, in the Missouri Ozarks. It starts in March. . . . "Can you remember it—the smell of wood smoke on a frosty March night?"

Second, BEYOND THE CABIN DOOR, by Walter Collins O'Kane, straight from the heart of New Hampshire, a reminder that there is woodland still, and peace and quiet and beauty, if only we'd have the patience to stay with it. (Richard Smith, West Rindge, N.H.)

Children's Book Week comes this month. "Explore With Books" is the theme (Geophysical Year), and if you're lucky you will be able to attend one of the book fairs, in Orlando, Florida; Little Rock, Arkansas; Detroit, New York, Chicago, Washington, Cleveland, Minneapolis; or Hampton, Virginia. Information, Children's Book Council, 50 W. 53rd St., N.Y. 19.

A very good book (I hear) on teaching reading is THE WRITING ROAD TO READING, by Romalda Spalding, with Walter Spalding (Morrow). Mrs. Spalding has had twenty years of teaching, and has devised a phonic method taught through writing, with which she has had extraordinary results.

Another new approach, this time to the retarded child, is through musical therapy. Retardation is not a barrier to musical response, it seems, and it has been demonstrated that by using that intact area of response the child can learn, and can adapt. This has been worked out under the aegis of the Musicians Emergency Fund, 113 W. 57th St., New York 19. It bears looking into. Write to that organization and, if possible, help them by a donation toward work in this very important field.

BELOW THE SALT (Doubleday) is Thomas Costain's latest historical novel, and to my taste almost his best. It concerns Eleanor, the lost princess of Brittany who lived in the day of King John and Magna Charta; but it opens in the present with American Senator O'Rawn. The deft handling, through which the present and the past merge, suggests a robust Berkeley Square. A provocative, imaginative book.

If you like to read a book that gives you the feeling that you've had a good long talk with a person brimming over with ideas, someone who expresses himself uncommonly well and occasionally puts into words some cloudy thought you may even have had yourself, then take up a book of essays. It's a term that has gone out of fashion, but a style that is having a wholesome revival.

Read Clifton Fadiman's ANY NUMBER CAN PLAY (World). This is a stimulating collection of short pieces about puns, books, real-estate agents, highbrows, name-dropping, and a good many more serious items to try your teeth on.

(Speaking of highbrows, in Israel they call them Phudnicks. A Nudnick is a frightful bore, a Phudnick is a Nudnick with a Ph.D.)

THE FINE ART OF READING, by Lord David Cecil (Bobbs-Merrill), moves along in the same groove, but farther back in time. Lord Cecil writes about Jane Austen, Joseph Conrad (a wonderful chapter), Hazlitt, women letter writers.

"Letter writing is a private art," he says, "and private life is woman's native and triumphant sphere of achievement. . . . Private life is half of life; and, in some respects, the more important half, for it has to do with more intimate and individual strains in human character." Cecil is the author of Melbourne.

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

The dogs enjoy the last bit of balmy air. We dream of Thanksgiving and rich, savory turkey.

This is the still time in New England. The sound of silos being filled is gone. The cicadas and crickets gradually diminish after August. Brooks run quietly, now the rains are over. They ease into their narrow beds as if they, too, were readying for the long cold. A few late leaves drift down silently in the hazy autumnal air.

It is, to many of us, a resting season after the brisk October chores. The garden is put to bed, the lawn stays put instead of springing up overnight. It does not need mowing at all. The jams and jellies are tucked away, the cabbages and squash safe in the coolest part of the cellar. Some thrifty farmers have already stacked pine boughs against their houses as insulation; the white buildings look like Christmas cards, edged in green.

The valley is soft with haze, and people talk about whether this is really Indian summer or whether it is not. Nobody ever agrees, but everybody is pleasant about it, not at one another's throats. After all, it is a mild day; we all agree on that.

Erma, who helps take care of Stillmeadow, now decides this is the time to get ready. But I feel this smoky-blue weather might go on all the rest of my life. The sun seems to stand still over the hills. The air has a good smell. And I cannot believe in the reality of winter. When I go down for gas for the car, I consult about antifreeze. And this shows how feckless I am. I know we can have a sudden drop around Thanksgiving or just after, plus a blizzard. But I mentally put it off.

Instead of taking steps, I am apt to wander down to the pond and see the way the pale sky falls in it. The water at dusk is dark amber, and the once-vocal frogs are down below somewhere. If I dip my hand in the water, my fingers feel as if I had laid them in the freezer for a minute. But the water has such a cool and cleansing touch that I wish I dared swim just once more.

The cockers and Irish always act according to the season too. The wild skirmishes of October are done with. Now they bask, and it almost seems as if they are soaking up the last balmy sunny air to store against the dark months coming. Perhaps they have a feeling, perhaps it is instinct, but they lie in the sun on the south side of the house now. Even Holly is less active, and for an Irish to be less active is news.

The wild folk are getting ready for winter. Squirrels are still busy under the nut trees, and I wonder how they remember where they bury their hoards. I do not think any naturalist or scientist can ever answer that question of why. Why do they know? Why do the birds at my feeding station eat more and come oftener? The air is mellow. What threat is there that drives the migratory ones away and brings the winter birds close to the house for the peanut butter and suet and sunflower seeds and grain? The world is full of mysteries, but this is a special one, for their little heads are not big enough to house a forecasting. The whole weather bureau with all its mechanics has trouble forecasting the path of one hurricane. But the birds know.

Country folk tend to forecast weather by the birds. When they gather on the telephone wires and circle around, we know. It will be cold tomorrow. The birds are going to migrate. When birds circle lazily in the sky, it is mild and will be. But when they skim over the house, wings wide, we bring in wood and check the storm lanterns. Of course it is the movements of air that make our weather, and the birds know it first.

Birds also remember. Last summer we had a pheasant who came to the feeder daily. I named her Lydia. She grew to be so tame that, like all secure people, she became imperious, and would climb up the back steps (if the dogs were in the house) to tell me her meal was five minutes overdue.

This year she came back, with five small babies. They ate seed, they drank from the birdbath, they took dust baths in the sand under the feeder. She kept a motherly eye on them, and when she heard a car coming down the road, she gave them a command. Unlike most children, they did not say, "Oh, let me just stay here five minutes more." They simply pattered after her on their toothpick legs.

It made me wonder why bird children could be so well behaved. Discipline no problem at all. Mamma knew best. At the same time we had a pair of quail. Papa walked ahead, mamma behind.

When he felt it was safe, he gave ■ melodious command, and she came rushing. When he decided they should go, he said so, in a firm tone, and they went. And as I watched them skipping along, I wondered whether it wasn't ■ very fine idea for the man to make the decisions and the little woman to follow. I myself would go along with that as a good basis. Not that I wish to raise the controversial sex battle flag. But I noticed that papa watched constantly, led the way, took the hazard of invading new territory. Protected her and, I may say, worried. She was quite tranquil. He took the hard end. And naturally, he would get shot, in hunting season, while she worried with the babies.

By hunting season, we hope the small ones are big enough to run. The bright ones run faster. The slower ones get confused. So it may be this is the way to make the species more intelligent. But I, of course, do not want Lydia's least one to be shot. And with game birds, one always has a problem. If they get to like the way you talk and what you say, they will walk right up to any human, and the next time they may get that bullet in the heart.

My attempt to maintain a kind of U.N. deal with the birds is silly. On the one hand, I recognize my special ones, and they know me. Then I am afraid for them and get impersonal. In the end, we are both thoroughly confused.

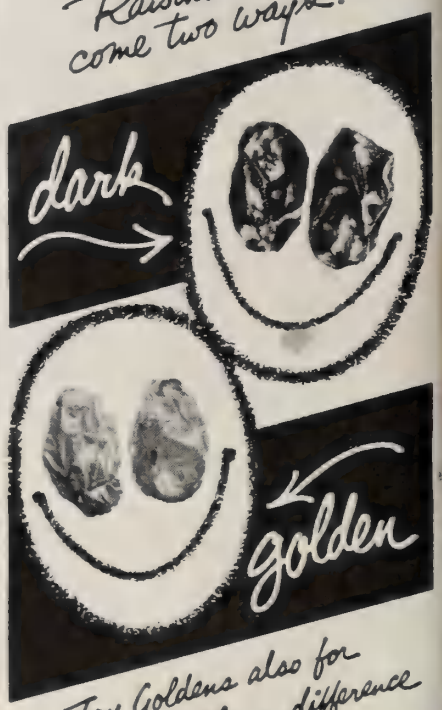
Religion In American Life Program

WORSHIP TOGETHER THIS WEEK



Thanksgiving is our particularly national feast day. In my childhood, turkey was for Thanksgiving, and we never tasted it any other time of year. We dreamed of it, rich, brown, savory with chestnut stuffing. Nowadays, all the Thanksgiving specialties are available year round, but the spirit of the family gathering has never lost its special value. The crisply brown turkey and the ruby cranberry sauce and the fluffy snowy mashed potatoes and the glazed onions, these are all traditional. In our family, the mashed turnips are traditional, too, although the children are not too fond of turnips.

But the year we had peas instead, such an outcry arose. Where are the turnips, we have always had turnips! Well, you don't like turnips, we said. But you can't go around changing Thanksgiving, they said. Since Jill and I both consider turnips a fine vegetable, we went back to them happily.

Getting ready for Thanksgiving weekend involves cooking ahead as much as possible. And I feel it does no harm to have ■ good baked ham on hand to alternate with the turkey or pinch-hit for an extra meal. A casserole of sweet potatoes may be done the day before you use it. I like the way my friend Eva does it. To make this dish, you cook scrubbed sweet potatoes in boiling water until tender, then drain (save the water) and peel and slice thin. Arrange ■ layer in a greased casserole or baking dish. Sprinkle with nutmeg, cinnamon and thin slices of lemon. Top with more sweet potatoes, more spice and lemon until the dish is full. Meanwhile, make ■ sauce of ½ cup brown sugar, ½ cup white sugar, 1 cup of the potato water, 3 teaspoons cornstarch dissolved in 2 tablespoons water. Cook until thick and smooth, stirring constantly. Pour over the potatoes. Dot with butter or margarine. Bake in a moderate oven (350° F.) ¾ hour.

"I reduced for keeps"

"That is why I recommend the Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan to all my overweight friends," writes Miss Rose Lee Grace, New York Nutritionist

"On November 26, 1954 I weighed 224 pounds—far above normal."

"Several months later I was 61 pounds lighter and happier."

"TODAY I am even 7 pounds lighter than when I finished the Knox Plan."

READ WHAT MISS GRACE WROTE TO US

"I am a restaurant meal planner. I know nutrition and I know that reducing and then gaining weight is a vicious cycle. I've been through it in the past. So when I read the Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan book, with its Choice-of-Foods Charts, I realized it could really help me get down to normal weight and stay that way. I could see that it was safe, natural and practical. And it involved nothing but good food. I love good eating.

"I found it was easy and actually pleasant to follow, at home and at restaurants. I ate almost everything I like, including desserts, with three meals a day and sometimes between-meal snacks. My job is not an easy one, and as my weight went down I felt no loss of energy. I felt better, physically and mentally.

"Well, a few months later I was 61 pounds lighter.

"And now comes the amazing part of it! Without conscious effort I had acquired the easy habit of balanced eating, without giving up any of my favorite foods or the pleasures of eating. Today, instead of being fat again, I am actually 7 pounds lighter than when I finished eating-by-plan."

SLIM DOWN FOR LIFE. Miss Grace's happy experience with the Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan is typical of hundreds of thousands. Whether you would like to be 10 pounds lighter or 70 pounds lighter, the Knox Plan, different in many ways from any other, may help you—without hunger, discomfort or loss of energy. We suggest you read Miss Grace's statement again, then send for the free book below.

One of the keys to this modern reducing plan is the pleasant habit of drinking Knox Unflavored Gelatine in your favorite beverage. At your grocer's in the 4-envelope family size or the 32-envelope economy size.

The cockers and Irish have almost finished digging up the yard. Sister and Jonquil obviously talked it over and felt they might leave further excavation of the terrace. After all, it is not hot any more, Sister said sensibly. So they went off to the back yard where there are plenty of sticktights to get into. Also burs.

Holly, the pure color of autumn herself, lies by the old well with her collection of favored tin cans, old galoshes, a bath towel and a pink rabbit (left by a summer visitor). When she decides to come in to see what's cooking, she chooses a treasure to carry in, and offers it to me as if it were a diamond bracelet. And the way I feel about Holly, I prefer an old galosh with her love to a bracelet any day!

"Holly Relaxes by the Wisteria Well" would be the magazine caption. I have noted that all the famous people who are pictured in magazines are forever relaxing. They relax by the swimming pool. Relax at night clubs. (How do they?) Relax on front porches (country touch). Or just relax with their family, barbecuing steaks for twenty. I get the horrid feeling that if you are a famous writer, actress, painter, movie star, TV star, opera star, you simply relax. They must, now and then, do something, one would think. Even the great political figures relax with four or more grandchildren. This is a good trick. We cannot relax with just two grandchildren. We find them charming, wonderful, burning with genius, and a good many other things. But not relaxing.

Twilights are violet now, from the smoke of late-burning leaves. Days grow short, night closes in swiftly. The change of one season into another is such a gradual thing that there is never a point at which you say, "This is the beginning." The tide of summer has ebbed, but just when did it reach the true low, and the tide of autumn move against the valleys? And now, as I walk in the crisp smoky-sweet dusk, the great bitter tide of winter begins to rise, a ripple here, a foam of frost there.

But tomorrow will be fair, so we still may eat lunch in the Quiet Garden (quiet indeed now without the golden hum of bees). Tomorrow we shall be thankful for sun and soft air and gentle skies.

And for love and laughter which know no season!

TIME MAKES ALL PEOPLE NECROPHILIACS

By MERRILL MOORE

Ultimately we come to love the dead;
They replace the living in whose stead
They replace morons and maniacs
And even quiet people. If you love
A flower, lily, peony or rose,
Soon it dies, its petals wilt and fall.

You may have the memory of it
Or a jar where dried rose petals fit
To make a spicy-scented potpourri
Of odors that were roses yesterday.

And so it is with living flesh and blood,
Men and women, floating on the flood
Of time, along the river to the sea
Of death deferred awhile by memory.

Coldene attacks all these symptoms in any stage of the common cold

Gives feelable relief in minutes . . .
Most powerful cold medicine you can buy without a prescription

The common cold is not a simple ailment. It is a disorder which attacks various parts of your system, bringing a variety of miseries to different parts of your body as it spreads. Some sufferers seem to feel one misery more quickly, others another.

Hence, Coldene is unlike any cold-and-cough medicine ever offered over druggists' counters. For it doesn't rely on the limited powers of one or two drugs, but unites the powers of several potent ingredients . . . all in proper balance.

When you take Coldene, here are the things that happen almost at once—within minutes. First: The instant Coldene touches your raw, inflamed throat, relief begins. Second: If you've been coughing, Coldene relieves that cough spasm. Right then and there! Third: Coldene goes to work to dry up and open your nose. You get feelable relief within minutes! Fourth: If your chest is tight and breathing is difficult—you breathe again! Fifth: If you ache and feel just plain miserable—Coldene relieves the pain, even reduces fever, gives the fullest possible help.

The reason? There's a powerful, specific, correct ingredient in Coldene for each of the miseries of the common cold. That's why Coldene can catch your cold at any of its 5 stages. Now available in its original Liquid form or in the new Coldene Tablets . . . Coldene, most powerful cold medicine you can buy without a prescription.

Children's Village is a happy place—where youngsters learn not only about cleanliness (above left), but also about having fun together. After a temporary stay some go to foster or adoptive homes, others return to their families.

SOMEONE CARES . . . AT CHILDREN'S VILLAGE Fargo, North Dakota

Help Wanted

By MARGARET HICKEY

Almost every woman who has visited a children's home remembers with quickened heartbeat the hugs and kisses eagerly bestowed, the tugs at the skirt for attention, and perhaps most of all the excited question, "Are you going to be our housemother?"

Our child-caring institutions shelter some 87,000 youngsters. Because many are rejected and insecure, they long more than anything else to be wanted and loved. But unfortunately there are never enough warmhearted, dedicated people to give all the individual guidance and help these children need.

House parents in most institutions are recruited through newspaper advertisements or by other house parents. But nearly all are without experience (except for rearing families of their own) or training for the job of helping the severely disturbed children who often are sent to an institution for care. Last year 23 children's institutions in six Southeastern states banded together in a project to bring training workshops from the University of North Carolina School of Social Work right onto the grounds of the institutions themselves. Among the topics the workshops cover are how the house parent can develop leadership in children, teach responsibility and appreciation, foster healthy boy-girl relationships—all among children deprived of a normal family life.

In addition to house parents, trained professional workers also are needed. For them, too, it is a demanding, often lonely job, and many qualified young people soon discover that other work pays better.

Throughout the Middle West the need for trained social workers is probably greatest. North Dakota, whose Children's Village is featured this month, has only 50 to serve its entire population of nearly 620,000. But the state is making an effort to attract more through educational stipends and worker-in-training programs. In other states civic groups are active. Junior Leagues, for example, in Portland, Oregon; St. Joseph, Missouri; and Salt Lake City, Utah, all have given funds to help pay tuition for students in social work.

Vacation jobs for selected high-school and college students often lead to career futures in social work. In Providence, Rhode Island, Children's Friend and Service Agency offers its summertime aides job-counseling service as well as information about available scholarships. END

"Don't go yet, Mrs. K.—stay and tell me another story." The ten-year-old looks up pleadingly and kisses the dark-eyed woman sitting on the edge of his bed.

As housemother at Children's Village in Fargo, North Dakota, Mrs. Irene Ketterl is busiest at bedtime. That is the hour a motherless youngster most needs the reassurance of love, the comfort of having someone brush away tears of loneliness or listen to a little prayer. But with Ricky it was different—until tonight. At ten years of age, Ricky was a little "tough guy" without a friend in the world. Ever since he could remember he had heard almost nothing but curses from a family that had taught him one thing from the time he was old enough to learn: stealing. Ricky and his sister, two years younger, would go into a store where Ricky would start a fight. While clerks rushed to the aid of the sobbing girl, the boy would slyly take off the counter anything within arm's reach.

Now he was at Children's Village. At first, when Mrs. Ketterl tried to help him get ready for bed, he knocked off her glasses and kicked them across the room. Mrs. Ketterl simply held Ricky more firmly, pushed his arms through the sleeves of his pajamas, steered him to the bed and tucked him in. Then she said a little prayer, patted his head and left the room.

After everyone had retired, Ricky frequently riffled through drawers and closets.

"Why do you get up in the middle of the night and take things?" Mrs. Ketterl asked him gently.

"Don't you know anything?" the boy mocked. "That's the best time, when it's quiet and people are asleep."

At Children's Village, the little tough guy got the first kindness and affection he had ever known. For a change someone cared whether he fell down and skinned his elbow, or whether he got a D in spelling at school. And he began to change. Now, after four months at the Village, instead of striking out at Mrs. Ketterl, he kissed her and begged for a story. Her fervent hope was that perhaps soon Ricky would be ready to go into a boarding home with loving foster parents to give him all the attention he needs and craves.

Since 1897, 10,000 such youngsters have found a refuge in Children's Village, until recently known as North Dakota Children's Home. But even though the Village has a rich history as the state's only private child-caring agency, its story is just beginning. In June, 1956, 35 youngsters ranging in age from two to sixteen moved out of the big white two-story Children's Home into two modern cottages in a new neighborhood of rambler dwellings on the edge of the Fargo plain. In the Village, children who formerly slept in barrackslike dormitories now share a bedroom with only one other child. The older ones go to public school, do household chores, entertain their friends and go on dates—as any other normal youngsters.

But their pasts are far from normal. Many come from broken or unhappy homes to which they can never return, always in need of reassurance and love. Such a child was fourteen-year-old Connie. Beaten by her father and called "dummy" by an indolent, fun-loving mother, she ran away from home in hopes of being picked up and taken away from her family. When she first came to Children's Village—sent there by county welfare workers who persuaded her parents it was for the child's own good—she was fearful about making friends and certain she couldn't learn to do anything, even the simplest chore. But gradually through trust, kindness and discipline—the sort a concerned parent would give—the child's self-esteem began to grow. The friendliness of the other youngsters and the staff helped. So did her ability to get good marks at school, once she felt calm inside. When Mrs. Ketterl asked her to bake a cake for sewing club, which meets each Tuesday, Connie, with painful exactness, measured out the ingredients, mixed the batter, waited watchfully by the oven. When the finished cake came out of the pan, Mrs. Ketterl was lavish with praise. "Gosh, you think I'm good for something, don't you?" the amazed girl exclaimed.

"Some of them look as though they'll never smile again when they first come here," Mrs. Anna Ehlert, who is housemother in the boys' cottage, tells you. She was thinking of Leroy, whose mother was ill and deserted by her husband. Five months ago Leroy skulked in a corner, ate dinner alone, kept his eyes constantly downward. Mrs. Ehlert, who has three grown children of her own and has had experience in a similar home in Montana, used her tried-and-true technique on Leroy. Each evening before dinner, when only a few others were around,

What I'd Like to Tell Girls...

These are not just my own peeves. Other fellows I know feel the same way. Anyway, here they are for what they're worth.

Don't use pet phrases over and over
Don't try to attract other men's attention when you're on a date
Don't act possessive in public
Don't use heavy make-up

If you girls only knew how men admire a clean, fresh, natural complexion you'd throw away those old-looking, chalky cover-ups and start using Cuticura Soap and Ointment. They're the only things I know that really work—and work fast—on blackheads and externally caused pimples. And at the same time make a girl's skin look soft, smooth and exciting.

I'm told the reason is Cuticura Soap is superemollient to maintain the natural moisture and normal, healthy acidity of the skin—and Cuticura Ointment softens and stimulates as it helps relieve. All I know is—the girls I like most are girls who use Cuticura.

she asked him to help with little chores in the kitchen. Working side by side with Mrs. Ehlert, who though a grandmother has beautiful wavy red hair and a calm quiet manner that inspires confidence, Leroy began to talk. Little by little he expressed his bitterness because his father had left home and never tried to get in touch with him. When Leroy discovered that Mrs. Ehlert could be trusted not to "spread it around," he told her other things about himself, how he felt about school and about living at the Village, and gradually he was able to overcome successfully the hurt caused by his father's desertion. Today Leroy is a personable, poised lad of twelve, active in Boy Scouts, tops in his class and looked up to as a leader by schoolmates.

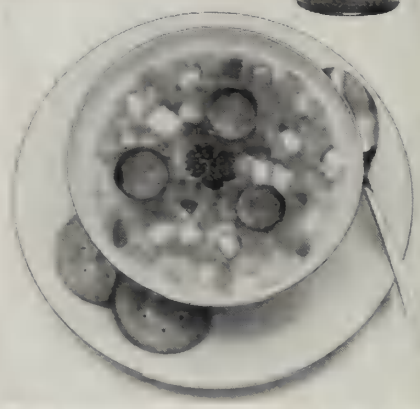
Another newcomer, the fifteen-year-old daughter of a man sent to prison for robbery, refused to speak to anyone at Children's Village. Through Miss Betty Beierle, the caseworker, she got a baby-sitting job with an understanding family who often invited her to dinner. Miss Beierle wanted the girl to learn what family living could be like, discover that people liked her no matter what her background—so that later on perhaps she herself might be ready to move into a foster home and lead the kind of life she had never had with her own parents. The youngster soon was able to talk a little about her fears—"Am I to blame for what my father has done?" she wondered—and with the caseworker's help slowly but surely gained self-confidence.

But in an institution no child ever gets as much attention as he needs. Perhaps that explains why Charlotte, who seemed for a while to be doing so well, lately has been getting demerits for neglecting her work and acting sassy. Or why eight-year-old Ralph, who is in a special-learning class at school, pokes his head in the door of Betty Beierle's office regularly to see if she is free to listen to him read for a few minutes. And why Susan, who cries a lot at night and can give no reason, writes Miss Beierle little notes about her innermost thoughts.

If you will help run our government in the American way, then there will never be danger of our government running America in the wrong way. GEN. OMAR N. BRADLEY

Every member of the staff finds it difficult at times to be a substitute parent to all 35, for each is so demanding of attention. Whenever Mrs. Lund walks into the girls' cottage, for example, a plump little blonde rushes up for a kiss, while a dimpled three-year-old tugs at her skirt to be picked up and held on her lap. And Olive, a flat-faced, rather unappealing child, shows her the button she is sewing, with difficulty, on her best blouse. Olive floats back to her room on a pink cloud because Mrs. Lund has called her "Princess."

Children's Village, though located in Fargo, does a state-wide job. Check the map of North Dakota on the wall in Betty Beierle's office. Pretty, blond Miss Beierle, just two years out of the University of North Dakota, is one of two social workers on the Village staff. The scope of her duties would probably shock the average graduate social worker. Each of the 87 pins on the map represents an adoptive or boarding home (or prospective adoptive home yet to be investigated) under the supervision of Children's Village. Many are farm homes scattered all over the state. All must be visited and studied by Miss Beierle or her co-worker, though local county welfare workers usually co-operate by checking on children in the foster boarding homes.



A branch of the Village to supervise the foster and adoptive homes throughout the western part of the state—and also to find just the right foster home for a special problem—has been a dream of superintendents through the years. For Children's Village is just a temporary home where youngsters stay from six to nine months. About 20 per cent of them

Should your child be a Medical Technologist?

by CHARLOTTE STREET

Chief Medical Technologist, The Papanicolaou Cytology Laboratory, The New York Hospital-Cornell Medical Center, and Assistant in Pathology, Cornell University Medical College (As told to LLEWELLYN MILLER)

The increasing use of electron microscopes in hospitals and research laboratories has created a demand for Technologists trained in their operation. With these microscopes, doctors can examine body tissues sliced thin as a millionth of an inch . . . study cells magnified as much as 150,000 times . . . detect polio and other viruses.

"EXACTLY what is a Medical Technologist—a special kind of nurse?"

That question is frequently asked by young people, and quite understandably.

My profession is one of the newest in the field of medical science. College degrees in Medical Technology have been granted for only about 35 years. Since most of our work is done behind the doors of laboratories, few people have a clear idea of what we do or realize how much our efforts contribute to those of physicians and research scientists, though we are neither doctors nor nurses.

Perhaps the best way to explain how many interesting, important and varied opportunities my chosen career offers to young men and women of suitable ability and temperament is to take you behind the scenes and show you some Medical Technologists at their tasks.

Let's start in a hospital.

A young woman in white is leaving the Accident Receiving Room. Her uniform is similar to that of a nurse, but without a cap. She has just taken a sample of blood from a child who has cut an artery. He is in critical condition, in immediate need of a blood transfusion.

She has life or death in her hands.

The doctor must use blood compatible with that of the child. Any other type may be fatal. So will delay.

She moves calmly, but quickly, to a near-by laboratory. With methodical speed she tests the child's blood, using slides, microscope and known typing sera. Her results show that Blood Type A, Rh positive is required. Seconds are precious, but all depends on her accuracy as well as her speed. She checks by cross-matching the child's blood with some of the same type from the Blood Bank stock. In a matter of minutes, she is in the operating room with the blood needed to save the child.

All of the work of Medical Technologists is not so dramatic in demand for speed.

Let's look elsewhere in hospital laboratories at the Technologists who are under less pressure. They are using test tubes, stains, chemicals and many delicate instruments. One may be making a blood count which will tell the doctor if his patient is threatened with anemia. Another may be making a liver function test to see if a patient has infectious hepatitis. Others may be checking for evidence of other maladies, such as cancer or diabetes.

Let's move into one of the big pharmaceutical houses. Here Technologists are making analyses of medications for purity and strength. Without the careful work of hundreds of such highly trained people, it would have been impossible to produce the great quantity of Salk vaccine, to give just one example, when it was needed to protect the children of the nation from polio.

Or look into a research laboratory where many of us find the greatest challenge and reward. There Technologists are assisting in experiments, working directly with distinguished scientists whose careers are dedicated to the search for new knowledge and new remedies. It is a great moment when a discovery has its final proof and the Technologist can say, "I saw it happen—and I helped."

Some of our work is routine, some has great variety, but all of it is equally important in that the Medical Technologist's highly specialized skills free the doctor for the many other duties for which he is so greatly needed.

Before World War I, most practicing physicians had to perform laboratory tests for themselves. Only in large communities could they call on a pathologist for aid. (A pathologist is a specialist—a physician who is sometimes called a "doctor's doctor." He is an expert in laboratory procedures. His knowledge helps those doctors who have concentrated in other specialties to make decisions as to diagnosis and treatment of disease.)

As medical knowledge grew and as many new drugs were discovered, pathologists were swamped with work. So were doctors who maintained their own laboratories. They could not keep up with the increasing demand for the tests that were becoming more valuable—and more complicated—with each passing year. Through necessity, they began to teach assistants to take over some of the laboratory duties which require great care, accuracy and special knowledge, but which do not demand all of the skills of a doctor. Still the laboratories were snowed under. The logical solution was to create schools to give standardized training in Medical Technology.

And so a new career in medicine came about.

Our profession is particularly attractive to girls, but is by no means limited to them. About ninety percent of Technologists are women, but the proportion of men is steadily increasing.

It has strong appeal to young people who are keenly interested in medical sciences, but do not want, or cannot afford, to devote the eight to twelve years of study and training needed by a doctor before he is ready to practice.

It also appeals to those who want to aid the sick, but would rather not work directly with very ill patients, as do nurses.

After as little as three years of study, a student may take a valued place in the team of healers as a Registered Medical Technologist.

Laboratory analysis of body fluids is an important part of Medical Technology. These Technologists are determining certain chemical constituents of a blood sample through titration.

Required training

There are short cuts to employment in laboratories, but the young person who wants a career as a Medical Technologist and a chance at the most interesting work and the highest pay—rather than just a job—needs a minimum of two years in college and another twelve months in a School of Medical Technology which is connected with a hospital, medical school, or State Board of Health and which has been approved by The American Medical Association.

Such preparation leads, after examination, to a Certificate from the Registry of Medical Technologists of The American Society of Clinical Pathologists and the right to place M.T. (ASCP) after one's name. In other words, the student has won the title: Registered Medical Technologist.

Some colleges give a Bachelor's Degree in Science after three years of college and one year in an Approved School of Medical Technology.

The student who wishes to specialize in one particular type of laboratory work may do so without taking the twelve months' course in Medical Technology, provided he holds a college degree and has taken certain required science courses.

A college degree obtained in either of these ways is the best start for a career, since it leads to more advancement and greater responsibility. Many young Technologists, however, go to work after three years of study and work for their degrees around the edges of a job. This is practical and convenient, since so many laboratories are in hospitals connected with universities.

Cost of training

One of the many attractions of my profession is that training is markedly less expensive than in many comparable fields. The cost of college preparation varies, of course, depending on the college chosen, but, of the more than 650 Approved Schools of Medical Technology, about two-thirds make no charge whatever for tuition.

Therefore, a student living at home can complete the necessary final year for no more than the cost of maintenance.

In many of the Approved Schools, students even receive a small stipend for the laboratory work they do as part of their training.

I know of no other field except nursing where training for so important a profession can be had for so little cost.

The financial future

There are nearly 24,000 Registered Medical Technologists (as well as many who are non-registered) in the United States today. It is estimated that 50,000 qualified laboratory workers will be needed by 1960. Therefore, graduates have immediate choice of many different positions—no need to worry about getting a rapid start when training is complete.

Salaries vary from one part of the country to another, as they do in all professions. The range for recent graduates is from $3,400 to $4,200 in hospitals. Positions in industry offer somewhat more. Those who advance to supervisory and teaching positions are well rewarded. Chief Medical Technologists and specialists in certain fields can earn $6,000 or more, and rate of pay is steadily increasing.

The girl who wants to take a few years away from her career to have a family will find her skills in demand when she wants to return to work. If her husband's career calls for a transfer to a new territory, she can find a position, usually with no delay whatever, in their new home town.

Requirements for success

There is a place for many different temperaments in my profession.

Boys and girls who like to be surrounded by people will be stimulated by the busy life of a hospital. In large ones, they will become specialists. If variety of tasks is of greatest appeal, a small hospital provides something different every hour of the day. Laboratory work in a physician's office or a clinic usually calls for some direct contact with patients. The more retiring person will enjoy the laboratories where long months may be devoted to a special research project. Those with a talent for teaching are in great demand.

The work of skilled Medical Technologists is of vital importance in today's fight against cancer. Here, at the Papanicolaou Cytology Laboratory, a Technologist prepares slides of samplings of cells shed from body tissues for microscopic study, which may reveal the presence of cancer long before it could be detected by other means.

But any young person who chooses any branch of Medical Technology must have certain attributes:

A natural interest in the sciences. Is your child showing keen interest and making good grades in biology, chemistry, and other sciences in high school? Does she question about how things work? Is she interested in the reason one ingredient curdles a sauce and another doesn't? Curiosity about the why and wherefore, interest in cause and effect are important in the laboratory.

Accuracy. Does your child follow instructions carefully and make precise measurements? The youngster who is satisfied with a slap-dash piece of carpentry or sewing will be happier and more successful in another profession. The Technologist must be a perfectionist. There is no such thing as being half right in a laboratory.

Reliability. Does your child carry through a task in faithful detail without supervision? Medical Technologists must be absolutely trustworthy. Lives often depend on their work.

Cooperativeness. Does your child do a fair share of work at home voluntarily? Does your child get along easily with older people, as well as those of the same age, and take criticism and suggestion good-naturedly? A Technologist is part of a team.

Capacity for patient, thorough effort. If your girl starts a piece of knitting, will she finish it rather than abandon it half done? Is she willing to go back and correct a mistake? Ability to complete a job, and do it well, is of prime importance in a laboratory.

Manual dexterity. Is your child deft? The Medical Technologist works with fragile glassware and delicate instruments. The laboratory is no place for a butterfingers.

Steady nerves. Medical Technologists sometimes work under heavy pressure. They must be calm and efficient under stress. The excitable child who panics in emergency is not cut out for the laboratory.

Everyone is not suited for a career in Medical Technology. Those who are will find a warm welcome, a valued place in the absorbing world of science and a respected place in the community.

They will also find a satisfaction beyond the many tangible rewards—the sure knowledge that their chosen life work is of importance to others, as well as to themselves, because even the smallest duty in the laboratory contributes, in some degree, to the safety, health and comfort of mankind.

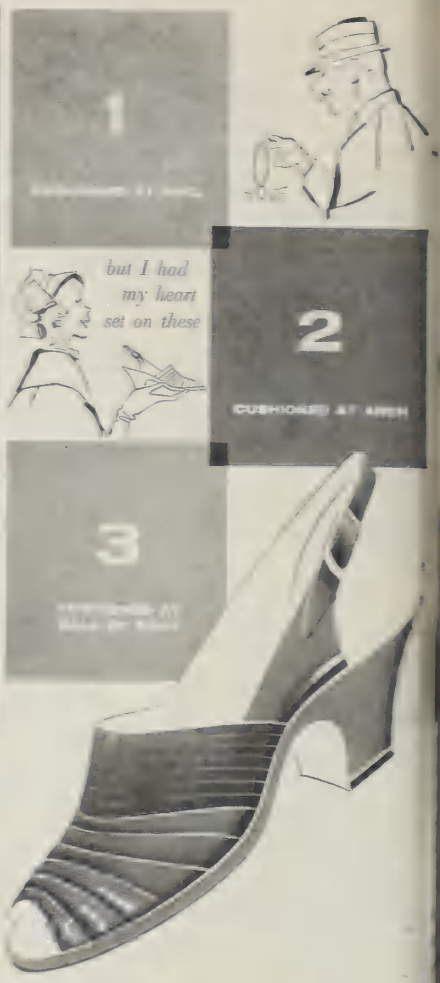
eventually are adopted; the others go to foster homes when it is not possible to return them to their own families or relatives.

Mrs. Lucy J. Hall, recently retired after forty-two years as a caseworker with the old Children's Home, tells about the many times she has crisscrossed North Dakota in search of the right foster home for a child. Until 1952, she carried on her investigations without any help. James C. Baccus, superintendent, and Milton F. Weber, president of the board, have pledged themselves to active fund-raising so that the Village can hire two more caseworkers and raise the salaries of the house parents, who presently receive $175 a month.

Some counseling and psychological testing now are available through the Children's Social Service Center in Fargo, set up in 1954 by the Cass County Welfare Board and staffed by a full-time psychologist and psychiatric social worker. But throughout the state there is still great need for treatment facilities for children with serious emotional disturbances.

Children's Village is using the Social Service Center whenever possible—for sometimes love is not enough. The roots of rejection often are deep, too deep for a foster or a house parent to reach. One teen-aged girl, emotionally disturbed when she came to Children's Village, was sent first to one foster home, then another.

The happiest wife is not the one who marries the best man, but the one who makes the best of the man she marries. JOSEPH FORT NEWTON
Harper & Bros.



Each time she threw temper tantrums or ran away. The foster mothers, without counseling from a caseworker or psychologist, all failed, and finally the child was sent to an institution for girls where she will get discipline tempered with understanding. Another boy who stole habitually couldn't reform and finally was sent to Nebraska Boys' Town.

Money for the $80,000 annual budget of Children's Village comes from gifts and bequests from the people of North Dakota, from the Community Welfare Association and from public-welfare funds. In 1955 and 1956, when plans for the new buildings were getting under way, county agents, country-weekly editors and adoptive parents throughout the state led a campaign that raised $68,000. An initial $147,000 had already come as a bequest from a businessman's estate. In the 1956–57 fiscal year, contributions from the Community Welfare Association totaled $6274, and services and care purchased for individual children by the public welfare board, $40,889.

Anyone who contributes to Children's Village is considered a "member" and invited to attend the annual May meetings to elect seven directors who serve three-year terms on a twenty-one-member board. Both Mr. Weber, an insurance man, and Mr. Baccus, formerly promotion director of the North Dakota Farm Bureau, have special reasons for their interest in their work. Each has two youngsters adopted through Children's Village.

What Children's Village lacks in staff highly trained in psychological and emotional problems it makes up for, partly anyway, in a comfortable atmosphere for youngsters who must live away from home. At the Village they are learning things their families never taught them. Some have led such undisciplined and neglected lives that the first thing they have to understand is that families must abide by rules and regulations and that they can be happy even though restricted. A number are learning about cleanliness—for a neglected child is usually a dirty child—and table manners, and getting along in a group.

Others are gaining an appreciation of spiritual values. At Christmas, just before leaving for a foster home, Ricky gave Mrs. Ketterl a tiny red wreath and begged her to put it in her window every year. "When you look at it, think of me," he smiled, "and remember that you taught me how to pray." END

The Picture of Health for November

by MAXINE DAVIS

Vitamins are essential as oxygen. Ever ask why? How many are there? How much do we need? Which foods contain them all? Can they be dangerous? Here are some answers:

They are nutrients, indispensable to life and health. Scientists ve found twenty of them—so far! Your daily re- irement is less than a teaspoonful. But no one food, t even milk, contains all of them; they are spread nong components of seven basic food groups. So you n see why vitamin concentrates are so very important.

Doctors prescribe them when they restrict diets for ch diseases as stomach ulcer or allergy; when they eat illness, poor appetite, or old age. They order em to improve the nutrition of babies, pregnant omen, and nursing mothers.

Because individual requirements vary so, our mily doctor recommends BEXEL vitamin-mineral psules. BEXEL is tailored to every age and purpose keeping well or getting well. No one gets too little too much. There's BEXEL syrup or child-size cap- les for the small fry, high-potency for Grandfather, d other preparations for the rest of us, including e baby. Result: our notably healthier household!

Everyone's full of vim and vigor these autumn ys. The Head of the House walks to work, and plays lf on week-ends. Tom's on the freshman football am at college and Jane's black and blue from ing all out at field hockey.

I used to worry because their feet perspired even this crisp weather. All three of them have suffered iserably from athlete's foot and know that this ngus disease flourishes on damp feet.

Now they use OCTOFEN Powder for prevention, or worst, OCTOFEN Liquid as a healing relief. They dry eir feet thoroughly after showering, dust them specially between the toes) with OCTOFEN Powder, d sprinkle it into their shoes and clean socks. TOFEN Liquid will help prevent another attack.

Scientific findings indicate that no other fungicide s been more successful. OCTOFEN is the only medica- n approved by the authoritative National Foot ealth Council for athlete's foot.

This exhilarating autumn, we're all so bouncy that e use almost as much YODORA as in July. For the bac- ria that are the source of the unpleasant odor of rspiration grow just as freely.

The New YODORA—light, delicate, soothing, healing -contains an antibiotic that paralyzes those germs d keeps underarms dainty for as long as twenty-four urs—sometimes longer. With it one is as fresh as e's new winter suit looks!

If you try to rake leaves, dig your dahlia bulbs, d put the perennials to bed all in one zestful fall y, you can overdo. You'll suffer with stiff muscles d your arthritic joints.

But there's great help. Use SURIN. It's not a cure; ere isn't any. But smooth on SURIN where pain urts; then put moist hot towels over it for two inutes. You'll find SURIN gets down to where the ain is and relieves it. Then you can think happily f tomorrow.

privilege of being the first and probably the only woman ever to teach in ■ college for Buddhist monks. Ordinarily a monk is supposed never to look at a woman, never to speak to one, never to allow his robe to be brushed by one in the street, never to receive anything from her hand. But for once, urgent need overcame the taboos. The Venerable Ones in charge of instruction were determined that Cambodian monks would be able to communicate with other Buddhists throughout the world, and the only language available to all the others was English. The Asia Foundation offered to supply a teacher, and when the appeal was sent out by the U. S. Information Service to American women in Phnom Penh, I volunteered.

There are over two thousand bonzes, yellow-clad monks, in Phnom Penh alone. They do no "work," beg for their one daily meal of rice, and own nothing but a yellow strip of cloth, an umbrella, a pair of sandals and a begging bowl. Secretly I had plenty of apprehensions at the prospect of teaching 177 of them in classes of 59 each, with sessions lasting two hours. But how better could I get a real glimpse of this enchanting land and its people?

At my first session, the Cambodian teacher who had given them their first instruction in English introduced me and disappeared. The monks sat in six rows, with five crowded to a bench on either side of a central aisle. I was thoroughly scared, and then I realized that they were far more frightened than I. They didn't dare look at me, for I was a woman, but they didn't dare not look, for I was ■ teacher. I began speaking slowly and clearly. I met blank, frozen, expressionless faces. Did they understand? I asked. Still blank. They were lost and so was I. Finally I held up my pencil. "What is this?" To my amazement, back came the answer from 59 throats in unison, "This izza pencil."

Our combined relief was enormous. Joyfully we explored our common territory. They knew what a book was, a desk, ■ tree. When they hesitated over umbrella, I wrote it on the blackboard. They were pleased to learn its English name.

If I tried to single out one student at a time to answer questions, he would freeze in embarrassment, so I asked questions by rows. As I walked up the aisle to hear the replies from the back, the monks sitting next to the aisle shrank away. I let their glances skid perilously past my shoulder, all the while maintaining the serene neutrality of a pagoda. Gradually the tension relaxed. They could even begin to smile as I corrected their buzzing Dzank you very mush. They learned to have the courage to answer my frequent "Do you understand?" with a joyful yes or emphatic no. When the bell rang, I repeated, "Whenever you have any questions, be sure to ask me." Several gathered around my desk. Then one managed to ask the first question: "How old are you?"

Although I had the best manuals available for teaching English, I found the subject matter hopelessly unsuitable for my bonzes. "New York is larger than Washington." "Snow falls in winter." Gradually I began experimenting with dialogues about Cambodia. I could soon count to five in Cambodian, and they were overjoyed as we drilled. Later, I found some English translations from sacred Buddhist writings in Pali, and approval was given for me to use these booklets once a week. At first the students were bewildered, but then came delighted recognition of the Pali chant. Often I would let one side chant the rolling Pali phrases, and the other side reply with the English equivalent.

What did it all mean, this outreach across the barriers of language, across cultural and religious backgrounds?

For me, I came to love these Buddhist monks for their sweetness and utter guilelessness. Intellectually they were no giants, but in knowledge of the heart they were truly educated. I often thought of them as children—but children without jealousy, anger or strife. These young men had achieved an absolute gentleness of spirit. Even in a two-hour class, jammed together on hard, backless benches, in sweltering heat, there was never a sign of disorder or irritability. Although I was often exhausted after a long session, I invariably felt I had received more than I had been able to give.

As for them, let Prum Chhon speak for "my" bonzes in his letter:

"Hello dear," he writes. "During last long time I never wrote any letter to you and I did not know that you had ■ good time or not. When you left Cambodia, to the U.S.A., did you have free on your trip? I was afraid on it. If you had free, I would enjoy very much. However, do you and your relatives have a good time every day?

"Oh, my former teacher! I miss you very much, because you was a popular teacher to me. Every time I want to write ■ letter to you, but I cannot write it still. If I can write it, I almost write many letters to you. Because the English language is difficul. If you and your family are getting on all right, we, students at the Buddhist College are very glad to hear it, and as we are getting on all right we should know about you and your family.

"Finally, I have nothing for you, but I have this one of letter which souvenir for you. Excuse me on this my letter please. My name, Prum Chhon."

Sincerely,
MARGARET BEIDLER

Must Schools be Palaces?

Appleton, Wisconsin

Sir: We hope you have not acted too harshly with the editor responsible for allowing the question Must Schools be Palaces? (August JOURNAL) to be commented on by Dorothy Thompson.

MAUREY LEE ALLEN, A. I. A.
Architect

West Haven, Connecticut

In Must Schools be Palaces? it was asserted that we should go back to building on two floors to secure "twice as much room under one roof and on one foundation, and greatly decreasing building and heating costs." Since Miss Thompson mentioned the disadvantages of single-story buildings, in all fairness some of the advantages should be presented:

1. Costly stairways and the space they occupy are eliminated.
2. Foundation footings need to be planned to accommodate only the weight of a single story.
3. Non-load-bearing walls can be used, which greatly reduces costs.
4. The cluster or finger plan of schoolrooms can eliminate costly excavation by following the natural contours of the site.
5. Costly plumbing facilities do not have to be duplicated on additional floors.
6. Buildings can be evacuated much more rapidly in emergencies. (A most important point, don't you think?)

Other advantages are less fancy ornamentation and a school that harmonizes with the improving environment of other modern buildings. I hope that people will "think before they pass judgment" also—and will consult some of the studies which cite the values on each side of the question.

GEORGE J. COLLINS

Indianapolis, Indiana

Dorothy Thompson states that "architects and contractors first of all . . . are always active in promotion" (of larger schools). May I, as an architect of twenty years' experience, protest this insult to the architectural profession? I assure you that no architect would or could design ■ larger building than that which the owner required, desired or could afford; and state and school authorities have established rigid legal requirements for every phase of schoolhouse planning. The school in Tangier described by Miss Thompson is a small private school catering to a select group and under no legal restrictions, and has no comparison to a large American school for public education and governed by strict state educational and construction standards. (That wide, open staircase sounds like a fire trap to me.) We are trying to make the public schools good enough for everyone and equal to 1957 standards in other fields.

ROSE MARY BEST

Berrien Springs, Michigan

Does it really cost more to paint rooms in gay, bright colors instead of dark gloomy ones? And there is a reason for "all that glass"—tests have shown the light isn't sufficient without it! Of course the new schools cost money; but what doesn't now? Regardless of our school taxes, I want our three little girls to have the best all-around education they can get, in the most pleasant surroundings possible. Schools needn't be palaces, but they should be more than just places.

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"I wish you'd tell me what it is that you have against the incandescent bulb?"

One deb in our block has adopted a posture which shrieks "Me, me, me!" She flaunts ■ hip swirl and a lip curl, and she makes me feel 990 years old. She acts as if she'd invented sex, yet her hip flip is exactly like Ann Pennington's, a dancer of the giddy 1920's, when sex was really discovered, if I remember correctly.

Our recent vacation unveiled the brave new world of the turnpikes and toll roads. They remind me of the H. G. Wells utopias I read as ■ boy, so tailored and immaculate. And the lunchrooms are all too vividly like scenes of George Orwell's novel, 1984, in twenty-eight flavors.

If you can convince ■ male teen-ager what ■ lion he'd be at high-school, college and country-club dances, he might condescend to mask his scorn of $30 worth of dancing lessons.

Over his second fruit juice at the mid-morning break our lunchroom autocrat vowed that what the modern sex riddle really needs is candor. "When confronted by sex," he said, "many lovers act as if they were two strange people."

To carve a turkey is still a pleasing ritual, yet also a chore. I console myself by munching at turkey crumbs as I carve or our Thanksgiving guests would be demanding seconds before I had a bite. (My new rule: Carve your own seconds!)

Our son unveils big news: some of the 1958 automobiles (cocky, eh?) won't carry a spare tire. Does this mean more luggage room, and must we carry even more baggage than we did last summer?

My Dream Girl and I attend a variety of churches occasionally, to see how other people worship. We like best the ones that preach more brotherly love than hell and damnation.

Our town's youngest and prettiest dowager had her portrait painted expensively with her characteristic hairdo. Later she changed her hairdo to please a new admirer, and had the artist (for $350) paint the new one into her portrait. (I hope the rascal's worth it!)

How can Harold Stassen and Zarubin possibly agree on disarmament over London teacups when it often takes ten or fifteen years for a pair of brothers-in-law to disarm?

Even the ladies at bridge on Columbus Day agreed that a wife with a husband reared in the Sir Galahad tradition really has it golden. This chivalrous breed of romantics is scarcer and grows skeptical.*

From exotic faraway places I've brought my Princess of Sheer Delight a sarong, ■ snood and a bikini, and now she wants me to taper off my travels, bring her a kimono and settle down among our begonias.

"What a man must ask his wife," snorts Peter Comfort, removing his fantastic TV aerial from his roof, "is: Does she want a husband henpecked and subservient, or does she want one who acts like Burt Lancaster, Bob Mitchum or Kirk Douglas?"

My eavesdropping son assures me parents are hypocrites: when we think the kids aren't listening we say "ain't" and brag about our childhood orneriness.

Often I think the bike may still save civilization. Any dolt can drive a $3500 car too fast, but it takes quite a boy or girl to pedal a $40 bicycle ten or twelve miles and go places.

My Lady Love is an expert dietitian; she knows for a fact that one ounce of anything I like is more fattening than one pound of something I don't like; such as ice cream and hollandaise sauce.

I understand better now why fathers of the past were so stern and forbidding. If they'd relaxed in one moment of whimsey or flippancy their kids would have massacred 'em, clobbered 'em, dived down their throats.

Eureka! At last the food men have done it: a frozen dinner for dieters, around 400 calories, in turkey, chicken or beef flavor. Three of 'em a day (and nothing else!) and I'd lose twelve pounds in ■ month, maybe. (What happened to all that gravy?)

After I'd collected 6″ x 6″ ceramic tiles all over the world, on Cape Cod I finally found a ceramics studio where they make 'em, and it was closed.

One of our nearby nabobs allowed his children to paint murals on the sides of his new swimming pool. Nearest indulgence to that in my childhood was when my dad let me implant my footprint in ■ new cement sidewalk.

"For heaven's sake don't quote me," confides Betty Comfort, taking in the milk, "but I conclude that aside from my own children and a few of my relatives' brats, only one child in ten is really adorable."

Last summer our town's execs began driving from an air-cooled home in an air-cooled car to an air-cooled office, just like Texans. What's more, with the windows closed and no rush of air it's easier for women to talk in ■n air-cooled car.

After meditation, our golf foursome agrees the 1957 collegians aren't any brighter than we were; they merely seem so because they're closer to their textbooks and haven't stubbed their toes as many times.

One of my smart neighbors tells me the best way to clean your glasses is to use your soapy shaving brush on 'em when you're through shaving. But what of us who valiantly scrape our necks with electric shavers—must we use fingernail brushes?

If it's true that teen-agers say "See you soon, raccoon," could it mean a renaissance of poetry among the young? I've never actually heard any of our son's chums say in earnest "See you later, alligator," or "You dig what I mean, jelly bean," but it rhymes.

I love to watch my Dream Girl's college classmates' glances when we go to the home-coming football game as they try to see which sister has kept her figure, which still adores her husband, which husband afforded a second mink coat when the first one began to look ratty, and which are even happier without.

. . . When the infant Suzi took her first step and has kept running ever since,

. . . Or our youngest commands me: "Dad, that's a good line, better make a note of it,"

. . . While my daughter lets her red hair grow into a long pony tail with no bonus from me,

. . . And Harlan III pulls at the hair on Junior's chest as Junior used to pull at mine,

. . . Or my Princess of Sheer Delight binds the first 100 of these pages into a magnificent red leather volume,

Then my cup runneth over, and I'm ready to sip from the saucer.

"I can't help feeling bitter and rejected."

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

WHEN HUSBANDS ARE LESS ARDENT

"We are in our mid-twenties and have been married three years. We have no children, but we share many interests, and enjoy compatible backgrounds, a lovely home and financial security. My husband loves me devotedly, and in most ways our marriage is a good one.

"But he doesn't seem interested in the sex relationship—we wouldn't have had any at all this last year if I hadn't taken the initiative on a few occasions. And lately, when I've suggested it as often as once or twice a month, he's given the excuse that he was very tired.

"I've tried to reach a better understanding, and have explained my feelings as calmly and reasonably as I could. A couple of times, in a state of turmoil, I've burst out angrily and told him just how frustrated I feel. He's promised to try to be a better husband, but there's been no improvement. I'm sure he'd be perfectly content to go along on a strictly platonic basis, if I kept still.

"Is this kind of behavior normal for a healthy, successful man who has no serious problems and who claims to love his reasonably attractive wife? Ours could be a very happy marriage, but I can't help feeling bitter and rejected. Do you hear from other wives who have such a peculiar problem? Surely there must be some reason, some solution."

I can assure this wife that her difficulty is not unique, or even uncommon. To some extent, the problem affects at least one wife in six; for one in ten, the situation is acute.

And there is always a reason—more likely two or three. But without knowing far more about this wife, her husband and their marriage, it is impossible to tell why the problem exists in her case, or how to resolve it. This type of difficulty is among the most complex confronting the counselor.

However, it may help this troubled young woman to appraise her situation more objectively if she understands some of the factors commonly involved. Perhaps she will then be able to interpret the difficulty more effectively to her husband, and so enlist his active co-operation.

Low sex drive of the husband is often a factor. Some apparently unrelated physical disability may be responsible—a vitamin deficiency, glandular imbalance, or even an unsuspected low-grade infection. Any condition that lowers his general vitality is likely to affect his sexual vigor accordingly. A thorough physical examination is an essential first step.

Fatigue and nervous tension, by the same token, may markedly reduce sex drive in either husband or wife. Overworry or chronic anxiety is more likely to be involved than overexertion. A definite program of recreation and relaxation may be helpful.

Unconscious resentment can distort and inhibit a husband's reactions. If he wants children and she refuses to have them, his sexual indifference may reflect an unconscious wish to punish her. Occasionally a husband avoids sexual activity because he himself doesn't want to have children. For the sex relationship, to be fully rewarding, it must be reciprocal.

The wife's attitude and behavior may be unfavorable. A wife may be overinsistent on ritualistic love-making. She may be hypersensitive and so unconsciously accusatory. She may be acquiescent, but passive. She may be demanding and possessive of her husband's love, without being genuinely responsive to it. Any of these reactions, if consistent, will inevitably result in her husband's discouragement and then indifference.

Many other complications are possible. The habitual drinker, even though he may not drink excessively, gradually loses interest in sexual activity. A conviction, avowed or unconscious, that sex is sinful may impede healthy adjustment in marriage. Occasionally some traumatic experience in childhood leaves a guilt inhibition complex, unrecognized but disabling; this kind of deep-seated difficulty can seldom be resolved except by psychotherapy.

Any factor in self, partner or their interaction which makes for unhappiness or maladjustment in marriage deserves attention. If the combined efforts of husband and wife fail to produce improvement, no time should be lost in seeking expert diagnosis and treatment.

IS LOVE A MIRACLE?

"Not only have I read your page regularly for many years, but also many other articles and books on happy marriage. (Is there such a thing?) I feel most marriage counselors are wrong about love in marriage. All of you picture it as though it could be cultivated, like a plant. You imply that it is a wife's duty to love her husband, and that if she does not, she is selfish, frigid or neurotic.

"The fact is that true love, the eternal, romantic kind of man-woman love, cannot and will not be manufactured. It is a gift from the gods and not many find it. It is accidental, it can grow anywhere, and it can come as suddenly as a flash of lightning.

"We were eighteen and twenty-three when we eloped, and a more unfortunate union was never made. My husband is a fine man, and he loves me. But I can't bear him physically, and never could. We found it out too late. He knows I try, but that isn't enough.

"For seven years I've been in love with another man. I think he still cares for me, but I never see him, and there was never anything definite between us. We could have been very happy had life been different. But I could never leave my husband and children.

"No, you can't manufacture love. I know because I've tried for nearly twenty years. I've given my husband children, made a home he can be proud of, helped our name become respected in the community. But my life is empty because there's no love in it."

This is just one variation on a theme expressed in dozens of the letters that cross my desk every year. In them are many misconceptions, occasional half-truths, and glimpses of yearning for insight. "I could have been happy if life had been different—if I'd married another man. But I don't—can't—love my husband."

Is love a gift? Yes, in the sense that any native talent or inherent human capability is a gift. Some people are "born musicians," "natural athletes." But the athlete's muscles weaken and atrophy if they are not exercised, the musician's talent fails to develop unless it is cultivated, encouraged, used.

So it is with love. Every normal human being is born with the capacity to love and be loved. But it must be cultivated, encouraged, used, if it is to grow and flourish. Otherwise, like the plant deprived of sun and water, it will be stunted and frail, if it survives at all.

Environment, too, is important. A child brought up in an affectionate family, whose parents by word and deed show their love for each other, their children, their friends and neighbors, will in all likelihood develop into an adult capable of giving and inspiring love. But the individual whose childhood was spent in an atmosphere of hostility and distrust, or even mere indifference, suffers from emotional malnutrition. He—or she—may still be able to "learn to love" (though perhaps not to the fullest and richest extent), but the handicap of poor environment and lack of cultivation must be recognized and overcome.

People who lack the capacity to love seldom recognize their limitations. Instead, they are likely to blame the other person involved for failing to inspire love, whether it be a friend, relative or marriage partner. Too often they distort or even terminate the relationship under the delusion that the shortcoming is not their own.

The woman who wrote to us does not contemplate divorce. But she does believe that she has been deprived of romance because she married the wrong man. Instead of musing about the mysterious, the glamorous, the unpredictable aspects of "true love," why not consider the depth and power of a relationship that has endured for twenty years, nourished by the love of only one partner? With insight, effort and a new generosity of spirit she may yet learn to love her husband more than she thinks possible.

ASK YOURSELF:
Am I Too Social?

Without realizing it, a wife can become so absorbed in social activities that they impair her own happiness and the adjustment of her family. Answering these questions "Yes" or "No" may help you to decide if your program is too heavy.

Do You:

1. Entertain once or more weekly?
2. Average three social telephone calls a day?
3. Belong to three or more clubs?
4. Play bridge once or twice a week?
5. Have frequent afternoon callers?
6. Often feel tired and sleepy?
7. Think your husband resents your social activities?

Does Your Husband Believe That You:

8. Share too little time with him?
9. Are a social climber?
10. Spend too much money on social activities?
11. Visit or entertain too much?
12. Involve him in too many social events?
13. Let others influence you too much?
14. Neglect some of your domestic duties?

The average wife answers "Yes" to only four to six of these questions. A score of eight or more suggests that you may be too involved in outside activities. Why not discuss this whole matter with your husband to see if and where changes should be made? This is certainly indicated if your score is ten or more.

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know,
editors you like,
and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

The Union Station in Washington, D.C., one of the loveliest buildings in the U.S.A., opened in November, 1907. Sir Joshua Reynolds' hats with two curving ostrich plumes crowned women's high pompadours, and "walking shoes" had twelve-button cloth tops, patent-leather toes and heels. Salome opened at the Met and so shocked J. P. Morgan that he offered to refund production costs if the management would withdraw the opera.

"Why don't you die now?" a friend wrote Editor Bok after reading the September, 1907, JOURNAL with its two-color cover, 125 fashion pictures, and 56 articles and stories. "You will never surpass it; never equal it." Promises Editor Bok, "We will equal that issue and surpass it too."

"The ideal woman's figure is 5'5" and weight 138 pounds. Bust is 34", and the waist 27"."

"How much sugar may a girl eat?" Answers Dr. Emma Walker, "A quarter of a pound in twenty-four hours. An authority says there is no proof that sugar is harmful to the teeth."

"As a Business Woman Should Not Dress: She wears an elegant 'cast-iron' pompadour, jingly, 'near gold' bracelets, blue beads, clicking French slippers and last night's violets."

"Socks and stockings will wear longer if the heels and toes are rubbed with paraffin."

"Should berry pies be eaten with a knife, fork or spoon?" a perplexed reader wants to know.

"Mimi: As your neck is so flabby, you will improve it by dashing cold water on it night and morning."

The haunting Andante from Tschaikowsky's Symphonie Pathétique is reproduced for music lovers in this issue. There are, as well, two question-and-answer pages conducted by Josef Hofmann (for piano students) and Madame Marchesi (for vocal students).

"Fichu-scarfs (stoles) are once again the fad of the hour, of net or chiffon, edged with deep fringe."

"Excessive tan will ruin your complexion. It is generally the girl who spends a week's vacation in the Catskills who cultivates tan, while the woman who spends her summer yachting takes good care of her skin."

JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Journal forum participant Comtesse de Vilmorin displays her white-and-red and red-and-white interchangeable outfits for Fashion Editor Cushman.

Of all the delightful participants in the forum on good manners which is pictured and reported in this issue, we were most curious to meet the Comtesse de Vilmorin, who had come from Paris especially to take part in the discussion. We'd just seen the entertaining French film called The Earrings of Madame de, with Charles Boyer, Danielle Darrieux and Vittorio de Sica, which was made from her book, Madame de, and we'd naturally been told of her charm and wit, but even so were unprepared for the vivid and fascinating personality we discovered after the forum in Wilhela Cushman's glamorous apartment around the corner from our own trim little retreat. As you see, she was showing Wilhela the wardrobe that Lanvin had made for her trip on a week's notice. Everybody called her "Mademoiselle," including three charming young ladies who turned out to be her daughters, married to Americans with homes in Delaware, West Virginia and Texas. To us, as a man, the climax of Mademoiselle's fashion display was an impressive pair of dresses: one of white silk taffeta with a red coat, red sash, red scarf; the other red, with white coat, white sash, white scarf. . . . You guessed it. The different parts of each were interchangeable, making possible such a variety of costumes that there would be one to fit every occasion the comtesse was likely to encounter. Maybe that's not so novel as it seemed to us, but we thought it was wonderful. We thought Mademoiselle was wonderful too.

We did a disservice to Anne Einselen and her Discovery Department when we said here in September that out of 21,822 unsolicited manuscripts received last year only 16 were accepted. Anne wants you to be more encouraged to try than that figure would imply. Instead, 7 pieces of fiction, 28 articles and 128 miscellaneous fillers were bought.

Things happen occasionally that arouse our curiosity. Take even the "before-and-after" landscaping articles, like the one on page 83. Though each one is a year or more in preparation, the work is done unobtrusively, and in out-of-the-way places. Yet time after time owners tell Richard Pratt how strangers, often from far away, stop to see what the JOURNAL is up to now. "I can understand friends and neighbors asking questions," one puzzled owner remarked, "but when a woman from Wyoming gets out of her car and asks if she can take a cutting back home for a souvenir, or a pebble from the patio, it makes me feel kind of queer."

In photographing for How America Lives, Joe di Pietro not only takes many dramatic pictures but often has to do dramatic things himself to take them. He's had to act the part of a cowpuncher on the range, a sailor in the crow's-nest, a stunt man on a jet plane. Now he's given us this news photo showing him on the high ladder he borrowed from a Texas fire department to get a panoramic picture of a house on an empty prairie. "They wanted to give me the full extension of 150 feet, but I said no. Not that I was afraid to go higher," Joe affirmed; "I just didn't want the house to look too small."

Joe di Pietro rises to the occasion.

Americans in 1955 voluntarily contributed $25,423,557 to the fight on cancer; but the year before we spent $271,780,000 for chewing gum!

Corinna Wildman has made herself the envy of the Workshop by having a bright red featherweight telephone from Sweden installed at her desk in the decorating department. You "take it off the hook" just by lifting it. The dial's on the bottom, very handy; you listen at the top and talk into the base. They come in a lot of other colors, and they couldn't be more pretty, petite or clever. Goodness knows when you'll be able to get them, but we can tell you the people who make them are doing their darnedest, in case we've made you yearn for one.

JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Corinna Wildman calls an old number on her new phone.

Anyone passing close to the food kitchens upstairs never fails to be attracted by tantalizing smells, but there is one fragrance we've never happened to whiff there, and that's the nostalgic one of doughnuts being dipped. So we were delighted recently while vacationing near Corea, Maine, to catch among the fascinating smells of that far-flung fishing village the old familiar one of cooking doughnuts. There was a sign, "Do-nuts," in the yard, but we forgave the spelling when we met Mrs. Julia Stewart in her kitchen on her thirty-fifth dozen for the day and sampled our first fresh delicious doughnut in years, which she had just shaken in a big bag of cinnamon and sugar. We told her she didn't need that sign in the front yard. "That's what the people said who were just here," replied Mrs. S. "In fact, there's their yacht still in the harbor. They anchored to visit the village, and followed their noses right to my kitchen, they told me, a nice young couple. . . . Now sign my customers' book." Which we did, noting the signatures right above our own, of David and Margaret Rockefeller. Anyhow, it explained the yacht in the lobster-boat harbor, and decided us to send a dozen doughnuts to Louella Shouer—to smell as well as taste.

DUNBAR'S COVE

By BORDEN DEAL

They were two strong men, swept into a torrent of emotions and conflicts.

"I can't quit," Crawford said, "any more than he can."

Arlis, loving them both, cried, "What's a woman to do?"

Miss Hattie squatted on her heels in the depths of the thicket, gazing discontentedly at the careful complex of roads she had enjoyed for so long. Her fleet of snuff-bottle cars waited, but somehow, today, she couldn't get launched into the absorption of play. Miss Hattie was twelve years old. She was very thin and neuter under the cotton dress she wore. Her face was thin and sharp and tanned, with large, luminous black eyes.

She reached down tentatively to push one of the snuff bottles into the road. Then she stopped. Last summer she had spent almost every day from breakfast to supper in the thicket. But now —— She nudged the bottle a few inches farther with the toe of her left foot and stopped, listening.

"Miss Hattie! Time to water the menfolks!"

She stood up without a trace of reluctance. "That's for children," she said aloud scornfully, voicing the feeling that had been in her since the moment of entering the thicket.

Arlis, standing on the back porch, was surprised to see Miss Hattie emerge so quickly from her sanctuary. She watched her cross the yard and come up on the porch. "You must be sick, coming the first time you're called."

Miss Hattie said tartly, "Where's my water bucket?"

Arlis laughed, turning back into the kitchen. "I'll get it."

She stopped inside the door, feeling the heat reaching out to her. She was baking light bread; why, on such a hot day, she didn't know, except that her mother had always baked light bread on Tuesday. The kitchen was full of the rich, yeasty odor of the bread. She paused long enough to cut two thick slices from a finished loaf and spread butter and sugar on them.

The kitchen was big and bare, with a wooden safe standing against one wall to hold dishes and food. In the middle of the room was a big circular oak table, laden with her first baking of loaves. It was a kitchen that fitted with Arlis. She was big, rather buxom, with a high-colored, good-humored face, the color heightened by the stove heat. She was twenty years old.

The butter-and-sugar sandwich finished, she got the clean syrup bucket from a nail and went back out on the screened porch where Miss Hattie waited.

"I know your mouth is just awatering for that fresh bread," she said. "Here." She held out the sandwich in one hand, the bucket in the other. "Now you go on. Them men're going to have their tongues hanging out by the time you get there."

"I'm going," Miss Hattie said. "Let me finish my goody first." She ate rapidly, regarding her sister owlishly. "That's mighty good bread, Arlis. Why don't you get married? Any man would favor a woman who bakes light bread ever' Tuesday."

Arlis stared at Miss Hattie. "Get married?" she said. She turned away, going back into the kitchen. "How would I have a chance to get married, with a houseful of menfolks and you to take care of?"

Miss Hattie was interested in her thought. "A fine young man would shore go for your light bread." She stopped, considering. "But then Connie is the only married woman in this house and I don't believe she even knows how to make it, much less got the will and the way."

Arlis snorted. "You'll learn something, young'un. A pretty face and a willing mind will go a lot faster to church than the finest, lightest bread in the world. You go on now."

But Miss Hattie was gone into the dogtrot instead of out into the yard. She walked along the bare-floored corridor and peeked into Connie and Jesse John's room. Connie was sitting in front of the cheap dresser she had made Jesse John order from the catalogue. Miss Hattie watched critically while Connie leaned close to the mirror to apply her lipstick. She was wearing only a slip that shadowed her thin rayon panties underneath. Her slender body looked frail after the robust bulk of Arlis.

"Why do you spread it on so wide?" Miss Hattie said, taking one step into the room.

Connie jumped, smearing the careful job she was doing. She whirled around on the bench. "Good heavens, child. You'll scare the fool out of me yet."

Miss Hattie listened carefully to the tone of her voice, then advanced into the room. Sometimes Connie's voice positively forbade entrance.

"Who're you putting it on for, anyway?" she said. "Jesse John don't like lipstick, noway. I heard him say so."

"It don't matter what Jesse John likes," Connie said harshly. "I don't wear it for his benefit in the first place. Now get on out of here."

Miss Hattie went out to the well in the back yard and let down the chain, hearing the screech of the rusty pulley singing in her ears. The bucket hit bottom and a weight came suddenly on the chain. She strained her thin body against it, her arms beginning to ache by the time the dripping bucket cleared the top of the well. She lifted the bucket down and poured the gallon syrup bucket full. She took time to pour the cooling balance over her dusty feet. Dust became mud under them and she squished her toes delightfully for three deliberate squishes. Then she had to go.

She picked up the bucket and walked through the open barn-lot gate. The men were working far back in the cove and she was hot and tired by the time she came along the creek bank opposite them.

She could see them when she came to the bridge. Knox was plowing Odd John, the fast-stepping horse-mule. He looked up, seeing her coming. "Here comes the water!" he yelled. His voice was as big as he was, broad and heavy but with a surprising light nervousness in it.

"You got time to plow two more rounds before I get to you," Miss Hattie said briskly.

She could see Matthew at the far end of the field, just turning around. Next was Rice, plowing down toward her with Mollie. He looked tall and gaunt and long-legged, confined between the plow handles. "Miss Hattie!" he said. He grinned at her out of his dark, thin face, but she didn't pay him any mind, marching on.

Jesse John didn't even look up at her when she passed. He was plowing Bodoc, the slow, lazy mule that wouldn't ever mind.

great artists of our time contributes a strange and fascinating tale.

Gothic Tale by Isak Dinesen

On a summer afternoon in the forties of the last century, two carriages and a couple of riding horses were making a halt within the glade of a forest near Sarlat in the province of Dordogne, in France. The coachmen and grooms stood beside the horses, feeding them with bits of bread. The one carriage had four horses to it, the other was a light and elegant little phaeton. Of the saddle horses, one was black and the other was gray.

A little river was running through the glade. Near the place where the carriages had stopped it grew wider and shallower, and the grassy banks were trodden down by the cattle that came here to drink.

The sky was high and blue; all round the horizon large, immovable, gray and delicately rosy clouds were towered up, which might forebode thunder on the morrow. But the afternoon was clear and fine. The little river came out gaily from the thicket, through the dark foliage of which the sprinklings of sunlight dropped into it like a drizzle of gold, and here in the open it reflected the blue and gray hues of the summer sky as frankly as a mirror.

Of the people who had come in the carriages and on horseback, two ladies and a couple of nurses were occupied in bathing three young children in the river, and were talking loudly and laughing over it. The children's clothes were strewn upon the grass, together with the ladies' sunshades, thrown upside down, as fine as a flower bed. The young ladies in their slim bodices and voluminous skirts were themselves like peonies on slender stems, gracefully flung upside down upon the riverside.

The mother of the three children, a tall and willowy young woman with a narrow face and big starlike dark eyes, had tied a lace handkerchief round her head, and was holding her naked little son down in the water, and scolding a sturdy young woman in the peasants' dress of the province, who was standing barefooted in the middle of the stream to receive the child. The little boy stared at his mother with her own big dark eyes, very skeptical about the undertaking, and wondering whether the women really did mean him to go.

The two bigger children, little girls of five and six, the one fair and the other dark, were running laughing down the river, their hair all done up in curl papers. One was pulling off the shaggy dark pink flowers of the wild hemp that grew on the sides of the stream, the other was splashing down the river, from time to time throwing herself down flat on her stomach, and beating the water with her feet.

The second young lady, who for driving her smart phaeton had put on an elegant frock in tartan colors—which were highly fashionable—and cut somehow in the style of a young cavalier's costume, walked alongside on the sward like a hen with ducklings, laughing at the children and holding her handkerchief to her mouth. She was a school friend of the young mother, and the widow of a neighbor, and had come from her own house to join the party in the forest.

Meanwhile the two men of the party, who were the husband and the young brother of the dark lady, had walked together slowly to the farther end of the glade. They were neighbors, and had met here to discuss a question of their boundaries, which a change in the course of the river had slightly altered. The ladies had profited by the occasion to make a picnic in the woods. They were talking about poachers, and were waiting for the arrival of the old keeper whom they had summoned here to meet them. A gang of gypsies and poachers had for some time given them much trouble.

"If only," said Philippe, the eldest, "we could get rid of the miller's widow at Masse-Bleue. I remember the first time I saw her, eight years ago, when she was only a child. I met her in the forest, and because she was such an uncommonly graceful child I tried to stop her and make her talk with me. It really seems to me now, when I think of the scene, that I was holding out my stick to a smooth little viper that was trying to get round it—indeed, she was hissing at me, maneuvering to the right and the left."

As he was speaking, the old keeper arrived, accompanied by two spotted long-haired dogs. He had to cross the river; in the middle of it he took off his cap to them. They walked down together, and came from the mellow golden light of the glen into the green and cool shade of the forest. After they had discussed the question of the stream, Philippe addressed a few questions to the old man on the gypsies. The old servant's face grew dark.

"If only," he said, "we could get rid of the miller's widow of Masse-Bleue. It was a strange thing in the old miller to go and marry a gypsy girl, and the whole pack is thick as inkle weavers. Where a snake gets its head in, it will soon get the whole body. They all know that she will shelter them if they get into trouble, and she has many guests down at the old mill." He stole a glance at Philippe, not daring to give course to his feelings about the gypsies, fed by a lifelong struggle, for he knew that the young lady of the manor held a protecting hand over the tribe. The gypsies possessed a position of their own on the estate. Although they came and went, and had no real home, a certain section or tribe reckoned themselves, and were reckoned by the masters of Champmeslé, as belonging to their land. They gave much trouble, but still their lords would have allowed no one from the outside to interfere with them, as if they were a nuisance strictly their own.

"Tell me, Claude," said Philippe thoughtfully, "do you believe that the people had anything to do with the disappearance of old Father Bernhard?"

The keeper wiped his face. "As God liveth, my lord," he said, "they caused his death. But if you can say that they killed him, that the devil only knows. This is how it was: These people, who do not believe in the Lord, do no more wait for His hour, but when they are tired of their life, they just finish CONTINUED ON PAGE 177

THE Executioners

Could they do what the law was helpless to do for them—destroy a mad killer before he destroyed their world?

By JOHN D. MacDONALD

CONCLUSION Carol had been at the hospital for nearly an hour when Sam arrived at one-thirty. She and Nancy were in the semiprivate room with Jamie when Sam walked in. Sam kissed her. She looked completely under control, but he felt the trembling of her mouth as he kissed her. Nancy had a subdued, troubled look. Jamie's face, against the pillow, was just pale enough under the tan to give him a greenish look. His left arm was bandaged, and he looked proud and excited.

"Hey, I didn't make a sound when they sewed it up, and I got six stitches."

"Does it hurt?"

"Sort of, but not bad. Gosh, I can't wait to tell the kids at home. A real bullet. It hit my arm and went through the shed next to the mess hall, right in one side and out the other, zowie, and when they find it I can have it after the sheriff is through with it. I'd like it on one of those little wooden things under glass in my room."

"Who did it?"

"Heck, who knows? That man, I guess. That Cady. A lot of the kids didn't even hear any shot. I didn't. I wish I'd heard it. He was a long way away, up on Shadow Hill someplace, the sheriff thinks."

Sam began to understand the picture. "Tell me about it, Jamie, from the beginning."

Jamie looked uncomfortable. "Well, I goofed up. I snitched Mr. Menard's shaving bomb and I was going to let Davey Johnstone have it right in the chops and then I was going to sneak it back. But I got caught. So I got ten days of doing pots, and this was the last day. Everybody hates pots. You got to use steel wool. I got ten whole days because it was sort of like stealing, even though it really wasn't. So you do the pots out by the shed. There's a faucet there and, oh, this was about nine-thirty and I was doing the breakfast pots and I was nearly done almost.

"I was just standing there, sort of looking at the last one, and bam! I thought some joker had gone in the shed and hit it with something to scare me. Then my arm felt all hot and funny. I looked down and there was blood squirting out of it, squirting all over. I yelled as loud as I could and ran for Mr. Menard's cottage and other kids saw all the blood and they were running and yelling, too, and they put a tourniquet on it. And then it all of a sudden started to hurt something terrible. And I cried, but not very much. By then Tommy went and got Nancy and then the sheriff came and we all rode over here in the sheriff's car about maybe a hundred miles an hour with the siren going. Boy, I wish I could do that again when my darn arm wasn't hurting."

Sam turned to Carol. "What happens now?"

"Doctor Beattie said he'd like to have him stay here overnight, and he should be all right to travel tomorrow. He gave him some whole blood."

"There's going to be a scar," Jamie said fervently. "A real bullet scar. Will it hurt when it's going to rain?"

"I think you have to have the bullet in there, son."

"Anyway, no other kid I know has a bullet scar."

A smiling nurse came in and said, "Time for this wounded veteran to have his pink pill and a long nap."

"Heck, I don't need any nap."

"When can we see him again, nurse?" Carol asked.

"At five, Mrs. Bowden."

They walked to the stairs and went down to the hospital lobby. Carol, her face ghastly, turned toward Sam and said in a voice so low Nancy couldn't overhear, barely moving her bloodless lips, "Now what? Now what? When does he kill one of them?"

"Please, honey."

"Daddy, Sheriff Kantz is coming with Tommy," Nancy said.

"Take your mother over to that couch and sit there with her, Nancy, please."

The sheriff was a rangy man who wore boots and tan riding pants and khaki shirt. He had an outdoor look about him, a gun belt, a wide-brimmed hat in his hand. He shook hands slowly, almost thoughtfully. His voice was nasal, with a tired sound about it.

"Guess we can talk over in that corner, Mr. Bowden. Sure, you sit in, Tommy."

They pulled three chairs closer together. "I'll tell you my end, Mr. Bowden, and then I'd like to ask you a couple questions. First off, it looks like the range was about seven hundred yards. And downhill. Take a good rifle and a good 'scope and a knowledgeable man and it isn't a tough shot at all. I imagine if the wind wasn't cutting up too much, I could put nearly every shot in a circle about half again as big as a pie plate. If it was deer season, I'd have maybe a different idea about this. Your boy's arm was close to his side. The wind was a little gusty from the south. The boy was facing east. So it looks like one of those gusts drifted that slug over a few inches. Nobody was trying to scare the boy. They made a pretty good try at killing him. If he'd put his slug say two and a half inches farther to the right, that boy would have been dead."

SYNOPSIS OF PART I Lawyer Sam Bowden had a beautiful wife, three children, a much-loved dog. His world was very good. Then, out of the past, came a man bent on destroying that world: Max Cady, a powerful, half-mad brute whom Sam's testimony had once convicted of raping a fourteen-year-old girl. (Sam's daughter, Nancy, was just fourteen now.) Because Cady's twisted mind had a terrifying cunning, Sam found that he could produce no legal proof of the man's murderous intent—and without legal proof there was nothing the law could do. "Must we sit and wait, until he kills our children, one by one?" Carol cried after Cady succeeded in the vicious—and unprovable—poison killing of their dog. And that was what Cady meant to do, kill the dog, the children, Carol, Sam himself. Desperate, Sam removed his family from Cady's reach. Carol and Bucky, the youngest, went to a resort town miles away. Nancy and Jamie, the middle one, went to camp. They would be safe, Sam thought, while he alone searched for the answer to the life-or-death riddle of Max Cady—if there was an answer. Then, in the coldest fear of his life, he heard a voice say over the telephone, "You'd better come, Mr. Bowden. Jamie's been shot."

"Not murder," he said.

WHY I

My Husband

It is as though we had tapped the current flowing quietly but with EDITORS' NOTE: We hear more of marriages that don't work than of marriages that do—more of love that is meanly lost than of abiding love. A divorce is still news; a successful marriage may seem dull. Perhaps it is partly because no one can say finally what love, in its essence, is; scientists describe electricity by describing what it does, and electricity is incomparably simpler than love.

When we invited Journal readers to write us on the subject "Why I Love My Husband" or "Why I Love My Wife" we asked not for eulogies nor for definitions of love but for "a candid picture of a human being who is lovable because he or she is alive in a way that is special and meaningful to you." Also, "If you could change him (her) how would you?"

We expected to get a few hundred letters. We did not expect thousands. Lawyers, factory workers, doctors, farmers, ministers, and their wives, from every state, from Hawaii, Denmark, South America, married a few months, or married fifty years, have written—telling us that love for them distinguishes

Not Tall, Dark and Handsome

Dear Editors: My copy of the JOURNAL arrived today and as usual I dropped everything and sat down to look through it to get a general idea of what wonderful things would be waiting for me to read when the children are tucked in their beds. I didn't get beyond page four. When I read the note inviting readers to write a letter on the subject nearest and dearest to my heart, I couldn't resist. I have never written any kind of story or fan letter in my life, but since I too am so tired of hearing about misunderstood husbands and mistreated wives, I decided I would write you about my feelings on the subject. "Why I Love My Husband" is a subject so complex and yet so simple that it would take months to write if you were to give a true and complete story, but I shall do the best I can in a much shorter length of time.

When I was married at eighteen, I could only think of marriage in terms of romantic nights and blissful dreamy days. It didn't take long for that theory to fly out the window. Eleven years later, I have yet to receive my first unexpected bouquet of flowers or an impulsive box of candy. It would just about take an act of Congress to get my husband to help with dishes or scrub a floor. He's not what anyone would call an ideal husband. Like a million other guys in the world, he belongs to the "leave them where you drop them" school when it comes to his clothes. He leaves ashes everywhere except in the ash tray. Al is not tall, dark and handsome. He doesn't possess a worldly air or distinguished look. You would probably never notice him in a crowd—but I would.

Love isn't any one thing. It's a combination of many. It is more of a feeling that you share. What can I say to express my heartfelt thanks when I need a shoulder to cry on and his is there waiting? What words are there to tell of the magic that takes place after putting in a day when my cake falls, the washing machine breaks and floods the kitchen floor and the children are too covered with measles to go out but not too sick to fight and argue all day, and I wish for the millionth time that I could leave home forever, and suddenly it's six o'clock and Al is home, everything's all right? I can laugh over the cake, the children quiet down as he reads them a story and, well, the floor had to be mopped anyway. He brings home the confidence that tomorrow will be a better day and all things can be met, as long as we're together.

Eleven years of my life have been spent with this man I know so well and love so much. Eleven years of cooking, cleaning, bringing up children, loving and fighting and just plain living. When I think of my marriage now, I don't think of moonlight and roses, I think instead of quiet talks over a cup of coffee, of big, strong, gentle hands always willing to help a child or a stray animal, of friendship that can be counted on to last forever, of the kindness and sympathy that flow from one member of the family to the other, of the whispered "I love you" I hear every night before I go to sleep.

What would I change in my husband? Well, if I had to answer that question without giving it much thought, I would say I'd like him to be neater, more of a help around the house, and it would also have seemed important to have him spend a little time getting acquainted with his suit—he does have one, you know! But since I have had time to think about it—I know you may not believe me—I wouldn't like to change him at all. The reason for this is simply that I feel in my heart that picking up after him and cooking and keeping a home he can be proud of and doing my best to be a good wife and mother is my way of showing him the deep and ever-faithful love I feel for him, and if he should start changing he would be taking away my only means of expressing a love and devotion too deep for just words.

He may not be, by other standards, an ideal husband, but when CONTINUED ON PAGE 126

SO MANY WAYS TO SAY "LOVE"—HERE

"To begin with, he's the sort of person I'd like to be if I'd been born a John instead of a Betty."

"Before our marriage, my husband posed as a perfectly ordinary guy, which was rather clever of him, for I soon found out he was neither."

"Because he finds minutes to lie on the ground with four small children and watch the progress of an inchworm ——"

"I love him because tonight, and every night the moment he walks in the door our house becomes a home, complete."

"How many wives get a red front door as a present on the birth of a daughter? . . . Or $2.00 worth of licorice whips, my favorite candy, as reward for cleverly arranging to give him a son?"

My Wife

e from mere existence. About love their world rns. Merely by reading these letters, one can often l the force of love prickling the skin like a charge electricity.

Many said, "Even if you don't print my letter l always be grateful to you for giving me the opportnity to put down in words what I have felt—but nd it hard to say."

Our editors laughed and wept—they have new rs in their eyes. To select the best was almost imssible. Hundreds seemed to us in many ways as compelling, as vividly expressed; thousands revealed the same joyous devotion as the ten we print here.

Implicit in all these letters is the ancient wisdom of love: that you must give more than you get and then you will get more than you give; that love is generous, not critical, that love serves and cherishes, and is kind. Also that love is realistic—"I am not perfect; why should I expect perfection from my mate?" Each is a story, a fragment of American life, a part of that powerful stream flowing unseen, nourishing and sustaining our great country.

BRUCE AND BEATRICE GOULD

I Was Pretty Sore

Dear Editors: My wife took a long time writing a letter on why she loved me, so I decided to dash off a few words on "Why I Love My Wife" in nothing flat. If a man doesn't know why he's been married to the same woman nearly thirty years, something is radically wrong.

My wife is the world's worst cook and still can't boil water without burning up the teakettle. But why should I give a hang about her cooking when she can bag as many or more pheasants than I can on a hunting trip? Any fish that nibbles at the hook when she's holding the rod is headed straight for the frying pan. Her idea of a good time is pitching our leaky old tent up in the north woods and sleeping on a cot that feels like a brick slab after the first hour. Since that's also my idea of fine sport, and since I'm a whiz at cooking over a campfire, her lack of skill in this department doesn't mean a thing.

She isn't my "dream girl" either, thank goodness. If I remember right, that imaginary creature was a frilly doll, so helpless and emptyheaded she'd let me do her thinking for her. Although, being an only child, my wife was spoiled and pampered, after we married that girl raised four children, washed, ironed, cleaned and scrubbed, and still says she had fun doing it.

She has a mind of her own too. When my business failed she got a job—the first she'd ever had—worked nights, took care of the home and children during the day, and kept up that pace for two years. I was pretty sore about her working to help pay off my debts and we scrapped a lot in those days. Unless this letter gets printed she'll never know that all the while I was fussing at her I loved her so much it hurt.

Whenever she gets tied up on some committee or civic project I tease her about being a "do-gooder" but actually I'm proud of her interest in people and the community.

Now that the children are grown and only the eighteen-year-old is at home, my wife could take it easier. Instead, she's taken on a career job and still helps balance our budget. We may never recoup the money I lost twenty years ago, but I love my wife because she makes me feel like the richest man on earth.

EARLE F. KYLE, SR. Minneapolis, Minnesota

The only major change I'd make in my wife is her house-cleaning habits. I save a few newspapers, magazines and clippings for future reference, and other little odds and ends that always come in handy sooner or later. But when my wife cleans, she cleans with a vengeance, and everything she considers junk lands in the trash barrel. If a man can't store a few things around his own home, where can he put them? I've been looking for the answer to that question since 1927.

Never Discouraged

Gentlemen: When the roof is leaking and the car fender has been crumpled, when carpet beetles have chewed one corner of the living-room rug and the dog another, when the hot-water heater has succumbed to a perforated ulcer and the children have been so ornery that I'm ready to knock their heads together, Josie remains calm—wonderfully, miraculously calm.

Often during the fourteen years that Josie and I have been married I have tried to analyze her calmness to see whence it originates and how it has affected our six children and me. I have asked such questions as: What is it in her make-up which enables her to laugh when one of the children cooks a sliver of soap in the toaster? How can she talk so hypnotically to a child with a severed scalp artery? Or how can she bring about a swift, friendly cease-fire between two boys who are bent on bludgeoning each other?

An inner calm such as Josie's doesn't come from barbiturates or CONTINUED ON PAGE 123

She had vowed

And now she had found him . . .
but did she want him?

By HAMLEN HUNT

They had been roommates for four years and had advanced to a corner room that looked out onto the miniature lake belonging to Martens College. T. J. came in, a little surprised at how anxious she felt about telling Andy her news. So she got straight at it. Whatever T. J. feared, she flew at, eyes closed, feathers flying, like a fighting cock, Andy said.

"I'll be the first one to make the announcement tonight, after all," T. J. said.

Andy did not make the response T. J. had expected. She stood near the little motherly armchair they had bought together, a dollar down and a dollar a week forever—they were to draw lots when the time came to break up college housekeeping a few weeks hence. Andy stared out at the lake which flung copper light into their room.

"I thought Bull was taking oral examinations somewhere today," she said.

"He is," T. J. said.

"Then you weren't out with him," Andy said.

"No," T. J. said.

She stood in a dancer's position of relaxation, but it was training that produced the effect; actually, she was as tense as a piece of metal. Her hands felt clenched, though they were not. She could feel her muscles begin to quiver with her effort to be natural. She tried to tell herself she couldn't understand why they should be making such a thing of this. But all she could think of was how different this conversation was from the first one she and Andy had ever had.

They had been assigned as freshman roommates in a room so small Andy's first suggestion was that perhaps they could find a bottle of diminisher somewhere—For-mula X—and one of them drink it. They had already exchanged vital statistics. Andy was nearly three years older than seventeen-year-old T. J. There had been a long illness at home and she had stayed to run the household while her mother was dying.

"My parents are divorced," T. J. said. "That's why I intend to be married by commencement. I want a home to go to."

"Won't studying four years get in your way?" Andy asked politely.

"You don't understand," T. J. said. "You must not have heard that divorced children are terribly anxious about security." She rattled along. She had no first name, only the two initials, in the sometime Southern custom. Those who pried were told either that these stood for her parents' names—Tom and Judy—or that they stood for Tia Juana, where she had carelessly allowed herself to be born one weekend. Her last name was Dickinson. "I came to college because it gives me four years," she told Andy. "I can look and look. There won't be any problem. I'll have plenty of proposals to choose from."

"I can just see you, biting into them like chocolates, and putting back the orange creams," Andy murmured.

They both laughed, already quite sure of each other in that mysterious exchange of friendship that led whoever it was to say we do not make our friends, we find them. T. J. was strewn carelessly, like an old mink stole, over one of the narrow beds. Absently, explaining that she was a dancer, she raised herself from both ends simultaneously and rocked in a compact U. She said:

"People take you more seriously if you belong somewhere. Being a dancer takes time and it's an uncertain living. I'll have to have a home. I've got to get married!"

"Operation Marry-I-Must," Andy said, and added, "I can tell I'm just going to be worn out with girlish confidences. You must bring me every dance program with those little pencils and tassels intact, hear?"

T. J. laughed. "It does sound a bit Victorian," she said, and they were the more amused because of the way T. J. looked—rather small, with the neatest possible bones, and a very sturdy sort of delicate air. Her face was wide, set in black hair brushed until it looked like sealskin, and her most striking feature was her lapis-lazuli eyes set in black lashes.

Andy said, "Suppose you don't find the one you want before you graduate?"

"I'll be married before I leave here," T. J. said.

She looked over at Andy, a rounded, honey-colored girl with the gift of repose. Andy opened her eyes and said, "Well, I suppose we must leave no social opportunity unturned. I've been reading the literature here." She patted the sliding mound of booklets, view books, book lists, Advice to Freshmen, and so on, with which Martens College (a small educational institution emphasizing the role of Fine Arts) welcomed newcomers. "I suppose we'd better go to the Freshman Get-Acquainted Dance," she said gravely. "It will get us in training for the Sophomore Japanese Lantern Outdoor Dance."

T. J. agreed. "We must participate to the utmost."

From then on, their friendship progressed in full confidence. If they occasionally practiced their emotions on each other, the emotions were no less real for this rehearsal. Each sieved out for the other much that was false or mistaken in their personal judgments, love

Are Good Manners important today?

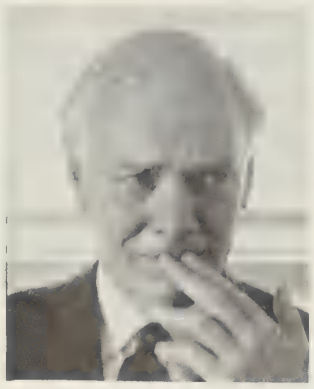
A Journal Forum discusses what manners are good, when they are important.

Meeting at dinner in the JOURNAL's New York Workshop, some of the forum group discussed manners as they sought one another's further acquaintance. In the spirit of President A. Whitney Griswold, of Yale, who said, of conversation, "It is a fruitful and inspiring search for virtue and wisdom . . . which takes place among friends in a congenial atmosphere," they tentatively explored the areas of mutual agreement before probing differences, in preparation for the full-scale meeting the next day. Left to right around the table: former diplomat Paul Hyde Bonner; Margaret Hickey; poet Ogden Nash; French novelist Louise de Vilmorin; Bruce Gould; Joan Younger; British former editor of Punch Malcolm Muggeridge; and (with back to camera) Beatrice Gould.

Which country has the best manners, which the worst? What are manners, anyway? Are they changing under the impact of democracy? For better, or worse? Is a goodhearted man naturally well-mannered? Is it possible to enjoy a bore, or a boor?

Meeting around a table in the JOURNAL's Rockefeller Center Workshop, a distinguished group of writers, wits and practical observers of life from France and England as well as in the United States discussed these questions. Why do we like to see some people come into a room—why do we shun others? Are good manners growing increasingly important in our increasingly complex society? Two new guests had joined the morning group: Mrs. Price Post, who as Emily Post is America's great authority on etiquette—a woman now in her eighties with a gentle, kindly, grandmotherly face—and Mrs. Robert Meyner, formerly Helen Stevenson, young wife of New Jersey's governor, a handsome woman in her twenties. Participating in this discussion were JOURNAL editors Bruce Gould and Beatrice Blackmar Gould, with moderator and associate editor Margaret Hickey, and writer Joan Younger, formerly of the JOURNAL staff. The morning began with a question from the moderator.

MISS HICKEY: Mrs. Post, what do you think is the essence of good manners?



MRS. POST: Well, it is not a matter of holding your fork one way or another. It's thoughtfulness, kindness, courtesy. You must be able to see what the other person is like and to find ways to show him you like him. Consideration for the feelings of others. That is the real importance of manners.

MRS. GOULD: It is hard to analyze the reasons why, but it seems to me that among young people in America today there is a feeling that good manners are undemocratic—that they make for invidious social distinctions. Because we believe one man is as good as another, many have the idea that etiquette or schooling in manners may suggest an attempt to be special ——

MLLE. DE VILMORIN (She is superbly dressed in a black Lanvin suit and an emerald-and-pearl necklace, and she is obviously astonished at Mrs. Gould's remark): But manners are extremely important! (she exclaims in a throaty, delicately accented voice.) People give a great treasure to their children in teaching them good manners. They teach them the rules of the game. That is not to say real life—not love, passion or domestic things—but the rules of the game that you have to play with people that you only know superficially, people you meet in a doorway, or sit next to at dinner, people whom you work with, or entertain. If you have no manners you make them ill at ease. You make things extremely disagreeable.

MRS. POST: You have hit the nail on the head. Good manners is getting on beautifully with people always, never hurting someone else's feelings and yet never forcing anyone to notice you are around.

It's your kindness. It's your thought. It's your real interest. You don't think about what you are doing; you are trying to think how much is interesting in what OGDEN NASH (Despite his success with sophisticates, looks like a teacher. He even has a touch of doomsday oom about him, flashed through with humor): There's a rallel between what mademoiselle said and what obert Frost said about writing free verse. He said, Writing free verse is like playing tennis without a net," d I think life without manners is a game without les, and absolute chaos.

MRS. MEYNER (She looks as fresh as though she'd just en unwrapped, straightforward, modern): I'm sorry, it are we talking about etiquette—or the attitude be- nd it? It seems to me we have been talking about perficial aspects of manners. Manners are basically nd fundamentally just consideration of other people. ood manners is the art of making people feel easy.

MISS HICKEY: Yes, we have two levels of manners efore us. One is this deeper thing—which Aristotle lled "nobility of soul" and which he said expressed self in kindness toward other people. And there is so the way this is shown—what mademoiselle calls the rules of the game, or the code, and Mrs. Post calls etiquette. Now the question of whether the connection between the two is automatic—Mrs. Post, do you think the good heart is enough or is some training necessary?

MRS. POST: A kind heart and complete ignorance of the rules do not go very well together, because a person who seems to be rude even if he does not mean to be is not pleasing the other person. It takes more than good intentions.

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: A good heart makes the game sweeter, but when it comes to somebody who has no heart or who is disagreeable really, we are tremendously grateful that he observes the rules of the game. I could cry when people are not kind—and what is kindness? Good manners. I believe in this code. I believe in it.

MR. GOULD: But if this is so—that manners are simply kindness—why is there today such a suspicion of politeness? We frequently find people today, cultivated, well-educated people who are suspicious of good manners.

MR. NASH: I think perhaps the same kind of people who are suspicious of CONTINUED ON PAGE 156

FIVE FUNDAMENTAL DON'TS

1. Don't be ugly.
Don't sprawl, sit; don't chaw, chew; don't pick, poke, scratch and pry at yourself when with others.

2. Don't interrupt.
Don't break into conversations, into groups, into private thoughts and personal matters.

3. Don't be ungrateful.
Say "Thank you, God"; "Thank you, mother"; "Thank you, dear," and thank you each and every one.

4. Don't be pushy.
Not with your body, your hands, your feet, your complaints, your problems, your food or your opinions.

5. Don't be self-centered and stupid.
Learn the rules of the game, and when in Rome do as the Romans do, gracefully.

HOW TO BE YOUNG GRACEFULLY

By OGDEN NASH

Having reached the fifth of those Seven Ages,
I consider myself one of Nature's sages,
And, mumbling around my remaining tooth,
Recommend a few rules of thumb to youth.
Let's begin, as I believe we can,
With the motto, "Manners makyth man."
The corollary we can't escape,
That lack of manners makyth ape.
Child, you may not be an Endymion,
But neither need you be a Simian.
Learn to accept the facts of life,
Even from your father and his wife,
Who you'll one day find were in the groove,
And, as of now, have more sense than you've.
One fact as actual as hunger
Is that older people know more than younger;
Whatever you face, they've been all through it;
Give heed when they tell you how not to do it.
They also control, for better or worse,
Strings if not of the apron, still the purse,
And if your ear I may whisper a word to,
Your elders appreciate being deferred to.
They don't appreciate yahoo whoops,
Or sidewalk-monopolizing groups,
They don't appreciate costumes sloppy,
No matter which brand of Brando you copy,
Or finding themselves, at the prandial board,
Either interrupted or ignored.
They know if you go too soon too steady
You'll join them as parents before you're ready.
Though you've grown too old for your elders to spank you,
They like the sound of "Please" and "Thank you."
It's not a sign of approaching senility
When they try to teach you common civility;
The civil youngster's chance is a stronger one
For not only a better life, but a longer one,
Since the driver who with Death is the flirtiest
Is the rudest, raucousest and discourtiest,
One even Pravda could hardly applaud,
A nuisance at home and a boor abroad.
Don't sneer, or reject my words grimacefully,
I append the secret of being young gracefully;
The recipe calls for two ingredients:
Thoughtfulness and, alas, obedience.
Follow this, and you'll hear your parents purr,
For you'll be the marvel they think they were.

FASHIONS with an AMERICAN FUTURE

Paris fashions and details are always a source of excitement to women who love to plan ahead and who are charmed by a fresh idea. Shorter skirts? Perhaps an inch, depending on height and figure. Disappearing waistlines? Yes, if you like the new easy, indefinite silhouette—otherwise high, low or middling. The chemise dress is the essence of simplicity, the loose fleecy greatcoat wonderful to wear over anything. Watch for young middy dresses in all fabrics, flattering chin-high collars, fur-lined coats, many-piece costumes that serve many purposes. Beautiful porcelain blues lead all colors—then beiges, damask-rose red, bronzy greens. Tweeds dominate and charm, rough and rustic to light and fine-spun.

Here we show you some of the delightful possibilities that the new fabrics offer the home sewer this autumn. We love the classic look of a silk-linen shirt with a gray flannel button-front skirt, but on the other hand we can't resist the gaiety of bright flowered challis with wool jersey. We are partial to the look of a bright braid-bound jacket, wonderful over a black sheath, or with a pleated jersey skirt and a soft white crepe blouse, but can't overlook the coziness (not to mention its fashion news) of a great blanket-plaid skirt. Small details are important too. Take, for instance, the small brass coin buttons, wool fringe dyed to match wool jersey, or a foulard Paisley cummerbund. Can this Marriage be Saved?

Marriage counselors do not try to force anyone either to stay with a marriage or to destroy it. They help the client to see all sides of it, to think it through, so when he finally makes his decision—and no one can properly make it for him—he will make the right decision and will not say ten years later, as so many do, "If I'd known ten years ago what I know now, I would never have got a divorce." In most marriages (such as those described in this series) that seem at first sight to be not merely unsatisfactory but almost impossible, there are many great values, many unrealized assets, that need only to be developed and conserved. The client, irritated by relatively small difficulties or even by nothing more than his own faulty personality, is in danger of disregarding these great values and destroying the marriage on what will later be recognized as trivial grounds that could easily have been removed. Better preparation for marriage, and greater use of marriage counseling afterward, would prevent most of the broken homes, now numbering around 400,000 each year in the United States. . . . The counselor (at the American Institute of Family Relations) in this case was Dr. Bruce T. Jewell. PAUL POPENOE, SC.D., General Director

DON GRUTZ

"Tracy and I were asleep when the phone rang. I answered it. Tracy got the telephone away from me and persuaded Carol to hang up. But he couldn't persuade me that she was one of his customers' girl friends—I thought she was his girl friend. We talked until morning—and I discovered I was right."

SHE: "I'm in no mood to forgive him twice. Infidelity isn't the only trouble with our marriage. Tracy is a wonderful guest, a wonderful host. Those are endearing qualities—in a bachelor."

HE: "I've climbed high in a highly competitive business. In my business, I meet women, lots of them. I know I shouldn't have stepped out on Elise, even with an important girl, and maybe I shouldn't have lied to her. I told the lies only when I was cornered and then I told as few as possible. I wish she could be proud of me."

ELISE TELLS HER SIDE: "I forgave my husband's infidelity the first time," said Elise, who was thirty-three years old and the pretty, fair-haired mother of three. Twelve years married to a prosperous salesman, she was tastefully but economically dressed. "I'm in no mood to forgive him twice. Infidelity isn't the only trouble with our marriage, although Tracy, an incurable optimist, denies we have any troubles at all. To this day he declares that he couldn't wish for a better wife than I or better children than ours.

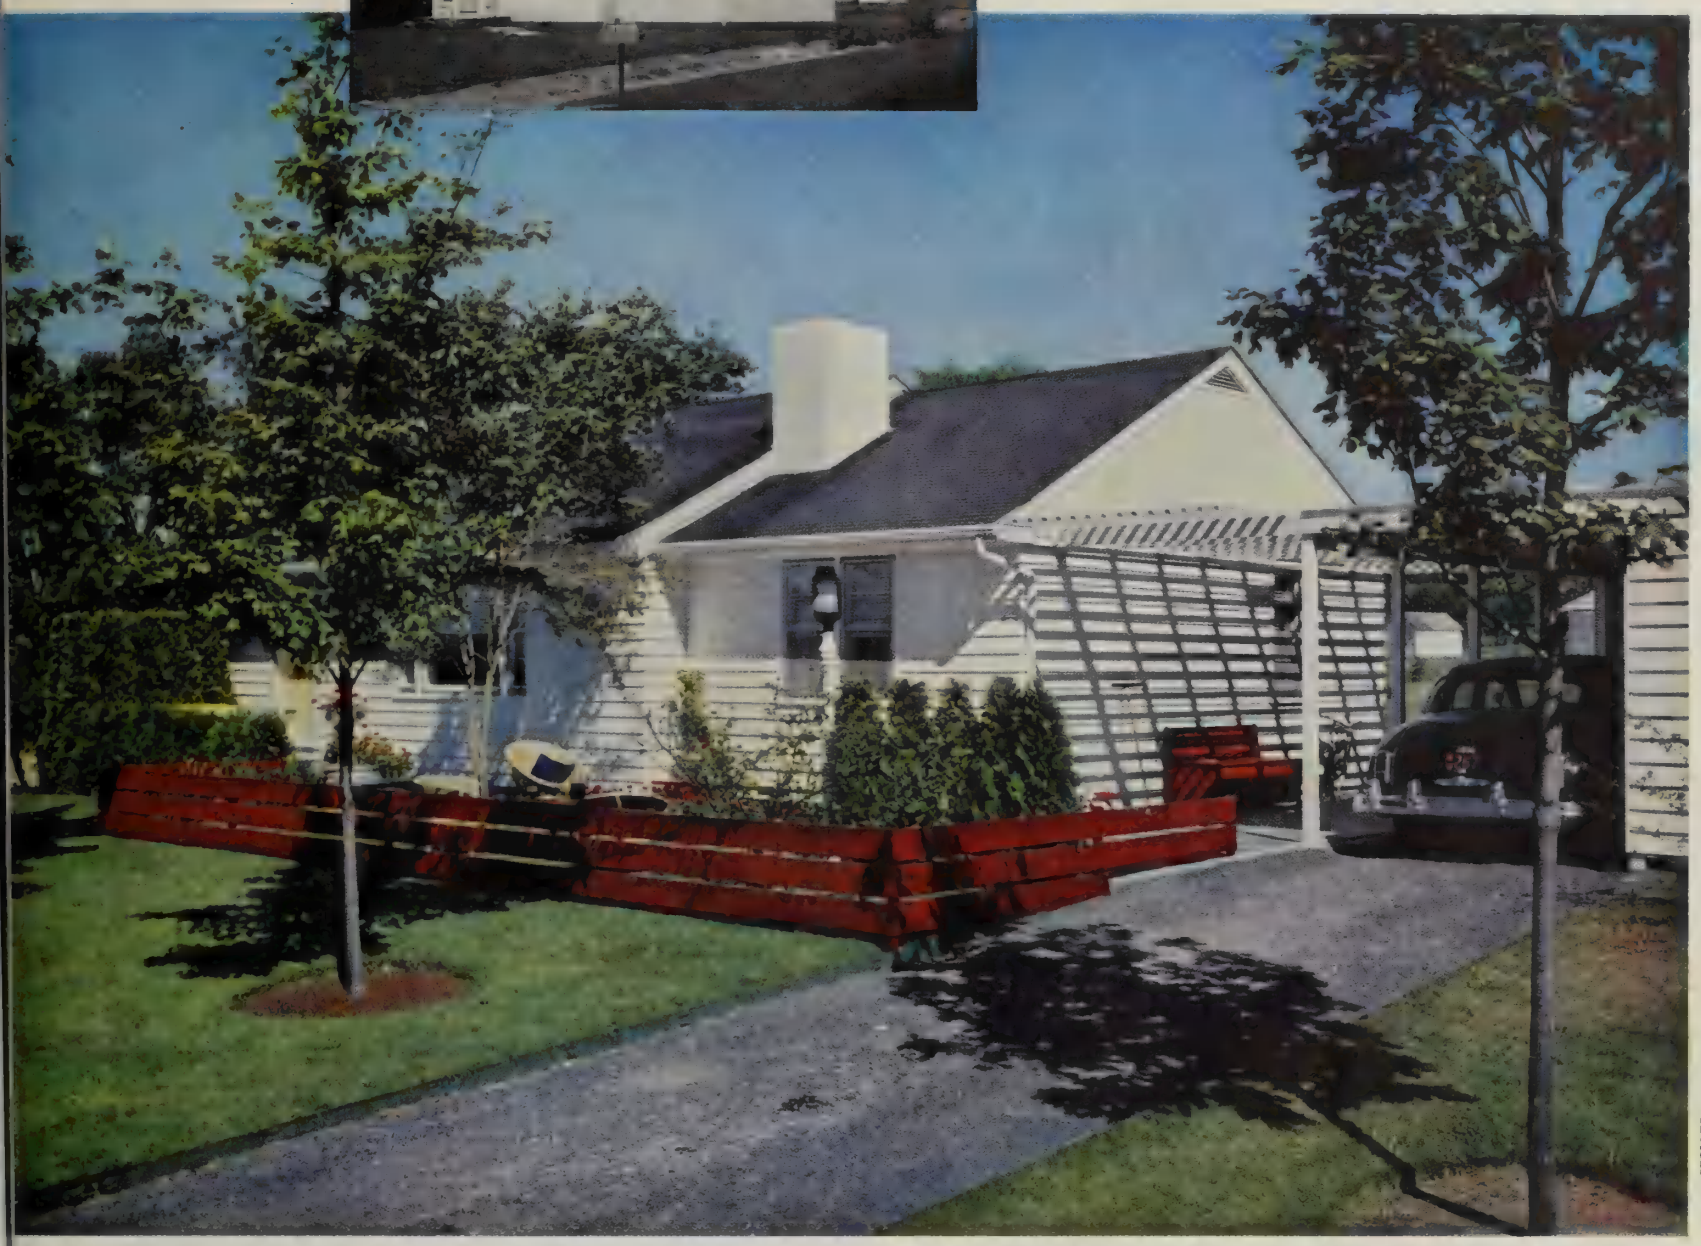
"Our children, two boys and a girl, are pretty special, if I say so myself. I once thought that Tracy, who is full of fun and proficient at any sport you can mention, might develop into a good father. Indeed, I thought he and I had an almost ideal marriage except for his wretched job. Tracy sells industrial machinery. His work is well paid—he averages around fifteen thousand dollars annually—but he is away from home nearly half the time. He insists he broke his marriage vows only because of loneliness. It is almost impossible for me to believe him.

"For one thing, I doubt he has ever spent a lonely moment on or off the road. He isn't the type who mopes and broods in an empty room. He can't be fifteen minutes in a town before he's busy on the telephone, calling this one, complimenting that one, passing on the latest joke. In half an hour I've seen him set up a week of appointments. He belongs to a dozen professional and social clubs. He plays golf he plays billiards, he plays bridge, he rides horseback, he swims. He's a good listener, a good conversationalist too.

"Everybody wants him for lunch, for cocktails, for dinner, for the talking, singing, dancing afterward. He's the first to arrive at a party, the last to leave. When he joins a group you can see both the men and the women brighten, sit up in their chairs and think, 'Well, now the fun can begin.' Tracy is a wonderful guest, a wonderful host. Those are endearing qualities—in a bachelor.

"The first girl he got entangled with—her name was Carol—managed a large motel near Tucson, Arizona. That was about four years ago. Most wives would have sensed something was wrong long before I became suspicious. A couple of the other salesmen used to kid around, telling me that my husband was a wolf, that I ought to put a ball and chain on him. I laughed. I didn't dream I was hearing the truth. I wanted to trust Tracy, I suppose. My mother's nagging and complaining and her unjust suspicions drove my father to the divorce court when I was in grade school; as a child I decided I wouldn't be that kind of wife.

"Both my mother and my older sister used to say I was too trusting and naïve. My mother-in-law—I get on better with her than with my own mother—said flatly that no man could be trusted, her son included, but I discounted her cynicism, thinking it could be explained by her own experience. Tracy's father wasn't a faithful husband. His conduct bitterly humiliated Tracy as a small boy; he sided with his mother and despised his father. I couldn't conceive that he would follow in his father's footsteps.



"But then one night Tracy and I dined with a wealthy customer who owned an Arizona ranch. While the men talked business the wife showed me photographs of their ranch. Among them was a snapshot of Tracy riding out of their corral with a strange girl. When I asked some questions, the hostess said the girl was a neighboring rancher's daughter, but she sounded embarrassed. Later I spoke to Tracy and he looked me straight in the eye and declared he couldn't recall anything about the girl. It was Carol, of course. He was squiring her around among his out-of-town friends. At times they were even taking trips together. Everybody knew about the situation except me.

"A few months after that dinner Tracy told me he had to attend a convention in Dallas, Texas. During his absence Johnnie, our older boy, broke his arm. It was a simple fracture, but I telegraphed the Dallas hotel CONTINUED ON PAGE 113

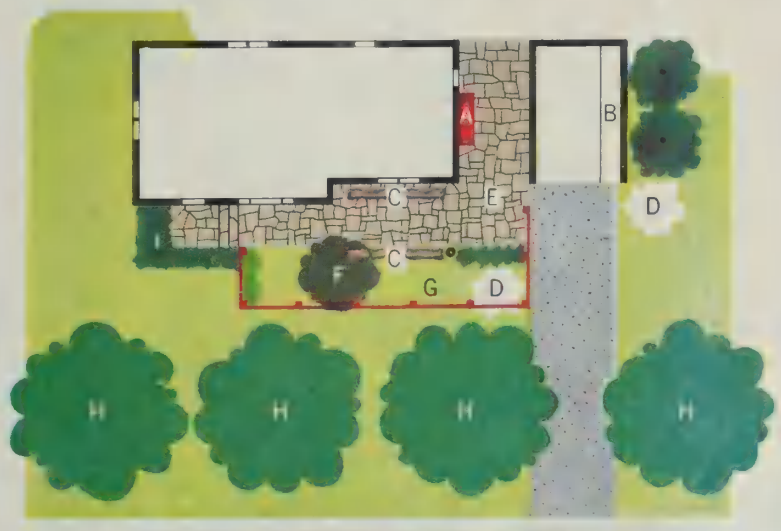
SHEPHERD

As often happens, the front faced a much finer view than the back, but needed shade, wind protection, a pleasant place to sit in privacy and enjoy it. Also needed: car shelter, outdoor storage.

STOLLER

Here we have everything that was needed; the major plants with several years' growth and loving care; the patio plant benches dressed with potted plants; the unsightly aerial no longer strangling the chimney.

All this for $1000 less than a two-car garage



It used to be considered impolite to tell what things cost, but here it's the most important part of the story.

By RICHARD PRATT
Architectural and Garden Editor

The estimate on a two-car garage was a little over $2400. And as you can see by the driveway being built (in the little before picture above), we came along just in time to demonstrate what could be done instead.

Our easily expansible carport and its connecting arbor, together with the patio fencing, gave the house an immediate architectural lift and cost $800. This simple carpentry could have been owner-done for about half. The paving for patio and arbor is random flagging on solid concrete and cost $160 laid. The four big sugar maples cost $200, though their value is rapidly mounting beyond price. The evergreen screens, which provide so much privacy and weather protection where most required, consist of seventeen arborvitaes cut to different heights, as you can see, and came to $150 planted. The Washington thorn, a garden tree de luxe, filled with white flowers in June and with blazing red berries all winter, was a joyful extravagance at $25; the same price as the pair of spreading crab apples. The lamppost lighting for $45 and the peel furniture, that doubles for indoors and out, for $40 brought the total to $1445. . . . Looks like $1000 more, instead of $1000 less.

Soon the sugar maples will become more and more the most important beauty of the place; branching high above the view, casting their shade in summer, glowing with golden brilliance in the fall. The layout couldn't be more simple and clear to comprehend.

SCENT CLOVES

By NORAH LOFTS

SYNOPSIS OF PARTS I AND II Orphaned by Cromwell's armies, Julia Ashley grows up in a Dutch orphanage, is trained by the East India Company as one of the Company's Daughters—girls who are sent to marry plantation owners and Company employees in the remote, legendary spice islands of the Indies. At fifteen, lovely golden-haired Julia is married in a "glove marriage" ceremony to a man named Pieter Vosmar, whom she has never seen. Reluctant, frightened, she voyages to her new home. Her marriage is to be in name only, she finds. Pieter, though a grown man, will always be mentally a child, the result of a childhood accident. But her new home is rich and beautiful, and not knowing that she is to be used as part of a plot to provide an heir for the Vosmar fortune, Julia sees her father-in-law, Simon, as a kindly man until, unwittingly, she places herself in great danger by learning a terrible secret. From this danger she is rescued by mysterious traveler Charles. For the first time in her life Julia knows what love is, though her love for Charles may never be consummated.

When Mynheer returned with his guests from Banda, she was bathed and reclad, and the dress she had been wearing that afternoon had been washed and hung at the back of the closet. Outwardly she looked calm enough, but the marrow of her bones still thrummed with a hidden vibration; and she decided to stay in her room until Pluto rang the miniature silver tong-tong as a sign that dinner was on the table. However, after a few minutes Mynheer himself came and tapped on her door.

"My dear, could you come and entertain my guests for a short time? Daan has just informed me that I am wanted. I know what it is—a business that won't take more than five minutes, but it seems rude to leave these gentlemen alone."

She went with him to the veranda, where the two gentlemen sat in the cane chairs with drinks before them. Mynheer made the introductions and slipped away.

Now was the moment for applying one of Mevrouw Helmers' little rules of behavior: "Always remember that gentlemen like to talk about themselves and their business. Open with a question or a remark which invites them to do so, and then sit and listen."

It was a sound rule. The gentlemen talked, the sun went down in all its blossoming glory; the gentlemen refilled their glasses, and talked again. Mynheer's five minutes stretched out to thirty, and Julia, with her guilty knowledge of what was being said, grew so uneasy that it was difficult for her to stay still.

At last Mynheer stepped onto the veranda, and from within the house came the sound of the tong-tong. He apologized for the delay.

"Really, a most trivial bit of business that anyone could have dealt with," he said. "One day I shall get an agent ——"

She could see that, during his absence, he had been intensely, violently angry. His always prominent eyes were bulged out and the whites of them very red. His manner toward her, however, was unchanged and her heart went out in gratitude to the man who had rescued her.

The meal was lengthy, the conversation, however often brought back to general topics, constantly drifting away again toward business. She wanted to escape and knew that, in their hearts, the men would be glad when she went. The shadows of Doctor Hootman and Pieter passed across the screen and were duly commented upon, and she was thinking that now, in a moment, she might rise and go, when the man beside her turned and said:

"I expect that, like most ladies, you spend a good deal of time making pretty things with your needle, Mevrouw."

Needle! Embroidery! My bag! Caught off guard, her hand went to her mouth; she could feel her face change.

"Mynheer . . . that has reminded me of a promise I made and failed to keep." She turned to the head of the table. "I promised Marie that I would begin at once to make her something." The vagueness and the confusion would be attributed to the something's being connected with a baby, unborn and therefore unmentionable; when she had gone Mynheer would tell the others and they would laugh!

"You haven't lost much time, my dear," said Mynheer indulgently.

My bag! she thought. Now I must go—in the dark—to that dreadful, dreadful place, alone.

The trembling within—though when she looked down at her hands they looked steady—had now reached the paralytic stage, and though she wanted to jump up and rush out in search of the bag, she felt unable to move.

Pluto, moving soundless as a shadow, paused by his master's chair, spoke in a low voice.

Mynheer nodded. "My dear, Pieter would like to see you for a moment."

A new and rather telling touch to the masquerade, she thought.

"I'll go at once," she said, and willed her legs to support her as far as the door. Mynheer smiled at her with approval.

In the cloister she stood still for a moment, leaning her hot face against one of the cool stone pillars, steadying herself against its solidity.

"Ah, Mevrouw," said Doctor Hootman, opening the door of Pieter's room. "I trust that this last little proof of a happy connubial relationship was well received."

It seemed to her that there was a marked, though subtle, change in his manner toward her. She wondered whether she dared ask him to go out and retrieve her bag. It was, she knew, a good deal to ask. Before she could find the courage, or the words to make the request, he had turned and gone to one of the cupboards in which Pieter's clay and beads and paints were all tidily arrayed. When he turned back he had the brocade bag in his hands.

I allowed snapshots like this to be taken because I wouldn't admit, even to myself, that I weighed over 250 pounds. The big smile is phony. Inside, I wanted to die.

I was so fearful my children would be ashamed of me. I never went to their school functions. I couldn't stand having them compare me with the other mothers.

"Every day is wonderful now. Life is too lovely to spend any of it being sad."

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN

Beauty Editor of the Journal

Yes, I despised myself so much when I was fat I actually thought of killing myself. I even worried about how they could squeeze me into a coffin. How morbid can a girl get? Recently, in going through some old papers I found this little poem I had written after failing to stick to a diet:

Oh, God! I pray,
Make time go fast;
I cannot bear another day.
Why do You choose to let me stay?
Dead, I live.

I had been fat ever since I was a little girl, and like most fatties I was always going to do something about it. I am a champion diet starter. Each time I saw a "before-and-after" story in the JOURNAL, I began a new reducing regimen. I got enthused, gave myself lectures, prayed to God, read The Power of Positive Thinking, wrote encouraging notes to myself, hung "before-and-after" pictures all over the house. But, as always, I gave up after losing twenty pounds, and started to gorge again.

I've often heard it said that people gain excessive weight because they are unhappy—they overeat to compensate for the way life mistreats them. I am exhibit A in this miserable fatty-go-round. Before telling why, I want to make it clear that I hold no grudge against the people involved. I love my mother, and nowadays we are very close. Just recently we bought a house together for our families to share in the summer. But when I was a fatty, things were different.

My parents were very young when I was born. Mother was exceptionally pretty, full of life, always on the go. I was frequently left in the care of relatives—aunts, uncles, cousins, grandparents. It was confusing to me to have so many "bosses" telling me how to act and what to do. I was often lonely. Something good to eat helped make up for my feeling of despair.

When I was very young I could have been called (with a goodhearted stretch of the imagination) "pleasingly plump." But by the time I was nine years old I was just plain fat. All the grownups tried to force me to diet. It hurt my feelings to know they found fault with me and so, in childish rebellion, I ate more than ever. I lost all personal pride. If mother bought a new dress for me and the sleeves were uncomfortably tight, I solved the problem by ripping them out. Other children refused to play with me because I was too "sloppy."

As the years went by I became morosely convinced that nobody cared about me or thought I was important. Gradually I reached the stage where I couldn't feel important to myself. Then my reasons for overeating changed. I figured the more I ate, the less attractive I would become. The less attractive I was, the less opportunity to make close contacts with people. The fewer people in my life, the less chance I would have to be hurt by their unkindness toward me. By the time I was thirteen years old, I was 5′ 2″ tall and weighed 190 pounds. Submerged in my mounds of fat, I faced the world with the attitude: "I'm not coming out of here to hurt you, so don't you come near to hurt me."

Knowing I would never be noticed for any appealing qualities of appearance or personality, I purposely went out of my way to be bad, in order to be noticed. I played hooky from school all during my freshman year, and quit school when I was sixteen. Even having my parents yell at me for my misbehavior gave me the "attention" I craved.

My only close friend was a girl who was just about as fat and as miserable as I was. Fed up with our forlorn existence, we decided to join the local girls' club subsidized by the state. We made our applications, but we were refused admission on the basis that we were not attractive enough. In tears, I stood on the steps of the clubhouse and pleaded that it wasn't fair to judge us on appearance alone—after all, they didn't know us, so how could they be sure they wouldn't like us? Another vote was taken and we were, reluctantly, voted in. Later the other girls became friendly but I was so self-conscious about my size and unkempt appearance that I dropped out.

After quitting high school, I went to hairdressing school. At the age of sixteen I was a professional hairdresser, and by the time I was eighteen I had my own shop. (My uncle lent me the money to get started and I'm proud to say he was fully repaid in three months. With the work and worry of being a business girl, my weight dropped. I weighed 165 pounds when I met Irving.

Irving and I went together for a year and then became engaged. Naturally I was thrilled. But my apprehension over close attachments to people was still with me. The idea of being married was frightening. I started eating again, and in the three months of our engagement I put on twenty pounds. At the last minute I discovered my wedding dress, which I had bought when I weighed 165, wouldn't zip or button. In desperation, I took off the collar, cuffs and belt and used the material from these to pad out the seams. At our reception, guests complimented me for selecting such a "simple" dress.

ROGER PRIGENT

Here, I have reduced to 155 pounds.
For the first time in my life I have an interest in me, I feel like a lady, people treat me with respect. It's wonderful!

Phyllis' doctor started her on a 1200-calorie-a-day diet. Halfway through her reducing regimen, when her weight began to level off, he reduced the calories to 1000 a day. Below are two typical days' menus.

(The JOURNAL advises all readers who plan to diet to first have their doctor's approval. If you would like a copy of the JOURNAL's Energy Diet for Reducing, send your request to: Diet Department, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.)

You would think marriage would have changed my attitude about food. It did. I was so depressed over being such a fat and ugly wife that I ate more than ever. Our honeymoon was scarcely over before people asked, "Phyl, are you pregnant?" One woman I barely knew had the gall to joke, "You look as though someone put an air hose in your mouth and forgot to stop blowing." In two months I ate my way up to 210 pounds.

I despised myself. I prayed to be able to stick to a diet, but I just couldn't do it. I was a sneak eater. When people were around, I'd eat modestly—but when I was alone I ate like a pig. I often used to hide a frosted cake, napkin and fork under my bed and then eat it after Irving went to sleep.

When I was pregnant with Michael, our first child, I reached 235. At my medical checkup, six weeks later, I weighed 232 pounds. My doctor was worried and tried to pressure me to reduce. He even stood on the scales himself and announced, "I'm six feet two inches tall and weigh one pound less than you do!" We looked like Mutt and Jeff. A year and a half later, when our daughter Elin was on her way, I zoomed up to 240 pounds. This time the doctor was truly appalled. "If you want to have your baby," he told me, "you absolutely must control your eating. Otherwise I doubt if you will have a safe delivery." I was scared that time and did cut down. But within weeks after Elin was born, I went back to my old eating habits and gradually gorged my way up to a grand total of 254½ pounds. My clothes (size 50) had to be purchased through a mail-order catalogue. I used to wear a coat, even in the hottest weather, to try to hide my fat. One afternoon when I was sitting on the front steps of our house, bunched up in an old brown coat, my father came by. He was so depressed by the sight of me, he demanded, "Phyllis, buy a new coat. I'll pay for it—I can't stand to see you like that."

A little friend of Michael's looked at me in awe one day, and asked quite seriously, "If you hit me, would I break in two?" I was so fearful of having my children ashamed of me that I refused to attend any of their school functions. Irving was always too considerate to criticize, but as

Thanksgiving

SHOSTAL

Thanksgiving dawns with a clear, brilliant sky;
the trees at Appleyard Center are in November shades of gold and crimson, the steeple of the church is sparkling white, shadowed with blue.

The house is deliciously warm and fragrant, cheerfully noisy;

the turkey is festooned with plump sausages, there's rich brown gravy, and a very special pumpkin pie!

By ELIZABETH KENT GAY

My mother, Mrs. Appleyard, is a leisurely, old-fashioned cook, and by that I mean she works with patience, affection, skill and Help. I, on the other hand, count my help in four small packages named Cynthia, Tommy, Laura and Camilla, so I tend to be short-order, and streamlined.

In honor of Thanksgiving, however, our different paces seem to blend; our family celebration involves a co-operative dinner in mother's square, white Vermont farmhouse in Appleyard Center. Early Thanksgiving morning figures in snow suits of many colors stamp up the steps of the arched porch and into the house carrying bundles, jugs of cider, baskets of fruit. As we all gather in the old winter kitchen, a fire is snapping in the nickel-trimmed wood stove. The air outside is brittle as a crystal goblet, but the frost pictures are melting from all the windows, and there's a blend of rose geranium and lavender in the air; wood smoke and the scent of old pine rubbed with beeswax are soon to give way to the aroma of roasting turkey.

We sit at the big oval walnut kitchen table and discuss dinner. "We'll make a pastry blanket for the turkey," mother says to fifteen-year-old Cynthia, my eldest daughter. "My grandmother taught me when I was your age." The purpose of the pastry blanket is to keep the turkey moist. (I would use aluminum foil, instead; but who knows—perhaps Cynthia will be the one to inherit her grandmother's timeless, count-not-the-hours approach to cooking.) To go with the turkey, we decide, there will be giblet gravy, a shimmering orange-and-cranberry sauce, sweet potatoes, Lima beans and mushrooms, pumpkin pie as gold as the globe of sun that suddenly chases the shadows into the corners of the warm kitchen.

STUART

A brilliantly red, clear Consommé Cardinal (spiced madrilène) begins the meal, in a festive setting of beautiful silver, white damask and turkey place-card holders (made from pine cones by nimble-fingered younger members of the family).

Vermont Turkey in a Pastry Blanket With Chestnut Dressing

To make the blanket: Heat 1 cup water to boiling point. Add 1 pound butter. When it has melted, stir in 4 cups flour seasoned with 2 teaspoons poultry seasoning. Mother stuffs turkey with a mixture of Montpelier crackers, pounded up rather coarsely, dried French-bread crumbs, melted butter, eggs, onion, Vermont cream and chestnuts. She seasons this delicately so that the flavor of the chestnuts will not be lost.

STUART-FOWLER

The food is set out on the long pine sideboard—the turkey appealingly browned, the Lima beans and mushrooms bubbling in their sauce, the hot casserole of sweet potatoes. The cranberry marmalade comes out of the cool cellarway and joins the boat of gravy. There's a big pitcher of fresh cider, and sharp cheese for the pumpkin pie.

INCOMPARABLE PAIR

Probably the most seductive dish in the history of eating was celebrated by Eugene Field when he wrote:

I'm glad I've got three willing boys
To hang around and tease
Their mother for the filling joys
Of apple pie and cheese!

Here's a version where the rich, savory cheese is worked into individual pastry shells. The succulent blend of sweet apples, raisins and spices is a classic.

Cheese-and-Apple Tarts. Mix together 1 cup flour, ¼ teaspoon salt, ⅓ cup shortening and ½ cup grated Cheddar cheese. Chop together with 2 knives or a pastry blender so that the pieces are about the size of small beans. Add 2 tablespoons water, a few drops at a time, and toss with a fork. Shape the pastry with the hands to pull it together. Then divide into 8 equal portions. Roll each on a slightly floured board or pastry cloth. Place the dough in 8 small tart pans and press in firmly, making a pretty edge. Prick the bottom of each shell with a fork and place empty tart pan on top. Bake in a very hot oven, 450° F., for 10 to 12 minutes. Remove the extra pans several minutes before the shells are done so that they will brown. If you do not have extra tart pans, use uncooked rice in waxed paper. It serves the same purpose.

Filling: Peel, core and slice 3 pounds (8) tart apples. Heat together 1½ cups sugar and 1½ cups water until the sugar is dissolved. Add 3 cinnamon sticks—each about 1½" long—and 6 cloves. These can be tied in a little cheesecloth bag. Add the apples, ½ cup seedless raisins and 2 tablespoons lemon juice. Simmer until the apples are tender. Don't overcook them. Remove the fruit from the syrup, but leave the spices. Mix together 2 tablespoons cornstarch and ¼ cup cold water. Stir this into the syrup and cook until it is thickened. Mix carefully with the apples and raisins after removing the spices. Cool and fill the tart shells about a half hour before serving. Cap with whipped cream.

LOW-CALORIE LUXURY

The crumb crust is luscious—the filling thick and creamy. Yet this is a weight watcher's dream to be enjoyed with easy conscience. If the pie is cut six ways there will be a miraculously low 196 calories in each delectable wedge.

Heavenly Peach Pie. Finely crush 12 zwieback (1¼ cups crumbs). Mix with 2 tablespoons sugar and ¼ cup melted butter. Pack into an 8" pie plate and bake for 10 minutes in a moderately slow oven, 325° F. Cool.

Filling: Dissolve 1 envelope lemon-flavored low-calorie gelatin in ½ cup hot water and the juice drained from an 8-ounce can water-packed sliced peaches. Dice peaches and set aside. When gelatin is dissolved, add ½ cup orange-juice concentrate and ½ teaspoon almond extract. Chill until slightly thickened. Beat 2 egg whites with ¼ cup sugar until peaks form. Then fold in the thickened gelatin mixture and the diced peaches. Chill until it will hold some shape and pour into the 8" baked and cooled zwieback crust. Refrigerate until firm.

POPULARITY, PLUS

Cheers for cheese pie—latest to become one of America's top favorites. Crown it glamour queen with a jewellike glaze.

Cranberry-Cheese Pie. Whip 2½ eight-ounce packages (20 ounces) cream cheese until fluffy. Combine 1 cup sugar, 1½ tablespoons flour, ¼ teaspoon grated lemon rind, ¼ teaspoon grated orange rind and ⅛ teaspoon salt. Add to the cream cheese and beat until thoroughly mixed. Add 3 eggs and 1 egg white, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Finally add 2 tablespoons evaporated or homogenized milk and ½ teaspoon vanilla, beating again until well blended. Pour into a slightly underbaked 9" pie shell. Bake 7 minutes in a very hot oven, 450° F. Reduce to a very slow oven, 200° F., and bake 15 minutes more. Cool. Prepare a topping by combining in a saucepan a 1-pound can whole-cranberry sauce, 2 tablespoons sugar and 1 tablespoon cornstarch. Cook over low heat until thick and clear. Blend in 1 teaspoon lemon juice and 1 teaspoon grated lemon rind. Cool and spread over the cooled cheese filling.

FROM A DUTCH OVEN

Pennsylvania Dutch fingers wield rolling pin and paintbrush with equal artistry. The crumbly streusel topping on this delicious layered pie is the clue to its Pennsylvania heritage. It should be served fragrantly warm.

Mincemeat-Apple-Crumb Pie. Piecrust: Cut ⅓ cup shortening coarsely into 1 cup flour and ½ teaspoon salt. Stir in 2 tablespoons cold water, little by little. Roll out on a slightly floured board and ease into a 9" pie plate. Make a fluted edge.

Filling: Use a 1-pound jar mincemeat or a 9-ounce package dry mincemeat prepared according to package directions. Pour into the unbaked pie shell. Peel, core and slice 2¼ cups tart apples. Mix them with ⅓ cup sugar and ½ teaspoon cinnamon. Then arrange apples over the mincemeat. Cut 2 tablespoons butter into ⅓ cup flour and ½ cup sugar. When the butter is in small pieces, lightly sprinkle the topping over the apples. Bake in a very hot oven, 450° F., for 15 minutes. Then reduce heat to moderate, 350° F., and bake 30 minutes longer or until bubbling.

DESTINED TO DEVASTATE

Nuts give the tender meringue shell a very special nougat flavor. Filled with a glossy chocolate ambrosia, here is—in short—a confection. So have the coffee extra strong, extra hot.

Chocolate-Nut Angel Pie. Sift together ½ cup sugar and ⅛ teaspoon cream of tartar. Beat 2 egg whites until stiff but not dry. Add sifted sugar gradually to the egg whites, beating well after each addition. Continue beating until the meringue is quite stiff and no sugar crystals are present. Fold in ½ cup chopped pecans. Butter well a 9" pie plate and fill with the meringue. Do not bring out to the edge of the plate. Bake in a slow oven, 275° F., for about 1 hour or until delicately browned. Cool thoroughly.

Chocolate filling: Melt ¾ cup semisweet chocolate bits in the top of a double boiler. Add 3 tablespoons hot water and cook until thickened. Cool slightly. The mixture will become quite thick. Then add 1 teaspoon vanilla. Then whip 1 cup heavy cream and fold into the chocolate. Combine well, but do not beat. Pour into the meringue shell and chill 2 to 3 hours.

PRIDE OF DIXIE

Laced with dates, this creation proves even more sublime, if possible, than the dessert delight of the Southland in traditional style.

Pecan-Date Pie. Prepare a 9" pie shell. Arrange 1 cup shelled pecan halves and 1 cup coarsely cut dates in the bottom. Beat 3 eggs. Add 1 tablespoon melted butter, 1 cup light corn syrup and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Stir well to blend. Mix together 1 cup sugar and 1 tablespoon flour. Blend with egg mixture and pour over the nuts and dates in the pie shell. Let stand until the nuts rise to the surface. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., about 45 minutes.

"AH LIKES 'TATER PIE BETTER'N PUNKIN PIE"

Another Southern specialty—spiced to perfection—might easily win over a stanch squash or pumpkin devotee. Sift confectioners' sugar on the finished masterpiece just before serving, or pass grated sharp cheese for individual sprinkling.

Sweet-Potato Pie. Line a 9" pie plate with pastry, using the plain piecrust recipe given above. Bake 4 medium-sized sweet potatoes. When they are very well done, scoop the potato from the skins into a mixing bowl. Mix with 1 cup brown sugar and ½ cup butter. Season with 1½ teaspoons nutmeg, ½ teaspoon cinnamon, ½ teaspoon ginger and ¼ teaspoon salt. Beat until smooth. Separate 3 eggs and beat the yolks slightly. Add yolks with 1 cup heavy cream to the potato mixture. Blend well. Fold in the 3 egg whites, beaten until stiff but not dry, and pour into the unbaked pie shell. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 1 hour or until the center is set when tested with a silver knife. If necessary to brown the crust, raise the temperature to a very hot oven, 450° F., for about 5 minutes at the end of the baking time.

"But, Doctor... he's not himself any more"

"Doctor, I don't know what's come over Tom. He has always been happy . . . considerate of me and everybody else. But for months now, he has been changing. He broods a lot, his temper's quick and he is always complaining about his health. I can not get him to see you or any other doctor. Claims his trouble will eventually wear off."

Doctors hear of many situations like this, and they know that medical advice in such cases is often essential. Of course, we all have emotional upsets at times.

However, when disturbing feelings persist . . . when a person is so worried, anxious or depressed that he does not seem like himself any more . . . the source of the trouble must be sought, and corrective steps taken to restore mental poise and physical well-being.

Doctors have become increasingly aware of the effect of the emotions on physical health. There is no longer any doubt that illness of emotional origin is just as real as appendicitis or pneumonia or any other physical ailment.

No matter what the physical symptom is . . . for example—nagging headache, digestive upsets, irregular heart beat or backache . . . something can usually be done about it.

In fact, studies made by the National Association for Mental Health show that almost 50 percent of all people seeking medical attention today suffer from conditions brought about or made worse by emotional factors.

A visit or two with the doctor may reveal the underlying cause of the physical disturbance. This is frequently something that the patient does not even suspect.

Once the source of the trouble is found . . . and the patient understands how his emotional reactions are playing havoc with his health . . . a successful recovery can usually be anticipated.

So, if you find yourself . . . or any member of your family . . . becoming persistently overwrought, irritable, exhausted or unduly nervous, seek your doctor's help soon.

For an emotional disorder, like a physical illness, can be treated with greater hope of success when therapy is started promptly.

A simple discussion of how our emotions cause headaches, digestive upsets, and affect our outlook on life is presented in Metropolitan's new booklet called "Emotions and Physical Health." Use the coupon below for your free copy.

She said "Oh" and groped her way to a chair, tears of relief filling her eyes.

"I did consider putting it on your favorite seat in the garden," Doctor Hootman said. "Then I thought you might remember it and be worried."

She swallowed painfully. "I did remember it, just now, at the table. I nearly died."

"That must have been a bad moment." He sat on a chair on the other side of the table. "You're a brave woman." It was a statement made without intent to praise, without admiration. It was like his expression, speculative.

"Oh, no," she told him. "All along I've been terrified."

"Indeed? I wondered whether you realized what a risk you were taking; whether perhaps Mynheer's paternal manner had led you to think that you could do what you liked."

"Far from it," she said with a little shudder. "This afternoon I was half out of my wits. So much so that I didn't even ask the name of the man who helped me."

"I gathered that you were somewhat distressed." He did not volunteer the name.

Pond's Cold Cream makes a lovely difference. Deep cleansing? Of course. But more—it softens, smooths, re-balances your skin. It's the beauty cream of the world's most beautiful women.

See how your thirsty skin responds

This cream cleanses deep down...

But more...it replaces the vitalizing oils modern living drains away

Today's stepped-up living, authorities say, is robbing your skin of its natural beauty oils. Your skin today needs more than just deep cleansing to keep it soft and smooth.

Pond's Cold Cream goes deep down—cleanses every tiny pore opening. But even more—the rich oils in Pond's replace the skin's own lost beauty oils. Pond's brings back the moisture your skin needs to stay soft, smooth, elastic.

How modern living robs your skin of oil

Doctors say your skin is a sensitive barometer of your emotions. Every little strain and frustration drains off your skin's natural beauty-giving fluids—leaves your skin dry and drawn. By evening, your skin needs Pond's to replace beauty oils and plump up skin tissues.

And there's a long list of other robbers that steal beauty oils. Today's low-fat slimming diets, sun, wind and drying liquid cleansers . . . each can take its toll. Each makes your skin more thirsty for the beauty that is waiting in Pond's Cold Cream.

Actually puts beauty in Pond's actually puts new beauty into your skin in 37 seconds. It acts so swiftly because your tired skin is literally waiting for it . . . thirsty for the oils it provides.

Can Pond's work this magic for you?

Fortunately, it's easy to find out for yourself. In just 37 seconds—the time it takes you to put it on—you can feel your skin's eager response—feel it smooth out and soften. And day after day as you use Pond's you'll see your skin become clearer, fresher, far lovelier than it's ever been. The sooner you start, the lovelier you'll look a week from today.

When you can't take time out...take BUFFERIN®

BUFFERIN acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve pain

Won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does

1. Medical science knows that a pain reliever must get into the blood stream to relieve pain.

2. Bufferin combines aspirin with two antacid ingredients. These speed the pain reliever out of the stomach and into the blood stream twice as fast as aspirin. So . . .

3. Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve pain. And it won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does.

When pain makes you feel that you can't possibly go on, remember this:

Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin . . . to relieve headaches, painful cold miseries, muscular pains and other discomforts. (Diagram, left, shows why.)

What's more, Bufferin won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does. You can even take it in the large, continuous doses often needed for temporary relief of minor arthritic pain with no ill effects.

Ask your physician about faster, safer Bufferin for your aches and pains. Many doctors recommend it.

If you suffer from the pain of arthritis or rheumatism, ask your physician about Bufferin.

"Was Mynheer very angry?"

"He was so angry," said Doctor Hootman ith ghoulish relish, "that he almost fell into fit. Mevrouw, you have compelled two very ubborn men to break two of their own most flexible rules. The man who helped you by king the blame for Psyche's mishap has hat we might call a business connection with lynheer; he never comes without an appoint- ent, and on those occasions he is invisible me. You understand. He and I, on less fre- ient occasions, meet, and then he is invisible Mynheer. Today, in order to tell his tale he d an unprecedented thing, presented himself thout an appointment. And Mynheer, in his rn, did an unprecedented thing. He sent for e. It took all my skill and resource to have ynheer ready to meet his guests. I don't ppose he has been so enraged since the day Pieter's accident."

"You knew about Psyche?"

"I know a number of things. I have learned ot to interfere."

"So have I."

"I wonder," he said. "In this case, I must mit your temerity astonished me. But then, know very little about women. They look ail, but I suppose they can be resolute where eir sentiments are concerned."

"I don't think it was sentiment. It was a nd of self-defense. I had to do something. I ow it wasn't much, but it probably com- rted me more than it did her."

Doctor Hootman's expression changed, took n something of as- nishment, some- ing of—yes—re- ect! After a moment said, "Mevrouw, at does as much edit to your head as your heart. You served your miracle is afternoon."

"It was a miracle— at he happened to there and was will- g to take the blame. octor Hootman, what is his name?"

"To me he is known as Charles. Whether at is his name or not I don't know."

"He isn't Dutch, is he?"

"Oh, no. He is English. The situation is ry complicated. Some years ago the English oyalists were welcome in the islands. Crom- ll was the enemy of the Dutch, therefore his emies were regarded as friends. Then, when romwell gained the upper hand he demanded few small islands as compensation for the -called massacre of Amboyna, and naturally the settlers there were not Royalist, and t welcome neighbors. There is a tendency w to dislike them all. So each time Charles s foot in Rua he takes a risk. When he mes to see me he takes another. I trust you remember that, Mevrouw. I hold the secret the truth about Psyche's death and you hold e secret of Charles' connection with me."

"I shouldn't dream of mentioning him to yone. After the way he helped me!"

"His behavior this afternoon was quite out character, I must say."

"In what way, Doctor Hootman?"

"The life he and his little group lead is not nducive to impulsive acts of chivalry."

"I thought you were supposed to be his end. He spoke well of you!"

"I intended no criticism, Mevrouw. I was erely commenting upon the surprising con- adictions of which man is capable."

"I don't think that even there you are right. ou can't become brave all in a moment; and u can't become kind all in a moment either. think Charles helped me this afternoon be- use he is kind, and brave."

You may be right, Mevrouw. All the same, u mustn't underestimate the force of emo- n. You, for example, say that you were ghtened, yet you acted with courage because mething in Psyche's plight appealed to you. I ink much the same thing could be said about harles' behavior. Something about you must ve made a strong appeal to him. He asked e your name, and was very anxious to know hether Mynheer treated you kindly."

She said nothing to that.

After a moment he said, "Well, the whole affair ended fortunately. I suggest that you leave now, Mevrouw. The two fat fellows believe you to be with Pieter, but Mynheer knows otherwise." He rose as he spoke, lifted the embroidery bag and handed it to her.

The blood had spattered it, too, and the brownish-black spots stood out starkly against the pale pink shining stuff. She took it gingerly, with a resurge of horror and disgust. She would throw it away at once. Then she remembered that he had handled it, had contrived to return it to her. Immediately it became the most precious of all her possessions. She would clean it as well as she could; and if some stains remained, she would regard them as reminders of the kindness and comfort with which they were associated.

"It may never happen," said Doctor Hootman, moving toward the door, "but if it ever should —— If Mynheer were away, for instance, I would try to arrange that Charles could see for himself that you were well and happy. That is, if that should be agreeable to you."

"Oh, yes, indeed it would," Julia said. "Thank you, Doctor Hootman, for all you have done today."

"It was a pleasure, Mevrouw," he told her. "Good night." He fastened the door and went back to his chair; he did not take up his book. Busily and intently he wove and twisted and knotted the filaments of his thoughts, a gigantic spider, spinning a gigantic web.

We do not like others to deceive us; we do not think it is fair that they should be held in higher esteem by us than they deserve; it is not fair that we should deceive them, and should wish them to esteem us more highly than we deserve. PASCAL

Julia went to bed, but it was a long time before she slept. Whether she lay with eyes open or closed, there passed before them, in a series of little pictures, all the events of the day. It was useless to turn shuddering from the memory of Psyche and to think, I'll remember Charles instead. Then no picture came; just a few disconnected fragments. An old shirt with a torn frill; a pair of very blue eyes; brow and cheeks scoured by harsh living; a mouth firm against her own. But just before she fell asleep every other memory of the day receded and she saw him whole and clear, just as he had stood at the opening of the path and waved his hand. Once again her heart, her whole being moved out toward him.

Somewhere, in the very heart of the night, she began to dream. She was in the cage, chained and naked, just as Psyche had been. She woke, moaning and shuddering, with the sweat of cold terror crawling over her skin.

But it was only a dream. It was the natural and inevitable result of the day's excitement. She was in no danger. Charles had seen to that. She thought of him, at first with gratitude, and then all at once with longing. Now the things of which Frieda had whispered, things which so long had lain indigestible, a source of discomfort, became assimilated, became part of her being. Now she understood. With just the one, the chosen person, that would be possible . . . wonderful . . . right.

She lay quite still, stunned by the revelation. She could think now with a rueful, tolerant amusement of her immature idea of love, two porcelain figures against a background of flowers! What nonsense.

Her thoughts shifted. She recalled, with a new, bitter understanding, some of the pitying things Mynheer had said to her: "A married woman without a husband, with no hope of children." She recalled also Charles' words: "married to that idiot boy."

She realized, for the first time, the full extent to which she had been defrauded.

Suddenly all Mynheer's talk concerned a young kinsman, Nicolas Vanderplasse, who was coming to spend three months at Rua.

He went on to explain that among planters in the islands there was a system of exchange not unlike that which had existed in medieval times when a boy would go and learn his knightly duties in another man's hall.

"Whether the young scamps really learn more than they would at home is debatable.

The custom does contribute in some small measure to the dissemination of new ideas, and of course in some cases it helps to mitigate the danger of inbreeding. With Nicolas the wife hunting does not apply; he has been betrothed from childhood to the daughter of a man who was governor of Amboyna, a suitable match in many ways, but in one regrettable: all the women of that family are plain and dull. I am sure he will envy Pieter very much."

"Does he know about Pieter?"

"He knows what I have chosen the world should know. You, my dear, and Doctor Hootman are the only ones I have ever taken into my confidence. Of course on so prolonged a visit things will be a little difficult, but we must do our best. You, I am sure, will support me to the best of your ability."

"Of course. You see, Mynheer, the truth makes me look very silly."

He pondered that for a moment. "But the truth is known only to us three. Does Doctor Hootman's awareness of the situation embarrass you?"

She knew that it did not. It was Charles, saying, "You don't mean to tell me that you're married to that idiot boy?" which had shown her the truth; and Mynheer's words came perilously near to asking, "Who else knows?"

She looked him in the eye and said, "I sometimes think about the servants."

"The slaves. My poor child. I never realized. I should have explained. Pieter has his own staff: a Hindu widow who counts herself fortunate to be alive at all—she does the menial work; and an Ethiopian whom I went to some pains to acquire. He is, in point of fact, dumb. The Ethiopians have an amiable custom of making the punishment fit the crime: the hand which steals is cut off, and so forth. Echo, as I named him when he came into my employ, when he could speak told a lie, apparently. My dear, don't look at me like that, it was not my doing. I merely report a fact. So you see, you need have no thoughts about the slaves' thoughts! As for the outer world, they gossip and they speculate, but so long as we work together they can know nothing, and in the end we shall utterly confound them!"

It was not the first time that he had made such a reference to the future.

Thinking that he was counting her as an ally in the task of concealment, the pretense that Pieter was merely disfigured, she said, "I shall do what I can to help."

"I believe that." He came toward her and put his hands on her shoulders. "I think God sent you. I did Him a small wrong, and in return He thrust me into torment that makes hell look like a summer garden. Night after night I've wrestled with Him like Jacob of old, demanding not mercy, but justice. And now for the first time I see a little hope." He seemed to be overcome with emotion. Dropping his hands, he turned and went quickly away.

Mynheer had last seen Nicolas when he was fourteen, six years ago, but he could have picked him out from a score of young men: he was so very much a Vosmar, with such a close resemblance to himself as a young man. He had the kind of good looks that come of youth, of perfect health and cheerfulness, and at the moment of meeting everything about him was touched by a not unpleasing shyness.

As Mynheer greeted his young kinsman, his heart contracted with a sickening spasm of pain. Just so should Pieter have been.

The greeting he extended was cheerful, however, and as soon as they were seated in the proa he began to talk about the Pieter who did not exist.

"I think," Mynheer began, "that I must prepare you as regards Pieter. I suppose you've heard something from your parents."

Nicolas, who had heard a good deal of speculation and comment, said tactfully, "We all knew that he had had an accident and that it had made him very . . . shy."

"'Shy' is an understatement. His passion for retirement has reached the point of mania now. He has his own apartments, from which he never emerges, except sometimes for an evening walk. Even his meals he insists upon taking alone. Well, not entirely alone; he has a great friend, a Doctor Hootman. They are inseparable companions."

Nicolas mumbled that it was all a great pity.

"A great pity. And I, a few months back, made a most regrettable mistake. I encouraged, I urged him to get married."

"Oh." Nicolas' voice held surprise. "You never told us."

"No. I meant to write, but to tell you the truth, I was so disappointed by the way things turned out that I lacked the heart to spread the news. I thought the mere fact that a sweet, pretty girl didn't shrink from him would give him confidence. I can't speak too highly of her. It may seem a strange thing for a father to say, but by his treatment of her Pieter has somewhat alienated my sympathy. . . . That is Rua, over there."

The boy stared ahead eagerly. "I've heard so much about it, from mother. She used to spend a good deal of time here as a child, didn't she?"

"Yes, she and my father were cousins—he was much older, of course. I've heard him say how sorry he was that she married in Java. Let me see; you are betrothed, are you not?"

"I'm to be married almost as soon as I get back."

"Indeed. And it's one of the Hoogenbeet girls, isn't it? Greta or Christine?"

"Fancy your remembering their names."

"My memory is pretty good. I never knew the girls, they were very small when their father retired; but I knew Mevrouw Hoogenbeet! That probably accounts for my remembering; one didn't forget anything Mevrouw Hoogenbeet told one! My word, no! It was once my misfortune to be in Amboyna when the governor gave a ball, and I had to lead out Mevrouw. I know I'm no giant, but she seemed to me to be about seven feet tall."

Nicolas' shyness dropped away. Suddenly he found himself telling Uncle Simon of a secret fear that he had never mentioned even to his favorite brother.

"Everything I hear about Mevrouw Hoogenbeet fills me with alarm," he said. "I'm so terrified that Greta will be like her."

"She can't be as tall; rest assured of that," Mynheer told him.

"How can you know?"

"Because Mynheer Hoogenbeet was much shorter than his wife, and my observation tells me that girls are almost always shorter than their fathers, just as boys are almost always taller than their mothers."

"Is that so?" asked Nicolas.

"It seems to me a natural law, to keep the race from breeding giants and dwarfs."

"Well, thank you, Uncle Simon. That's the first word of hope or comfort anybody has ever offered me. All I've heard was about Mevrouw Hoogenbeet's size and strong-mindedness."

"She was virtuous too!" said Mynheer dryly. "You know, I often think these early betrothals, glove marriages and marriages by proxy are a regrettable necessity. Take my poor Julia, who surely deserves, if ever a girl did, to be happily married. I don't say the whole decision should rest with the young, but they should be allowed to meet first, to find out if they are agreeable to each other."

"That's exactly what I think," said Nicolas eagerly. "You not only thought so, you acted on what you believed, didn't you?"

It was a mistake. Mynheer's face went stiff and cold.

"You know my story? Yes, I acted. But of course that kind of —— Never mind. I can tell you this, though, Nicolas. I've no doubt that when your female relatives discuss my affairs they say, 'Serve him right!' But if I had the choice to make again I would act exactly as I did then. Two years is a short time. But a week with a woman you really love is worth a lifetime of the other thing. That's not something I should say to you, perhaps. . . . Look, you can see the house now."

Again Nicolas stared out, but the conversation was, for him, too intimately interesting to be abandoned. It was the first time in his life that he had taken part in that kind of talk.

"The thing is," he said tentatively, "that the system seems to work. I mean, for most people. Most marriages seem fairly happy, don't they?"

"That," said Mynheer, "is the most damning indictment. Fairly happy. Who wants to be fairly happy? Taste the golden apple once, even if it turns to wormwood in your mouth. How much better than the dull jog trot of 'fairly happy.'"

This was heady talk.

"Oh, I do agree. But some of us are doomed to jog-trot. Take me, for example. To tell you the truth, I'm not looking forward to my marriage. But there it is, all arranged. And I have never seen any woman for whom it would be worth while to defy the rules and upset my father and—and everything. Perhaps that kind of—well, romance only happens to a few people."

"Perhaps. I think it also offers itself to many who refuse it out of cowardice or a silly regard for what you call 'the rules.'"

The son of the very strict, Reformed Dutch family experienced a slight sense of shock. After a second's blinking astonishment Nicolas threw back his head and laughed. "Uncle Simon," he said, "you're not a bit what I expected. Oh, I think I'm going to enjoy my stay in Rua."

"I do most sincerely hope that you will be happy," Mynheer told him. "I shall do my best to make you so. I hope you'll be company for Julia and that you will, as far as possible, ignore Pieter; that, believe me, is the kindest thing you can do. And now, here we are. Welcome to Rua."

Nicolas Vanderplasse was twenty years old, a perfectly normal, healthy young man who had been rather strictly brought up, and who had his full share of the sensuality which is so often found in sons of puritanical fathers.

Like most other young men of his age, he would have begun to look forward to marriage and to dream of the wife about whom he could feel both romantic and passionate, but here was a handicap, peculiar to him. The ghost of Mevrouw Hoogenbeet still stalked the islands. Fifteen years had passed since Mynheer Hoogenbeet's retirement from the governorship of Amboyna, but the memories and stories of her size, her parsimony, her tirades and her bullying persisted. Was it possible that Greta, daughter of such a woman, could be lovable? Nicolas doubted it.

However, he had still some months of freedom and he intended to make the most of them. Setting out for his visit to Rua, he had made up his mind to sample—along with anything else that offered—the pleasures of the compound, the "brown satin," as men called it. This was a thing which decent men avoided on their own plantations.

He had forgotten this intention within a week, having fallen in love for the first time. Here was the very girl of whom—but for the shadow of Mevrouw Hoogenbeet—he would have been dreaming: lovely to look at, with grace and charm, delightful to talk to, a girl to adore, and one who could, at the same time, by a glance or the brush of her sleeve wake unimaginable hungers.

The setting, too, might have been especially designed to be the background of a love affair.

In Rua nobody watched, nobody criticized. "You two young people must amuse each other," Uncle Simon had said as soon as he had introduced them, and after that he seemed to show no more interest or curiosity in their comings and goings than he did in the flight of the birds. His only concern was that they should be happy.

"I go out when the tong-tong rings, and I see everything started. If you care to come with me, that is as good a time as any to see how things work. But you don't have to turn out every morning, Nicolas. Young people can sleep on, and they should. They should also be grateful that they can. I wake at dawn now, wherever I am, and once awake I must be stirring."

Most mornings Nicolas managed to wake and accompany his uncle on the rounds; and during those hours together the insidious process of undermining the home standards would go on. Uncle Simon laughed at things which would deeply have shocked Nicolas' father; and although Nicolas would often be disconcerted by the levity, almost always immediately afterward he would think, But he's right, or I often felt that way myself.

One of the most startling, and pleasing, of Uncle Simon's attitudes was that which he adopted toward youth. At home youth was something slightly deplorable: "You'll know better when you're older." In Rua youth was given its due: "It's the best time, my boy, make no mistake about that"; "Half the rules are made by old men to prevent young ones' doing things that they themselves can no longer do."

JAPANESE PROVERB

Once he spoke, in terms of age, about Julia, who had just left them in order to make her morning visit to Pieter.

"I hate myself sometimes," Uncle Simon said. "I should have persuaded him to marry an older woman. Thirty would have been the perfect age. How can a girl like that care what an interesting book he is reading? That is his main topic, you know: books! She's at an age when life should be lived, not read about. Pieter, poor boy, never had any youth, he has to accept a substitute, but she . . . it's like seeing a bud flung out on the dust heap with a bunch of dead flowers."

None of these speeches was momentous in itself, but each made its small contribution; and when the time for plain speaking came the atmosphere had been established.

It began with a morning walk. Julia had by this time become aware of Nicolas' infatuation and was trying to acquire the art of avoiding sentimental scenes without injuring his feelings. She had learned that it was advisable to have a definite destination when they took a walk.

"This morning I'm going to show you some trees which even your uncle doesn't know the names of, and see if you can tell me," she said.

"I doubt if I can. They must be rare if he couldn't name them. What are they like?"

"Red."

"There are dozens of red trees. And of course there are different names in different places for the same tree."

"These are quite a walk away, we mustn't dawdle."

"I never knew anyone who liked to walk so fast as you do, Julia. And you've been here such a short time, you should feel the heat. But I can't somehow imagine you getting hot and red in the face. Your face always looks as though it were made of ivory or alabaster or something like that."

They came at last to where the trees stood, all in a group together. Their tops were thickly massed with flowers of a deep, rich red color which made a pleasant contrast with the feathery evergreen of the nutmegs.

"There, aren't they pretty? Why, Nicolas, what is the matter?"

He was staring at the trees with an expression of astonishment. "They're—they're cloves!" he said in a voice of disbelief.

"Well, is that so astonishing?"

"Julia dear! There isn't supposed to be a clove tree in all the islands, except in Amboyna. My word, if the Company knew! Uncle Simon must be crazy!"

"He doesn't know what they are. I asked him when I first saw them and he said, 'Oh, just a native tree.'"

"That's quite impossible. He's lived here all his life and they used to be quite common. Then the Company decided to concentrate the clove growing in Amboyna and every tree elsewhere had to be cut down. My father had to get rid of his. You can't go against the Company these days, you know." He looked at the pretty, sweet-scented trees and shook his head in a puzzled way. "He can't sell them. So why on earth does he take such a risk?"

"I think it's quite likely that they've always stood there, and he thought they were pretty, so he kept them."

"Ye-es; with him that is just possible. Rua is his kingdom, isn't it? My mother always says he acts as though he were royalty. Which makes it all the harder for him—Pieter, I mean."

"In what way?" asked Julia carefully.

"Staying at home, not showing off, not cutting a dash as the heir apparent. Uncle Simon cut no end of a dash when he was young, or so I've heard, and no doubt he'd have liked his son to do the same."

"I think it more likely that he thinks his heir is his heir and therefore permitted to behave just as he chooses."

"That's a shrewd remark. That's one thing I do like about you, Julia. Most girls as pretty as you—not that there are many—never say anything worth listening to."

"Will you mention the clove trees?"

"You bet I shall. I shall warn him too. Rua may be a kingdom, but the Company rules an empire, and even Uncle Simon is only one of its satraps."

"It's what?"

"It comes out of the Bible. I was brought up on the Bible. Weren't you?"

"Not really—which is rather strange, though I never, I must admit, thought about it until now. I spent quite a long time in what was called, officially, 'The Christian Benevolent Refuge for Orphans,' otherwise the Klopstock Home. It wasn't very Christian, or very benevolent, but it was completely Klopstock. To be quite honest, we didn't all have cloaks, but for the daily walk that didn't matter because some of us always had to stay in to finish work. But for Sunday church, if we had all gone, there weren't enough. I think that must have been the reason—we never did go."

"You don't realize how lucky you were. At home the sermons last two hours."

The innocuous, unprovocative comparison of their upbringing and experiences lasted all the way back to the house.

Doctor Hootman always left the table promptly after dinner and Julia soon followed him, leaving the gentlemen to their wine. On this evening, as soon as they were alone, Nicolas said:

"Uncle Simon, you do know a clove tree when you see one?"

"I should hope so."

"Then you know you have quite a number here, in Rua?"

"Of course. I know every tree on Rua. Why?"

"Why? Because if the Company ever found out they'd—they'd ——"

"Fine me. A sum of money, large by their standards, negligible by mine, which I should not pay without protest, my boy."

Nicolas' eyes widened. "To whom could you make a protest in a case like this?"

Mynheer did not answer immediately; he offered the wine and then refilled his own glass. "The Company," he said mildly, "is very large, and like most overgrown things is not constitutionally very sound. Also, like all large things it offers a wide target of vulnerability. In Holland there are many—in very high places—who view with grave concern this insistence upon monopolies and the overriding of civil rights. I should have quite a case, Nicolas, which properly handled might easily do the Company more damage than they could do me. And I would see that it was properly handled."

Nicolas looked at Mynheer with admiration. "That's all very well," he said. "Meantime they could refuse to ship your nutmegs, and then where would you be?"

"Here, I trust. And losing no sleep, I assure you. I grow nutmegs because nutmegs have always been grown on Rua; but I do not, thank God, depend upon the nutmeg for my daily bread, or other small comforts."

Nicolas had always known that the Rua branch of the family was far wealthier than his own, but to talk of being independent of nutmegs hinted at riches of a fabulous kind.

He said in that special voice which people reserve for talk of money in large quantities, "It must be nice to be so rich."

"It is nice to be independent—and in these days that demands money. It was not always so; the first Vosmar to own Rua had no money at all, he was independent by virtue of his strong body and indomitable mind. But those days are over." He paused. Then he said, "Yes, I am rich. I inherited a fortune, and by careful manipulation I have made another. Far more money than poor Pieter, with his simple tastes, will ever know how to spend." He sighed, lifted his wineglass. "You're the eldest of . . . which is it—I always forget—four, aren't you, Nicolas?"

"Out of date, Uncle Simon. There's baby Benjamin."

"Of course. That's three boys. And two girls to be provided with dowries. You won't—to begin with, anyway—have too much to do with, will you?"

"I should think not."

"Well," Mynheer said, "I've taken a liking to you; you are my kin, and as I said just now I have more than Pieter would know what to do with. Mark you, everything I inherited goes to him, it couldn't be otherwise. But of the money I made myself I propose to leave you a share, or give it to you in my lifetime if you prefer. Long before you came I decided that if you turned out to be a real Vosmar, as you promised to as a boy, I'd do something substantial for you. And I will."

This was the realization of a family hope which had peeped slyly out from behind the arrangement of the long visit. For some time references to Rua had abounded with little unfinished sentences concerning the chance which awaited Nicolas if he ingratiated himself with his relative. Now here it was. And all he could find to say was:

"It's wonderfully good of you, Uncle Simon. I don't know how to thank you."

"Then don't. I don't want thanks. Will you take brandy?"

"No, thank you," said Nicolas with a slight self-righteousness.

"Do. To keep me company. I have something else to discuss with you. To my mind a much more serious matter."

"Oh. What is it?"

Mynheer knew the value of silence. Without speaking he poured brandy into two glasses, pushed his chair back from the table.

"It concerns Julia," he said, and noted a slight deepening of color in the boyish face. "You're in love with her, aren't you?"

Put like that, it sounded like an accusation. Nicolas played for time. "I find her extremely attractive," he said, "but I do assure you, I've never touched her or said a word that couldn't have been overheard."

"That still doesn't answer my question."

"Very well, then, I am," said Nicolas. "How could I not be? I know she's Pieter's wife, but that is difficult to bear in mind, the way things are! But I swear ——"

"Never mind that. For the rest, you have said it exactly. It is difficult to bear in mind that she is Pieter's wife. I'm not in his confidence, or in hers to that extent, but I'll tell you this: I'd wager my last guilder the girl's a virgin still. And I tell you this, also, and I say it as sincerely as I ever said anything in my life: if Julia could have one romantic, successful love affair, nobody would be more delighted than I!"

Now thoroughly taken aback and scarlet to the edge of his hair, Nicolas could only gulp out, "Why?"

"I have many reasons. First of all, I'm sorry for the girl. My second reason is more selfish. I don't know how well you understand women; I flatter myself that I do. All women need an emotional anchor. Unless my poor Julia is given, very soon, some emotional and imaginative ballast, I shall have trouble. One really satisfactory love affair would give her something to remember, dwell on, be sentimental about for the rest of her life. I know that is true, Nicolas."

It all sounded very far away from the brisk, coolhearted, hardheaded household in which he had been reared.

"I'm very fond of Julia. But I doubt . . . I mean, there are her feelings to be considered."

"By your own account you have never tested them," Mynheer reminded him. "It would hardly be maidenly for her to show her feelings, would it?"

Nicolas dared to say, "And suppose we did—and suppose she had a baby."

"I hadn't thought of that. My thoughts always ended with Julia. Well, do you know, I think that would be even better than an empty memory. A child can entirely fill a woman's life. I don't think that that would be a tragedy at all. But that is carrying speculation rather far, don't you think?" He smiled, and then said in a voice which struck exactly the right, seemingly irresponsible note, "Dear me. I'm afraid this has become a most unorthodox conversation. How shocked and alarmed your dear parents would be! And really I only want everybody to be happy. Youth passes, and life passes, and I've learned that it is what one misses that one regrets."

Until Nicolas allowed his feelings for her to become obvious Julia had enjoyed his company very much. In the beginning the only jarring note in their gay companionship was his deep and persistent curiosity concerning his Cousin Pieter. As the days went on and Pieter remained invisible he became understandably inquisitive.

"Exactly in what way is he disfigured, Julia?"

Once again she gave the ready-made reply about the disfigurement's being exaggerated.

"How much exaggerated? Is he awful to look at?"

"Not in the least." She could say that with truth now; she had become so accustomed to inds of things were going on. I've often anced at him suddenly and seen him staring me. Then he'll look quickly away."

"I think he's shy too. He used to look at me ke that when I first came. He's quite nice, ally."

She was astonished to find how easily eva-ve and deceptive sentences would slip out.
he would come from Pieter's room and find icolas waiting for her.

"And how is Pieter this morning?"

"Very well, thank you."

"What's he doing?"

"He was painting when I left him." A grain truth there: Pieter enjoyed applying blobs d strokes of color to his queer-shaped bits of ottery. And if he was cutting up paper with s blunt-nosed scissors it could be called aper work." Nicolas was ven to believe that Pieter, ough a recluse, led a full d busy life.

But things changed. Nicos began looking at her fferently, long-resting, arning looks. He began ying things which she und embarrassing, made attempts to take r hand. And his attitude toward Pieter anged too.

One day, when she had parried a question, looked at her closely and said, "Poor lia; you can't really bear to talk about him, n you?"

"I am talking about him now; or so I agined," she said a trifle sharply.

"Without telling me anything."

"There's nothing to tell. And if you were eter, would you wish your wife to discuss u with someone else?"

"If I were Pieter," said Nicolas, ceasing to alk and speaking with a dreamy intensity, f I were Pieter I shouldn't care what I oked like. If I were lucky enough to be mar-d to you, Julia, I should go round saying, on't look at me, look at my beautiful wife!
ok what I've got!'"

In the cool, prim voice which she used more d more often nowadays, she said, "It's imssible to say how you would feel, or act, in nother person's place."

"I know one thing: I'd give my right arm change places with him!"

She thought of the marred red face, the hole empty, futile life. She spoke vehemently.
Nicolas, don't say that."

"Why shouldn't I say it? I would change aces, not just with him, with the humblest, orest little clerk, if I could be married to u."

He was looking at her with admiring, ssionate, almost worshiping eyes.

"Pieter had no right to get married at all," icolas went on. "He hasn't the slightest idea
w to treat a wife."

"I don't know why you should say that.
e's very fond of me. And very kind to me."

"Kind!" He repudiated the word with
orn. "Decent men are fond of their dogs and nd to their slaves. He doesn't love you."

"How do you know?"

"If he did, he wouldn't let you be here, with e, now. He'd be as jealous of me as I am him."

"He doesn't know the kind of thing you're ginning to say to me, Nicolas. And I wish u wouldn't. I am married, and very soon u will be yourself."

"Must you remind me of that?" he asked roughly. "When I was riding my hobbyhorse and Greta was in her cradle our parents put their heads together and struck a bargain. Was that anything to do with me? Did anybody give one thought to my feelings? And the same with you. Somebody shoved a glove on your hand and somebody else said a few words. And they dare to call that a marriage! Then we see somebody else and we know, in our hearts—in our very bones ——"

All unwittingly he was describing what had happened to her: that unlooked-for, uninvited recognition of the one, the only possible person. On that day when Charles had kissed her if he had said, "Come with me," she knew she would have gone, anywhere, to the world's end, and never even remembered that she was married.

Was it possible that Nicolas felt like that about her?

"It's like everything else," she said. "There has to be some sort of order, some sort of rule. Otherwise it would all be such a muddle. Everybody seems to be in love with somebody who isn't in love with them."

He supposed this to be her way of intimating that she was not in love with him. But what did she know about it?

"Oh, no," he said. "Sometimes two people are in love with each other. And then everything is wonderful."

She looked at him, and for a moment tried to imagine Charles standing there in his place. But this was no time to think of that. Once again she must deal with this situation without hurting Nicolas' feelings.

"I've never known a case like that," she said with an assumed lightness. "Those I've read about always came to a bad end. Suppose that I fell in love with you; think how miserable we should be when the time came to part."

"But we should have had something, Julia. We'd have known what happiness was. We'd have something to remember."

Ah, but I have that already; a very small, shadowy thing, but I have it and nothing else must be allowed to cut across, to come between me and what I remember.

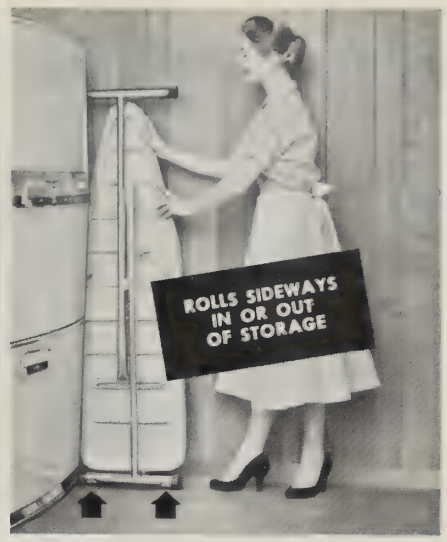
It occurred to her suddenly that what she had said a little earlier might be entirely true—everybody was in love with somebody who wasn't in love with them. That might be why Charles had so firmly loosened her clutching hands. . . . Well, all the more honor to him. She must profit by that example.

"I don't love you, Nicolas. I like you very much, but that is all."

He was sufficiently infatuated to tell himself that he liked her all the better because she was not "easy"; because she was, he thought, loyal to Pieter and her disastrous marriage. He was too young to hear in the words "I like you" the fatal denial of all hope.

So the languorous spice-scented days went on, and passed through the fields of the sunset into warm spice-scented nights full of stars. And presently Nicolas' stay in Rua had reached the halfway mark.

There came a day when Mynheer announced that he would be absent for a night.



"I'm going to the governor's very dull, gentlemen-only dinner party," he said. "And as I have some business to do in Banda tomorrow morning, I shall stay there and return about midday. I dare say you two will make shift to entertain yourselves. Oh, and Nicolas, I've opened a bottle of what, if it lives up to the shipper's promise, should be a rather special wine. Try it at dinner, will you, and give me your opinion."

Julia spent the afternoon with Pieter. Ever since she had allowed her tongue to slip and say "visit," she had prolonged the time she spent with him. This afternoon Pieter was busily and happily and messily making clay pots. They were all lopsided and flawed, but she admired them profusely and when she left he presented her with the largest of them.

The candles were lighted, and she had changed her dress and Juno was putting the last touches to her hair when there was a knock on the door between her sitting room and the cloister. Juno put down the brush and went to the door, and Julia heard, with surprise, Doctor Hootman's voice: "Tell Mevrouw that Mynheer Pieter wants her for a few minutes."

She called, "I heard. I'll come at once."

Most likely, she thought, he wanted to give her another pot. Amenable, and easily handled as he generally was, he had cantankerous moods now and then.

She crossed the library and tapped upon the door of Pieter's room. Doctor Hootman opened it and said, "Come in, Mevrouw."

Charles stood by the table.

She said "Oh!" in the awed, rapt voice of someone confronted by a heavenly vision. And then she just stood and stared, and Charles stared back at her.

She had never, really, expected to see him again. The memory of him had been something laid away, sealed over, having no connection with ordinary everyday living. Now there he stood, living, breathing, real.

Charles was dumb too. Unlike her, he had not cherished his memories. He'd met, by accident, a girl whose looks and personality and situation combined to make an appeal to him, but he was a realist and he had faced his feelings realistically. There was no room in his life for love of any kind. Nobody but a crass fool would give a second thought to a girl met once, a girl who was married.

Daan had said, "Come up to the house, Charles. Mynheer is away for the night. We'll make free with his brandy."

And then he had said, "I promised Mevrouw that if ever it could be managed I would arrange that you met. She feels that she never thanked you properly."

"I don't want her thanks."

But he did want to see her. Just to prove . . . what? That she was merely a pretty little Dutch girl; not the dream-provocative, memory-troubling lady who had passed by and waked a love that would never sleep again.

So Daan had sent for her. And here she was.

Into the silence, so loud with unspoken things, Doctor Hootman said, "I must begin getting my charge to bed." He went into the bedroom, closing the door gently behind him.

"I thought, since I was here, I'd like to see how you were," Charles said awkwardly. "You haven't been getting into any more trouble?"

"Oh, no. And thank you for bringing back my bag. I was in such a state. I didn't think of it. And I didn't even ask your name."

"You know it now?"

"Oh, yes. Charles." There was something special about it, and about using it to him, for the first time.

"And you're Julia. I asked. So every now and then I can say to myself, 'I hope everything is going right with Julia,' or 'I wonder what Julia is doing this fine morning.'"

"I've thought of you too. Every single day. And I never even hoped I'd see you again. I don't even know where you live."

"I live on a little island called Ay. There are about a dozen of us. In a hut. We live like pigs."

"Which way does it lie, your island?"

He took a mental bearing and jerked his head.

"Oh. One of my windows looks that way. I shall be able to look out—and think ——"

"Of me, in my hut? If it's in the morning you can think of me lighting the fire. I most imprudently let it be known that I have a talent for lighting fires, and so I was saddled with that job."

"I often had it, in the Klopstock Home; it was one of the unpopular ones."

None of these words meant anything at all. It was their eyes that were doing the real talking.

"Doctor Hootman told me that you are English," she began afresh.

"That's right; but I've lived in the islands for a long time now."

"I think I'm English too."

"What do you mean, think? Don't you know?"

"Not for certain. It was in Ireland that I was found, but I could say a piece in English. Uncle Johannes told me what it meant in Dutch; and it said I was English. He believed I was."

"Who was Uncle Johannes?"

"The man who found me. He was a sea captain."

"Say me your English piece."

"In English? I don't know whether I remember it. It's so long ago. And even then he said I said it like a parrot. But I'll try."

Slowly, dredging up each word from the depths of her memory, she repeated the simple identification which Maire had taken such pains to teach her.

"Ashley," he repeated as she came to the end. "That's English enough. In Ireland, you say. When?"

"I was eight then—when Uncle Johannes found me. And I shall be seventeen in June."

"How long were you with Maire?"

"Oh, all my life, I should think. I can't remember anything before. She said she taught me to walk and to talk."

"You were a baby then, in '49. Cromwell in Drogheda. That'd be about right. I think you could claim to be English. We're a long way from home, Julia."

FOR WENDY

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

Seek not the laurel,
The crown and the gold,
For the delicate days of your dreaming are numbered.
Oh, walk your way lightly, in youth unencumbered—
Leave the prize and the laurel
For the wise and the old.

Cling to your rights:
The freedom of losing,
The spendthrift joys of extravagant reaching.
Oh, wait, and learn later the strict years' teaching—
The weight of the laurel,
The bright crown's bruising.

"Perhaps that is why ——"

"Why what?"

She floundered a little. "Well, that day . . . I was all confused, half out of my mind, but later on, when I thought about it, it was just as though we weren't really strangers."

And it had been so with him. Miscall, deny it how you would, you recognized the lady who just passed by—that was why the one glance was enough.

"So the Dutchman brought you out of Ireland. What then?"

"He was drowned. His wife didn't like me, so she sent me to an orphanage and I ended up in the Company's Daughters' Home. And then I came here."

He said abruptly, "They don't often live to be old." The jerk of his head showed where his thoughts had jumped, and as though it had been a signal, there came from behind the closed door a low grumbling sound, Pieter's indistinct voice raised in complaining protest. "Things might work out right for you yet. I'd like to think so." He brushed his hand across his face with a gesture of helpless confusion oddly at variance with his general demeanor. "I've worried about you a bit; though God knows I've worries enough of my own."

"I'm all right," she said quickly. "You mustn't worry about me." But it was sweet to think that he had. "What worries have you?"

He laughed. "All concerned with mental arithmetic and similar sordid things. I'm all right too. You and I have survived the breakup of a civilization, Julia. We should reckon ourselves lucky to be alive."

The noise in Pieter's room was now loud. The words "Julie. Want Julie" emerged clearly.

"He knows I'm here," Julia said.

As she spoke the door opened a few inches, was sharply slammed. The bellowing cries rose to a crescendo, and then the door opened fully and Doctor Hootman and Pieter, locked in a Laocoön embrace, came hurtling into the room. Though physically overborne, Doctor Hootman was still in charge of the situation, and still calm.

"Take him, Mevrouw; distract his attention," he said, and released his hold on Pieter, who plunged straight at her, quiet now except for gulping sobs of rage. He burrowed his head into her shoulder and clutched at her, saying, "Julie, Julie," over and over.

Doctor Hootman placed himself squarely in front of Charles. "You must go. One word would be enough! I couldn't let the noise continue. We have a guest in the house."

Julia hugged Pieter to her, keeping his face hidden in her shoulder. Charles, hustled by Doctor Hootman, went to the door, and there turned. She smiled, and because they must not speak she put into the smile all the unspoken things. That was what Charles carried away with him, the memory of Julia, sweet and lovely and brave, smiling at him as she soothed the poor boy.

Just before the door closed he raised his hand; and it was not in salute to a pretty little Dutch girl.

Doctor Hootman turned back into the room and said with genuine regret, "Mevrouw, I am sorry! I simply dared not risk the disturbance." Pursing his lips, he looked at Pieter, who had stopped crying and was stroking Julia's sleeve. "I've never known him so violent. Come along now, Pieter. You've seen Julie, and Julie has seen you being very naughty. Very naughty!"

"Naughty," Pieter admonished himself heartily. But he did not assume the scolded-dog aspect ordinarily educed by the use of the word. On the contrary, he seemed pleased with himself. "Seen Julie," he added.

Doctor Hootman's heavy eyebrows knotted in a little frown. "Some sort of animal instinct at work there."

"What do you mean?"

Doctor Hootman looked at her, hesitated, and said, "That he knew you were here. We shall have to be a little more firm, I think. Come along, Pieter. Time for bed."

"Time for bed. Good morning, Julie," said Pieter and allowed himself to be led away.

At the bedroom door Doctor Hootman turned. "I think, if you will excuse me, Mevrouw, I shall dine here. With Pieter, of course." He added the last words with the now-familiar, derisive grimace with which he always marked any additional act of subterfuge.

She wanted to be alone, to relive, to remember, but she could hardly leave Nicolas to dine alone. She must wait. Tonight, though, his yearning looks and sentimental words were more than usually irksome.

"This is an occasion," he said, as they sat down to the table. "We've never dined alone together before; we never may again. Oh, Julia! When I think of Pieter, who could have that pleasure every night of his life ——"

Pluto's entry gave her an excuse to frown so that that sentence died on the air.

Nicolas tried again, and again, until her short and finally impatient replies gave him the key to her mood. He realized that he was becoming slavish and he had heard, or read somewhere, that with women slavish tactics were seldom successful. He must be gay and charming.

The wine helped. After two glasses of it his spirits and his color rose.

"Uncle Simon was dead right about this wine, Julia. It is special. Let me ——" He leaned forward and filled her glass. "I suspect that my father—himself a schnapps drinker—warned Uncle Simon that I was a winebibber as well as an idle scamp. I must say that—quite apart from other reasons—I'm not looking forward to my return to the family roof. For one thing, my father will expect me to have acquired, in three months, all the secrets of Uncle Simon's success in business. And not one have I ferreted out. Careless, unobservant rapscallion that I am."

Encourage him to continue with this easy kind of chatter.

"Tell me about Java, and your home."

He filled his glass again and with willingness launched into a description of his home and family. He could, when he wished, talk very entertainingly, and he did so now, with just enough exaggeration to be amusing.

Then he said, "Now I feel like making some music. Let's go and brave Pieter in his den and ask if I may play his clavichord."

"Oh, no!" she said. She heard the real horror in her voice. "He always retires early. If we disturbed him, he would never forgive us."

"That's just it. He should be disturbed," said Nicolas, with the intransigence of the near-intoxicated. "I'd ask nicely. I'd say, 'Cousin Pieter, I haven't come to stare at your scars. I just want to play your clavichord.' It might be the turning point in his life."

"He'd be very upset, and he'd blame me. Please, Nicolas, don't even think of it."

"The idea is abandoned. Nobody could resist you when you speak so earnestly and look so seductive."

"If you really want to play, there is a clavichord in my sitting room."

"You never play."

"I can't. But your uncle, when he furnished the room, provided everything that any kind of woman could possibly require. Therefore I have a clavichord."

"I've never seen your room. Come along, I will make you such sweet music as will melt even your stony heart."

"You won't, you know." She kept her voice light and casual. "If you have that in mind, Nicolas, you'll be wasting your time." Too late she realized that it had been stupid to invite him to her room. Done without thinking, to divert his attention from Pieter, it might easily be misunderstood.

Socialism has become popular whenever hard-working people build something worth owning which other people want.

HERBERT V. PROCHNOW
The Toastmaster's Handbook

He stumbled a little as they went along the cloister. At the door she wondered whether to say, "Now, if you come in, you must promise to behave." But that had a kind of implication, of coyness which might precipitate the very thing she wished to avoid. A brisk matter-of-factness was probably the best defense.

She opened the clavichord and placed the candles near it, reserving one for herself on the far side of the room.

"There you are," she said to Nicolas. "I shall sit here and go on with my work while you play."

He surprised her by playing, even in this slightly tipsy state, remarkably well. The music he made was nothing like Doctor Hootman's; he played light, graceful little tunes.

Presently he said, "I play well, don't I? Better than Pieter, don't you think?"

"Differently."

"How very miserly! Julia, sometimes I think you must be in love with him, and he so surly he won't even speak to his own cousin. What is it? Pity? Would you be kinder to me if I wore my scars on my face instead of on my heart?"

It was asked flirtatiously rather than seriously and she replied in the same manner.

"No. I couldn't be kinder to you. I'm already so kind that I find it a strain."

He began to play again, passed from one tune to another and reached, at last, one different from the rest. No longer light and gay. A sweet, haunting, melancholy tune that seemed to hold all the sadness of good-bys spoken forever.

It had its effect on Julia, who ceased stitching and folded her hands on the embroidery bag with its eloquent stains. His hands had touched it, and in holding it she made some kind of contact. Her mind, her heart went winging out, over the sea to Ay.

The music, and the wine he had drunk, took effect on Nicolas. Slavish adoration, pretty speeches, yearning looks brought no return. A man should be masterful, ruthless. With his fingers still drawing sorrowful sweetness from the keys, he turned his head, and saw upon Julia's face a look which he had never seen before, unguarded, dreaming, desirous.

He left the clavichord and crossed the room in a single swooping motion, gathered her into his arms, and saying, "You do love me, you do, you do," set his mouth to hers.

The fact that he was kissing her in the way that she would have liked to kiss Charles, in the way she longed to be kissed by him, added to her sense of outrage. She turned her head and freed her mouth, and put both hands against him, thrusting him away.

"I don't! Let go of me!"

He was beyond control now. The touch of flesh on flesh, even the way she struggled, fired him; and the weeks of meek adoration had to be paid for.

With a wrench that seemed to break her neck she got her mouth free again and screamed. Useless. She knew that even as the shrill sound rang out. Doctor Hootman was at the other end of the house; the slaves even farther away and heedful only of the bells.

Yet immediately somebody tapped on the door. Nicolas heard it, too, and his clutch loosened. She gave another push and he stood up. She ran her hands over her hair, drew in a breath and managed to call, "Come in."

The door opened, rather slowly, and there was Doctor Hootman.

"I had to come," he said, with a note of apology in his voice. "I heard music. Music from a hand far more skilled than mine—one Pieter's. Yours, Mynheer?

"I was playing," Nicolas told him. He sounded sulky.

"Most beautifully," said Doctor Hootman. He lifted his big, heavily haired hands and rubbed his eyes. "Coming in from the dark, so many candles all together quite blinding," he said.

He might pretend not to see anything; but the sound of the scream still hung on the air.

"I spoiled it," Julia said in a voice so high pitched and unsteady that it, as well as the scream, needed explanation. "I put my hand into my bag and a needle ran into my finger. Just for a second I thought a snake had crept in."

"That could very easily happen, Mevrouw. I've seen your bag lying in the garden." He turned to Nicolas. "Mynheer Vanderplass, I had no idea that you were such a musician. Would you mind if I stayed and listened for a while, if Mevrouw would give me permission, of course?"

"Do stay," Julia said. "Sit down, Doctor Hootman."

Nicolas said, "I only know a few tunes. I've played them all and to repeat them would bore me."

Doctor Hootman, who had almost taken a chair, stood, uncertain, hesitant.

"Perhaps you would like to try my clavichord," Julia said. "Your old tunes might sound differently."

"Mevrouw, to do that would be to invite the inevitable, and I am sure invidious, comparison."

There was a moment's bristling silence. Then Nicolas said rudely, "Not from me. I'm going to bed. Good night, Julia."

The door slammed behind him and before the sound of it had died away Doctor Hootman was at the clavichord.

"I must play, Mevrouw," he said. "To a young man as angry as that one, another comparison might suggest itself. However, flown with wine as he is, he will soon sleep."

He played on for about five minutes, then ended a tune abruptly and stood up.

Julia said at once, "Doctor Hootman, thank you! How did you happen to be near enough?"

"I often take a little stroll after dark." He sat down on a chair near the table where the candle stood. "I'll assume that my intervention was welcome. So we need not talk about that. Mevrouw, not long ago you told me that you would never again allow your will to come into conflict with Mynheer's."

"Yes, I did. And I meant it. Doctor Hootman, are you implying that what you inted —— I assure you that that was entirely

"What?" It occurred to her that Doctor u are saying?"

"I am telling you that if you are truly com-

She stared at him as though he had struck in the face or used some word of extreme scenity.
"I told you it was plain speaking," Doctor otman said. He courteously refrained from oking at her for a moment.

"e spoke to you of this?" she asked in a y, shamed voice.
"On the night of your arrival. Mevrouw, u must not mind my knowing; rather be d." His voice changed and took on an ier, more conversational tone. "I had, of hen that young man was a mere child this it was proposed and Pieter's marriage was ned to dovetail in with it—a few months to re so that his wife might have time to be-me fretful and discontented. Have you never iced how often Mynheer has said things culated to make you sorry for yourself?"

She nodded.
"You see? Nothing overlooked, nothing left to chance. It is the careful work of many years which you have in your power to crown with success or doom to failure. The young man's mother was a Vosmar. I have no doubt that Mynheer includes in his plan a prolonged tour of the islands, proudly and assiduously pointing out that the Vosmar family features have been reproduced once again."
"Don't," she said. "You make it all sound so horrible—just like animals."
"It is. Not a pleasant plan, but in its way masterly."
"Is it? It seems to depend so much on chance. Nicolas might have hated the sight of me."
"Every man has his price, Mevrouw; and Mynheer is very rich. Not, I hasten to add, that that has been necessary in this case."
There was a silence. Then she said:
"I don't think I could do it. It goes against something ——" She pressed her clasped hands to her breast. "It's so sickeningly cold-blooded. No, I couldn't."
Doctor Hootman seemed to settle more firmly and comfortably into his chair.
"Then, Mevrouw, we must consider. I think that we should first look at the gravity of the situation. An heir Mynheer must have, and he will go to any lengths to get what he needs. He never fully believed that Pieter's accident was responsible, so he dared not marry again. Imagine having to conceal the existence of two idiots, invent a secret life for them both—that would have taxed even Mynheer's ingenuity. So you see what a normal child means to him: not an heir only, but a perfect vindication of all these years of make-believe. Opposition isn't going to be easy, or safe."
The fright showed in her eyes.
"It's always best to face a thing squarely. It is hardly likely that Mynheer, having come so far, will let one girl stand in his way."
"He'd kill me?"
"Not with my consent. I am"—he raised and shrugged one heavy shoulder deprecatingly—"of no particular importance, but—I play my part. The fact that Pieter has outlived so many of his kind is my doing. I should use my influence to see that you got away with your life."
It seemed an outlandish promise to be made, here in this quiet, luxurious room.
"Before we go into that, look a little more closely into Mynheer's proposal. It is not without attractions, you know. You could be mother to the heir of all the Vosmars. Mynheer would not be niggardly in his manifestations of gratitude. Many women would not, in the circumstances, mind acting as brood mare."

"That's what I said!" she exclaimed sharply. "Like animals. Horrible!"
"Well, you may change your mind. If you stick to that, you will be dispensed with. Poor Pieter Vosmar, in addition to his other afflictions, will suffer sudden bereavement, but he will soon find another wife."
Even at that moment something in his tone jarred.
"Don't," she said. "None of this is his fault!" But this was not the time to think about Pieter. "Where should I be—if not dead?"
"That is where I should come in. I am in Mynheer's confidence; and I should be watchful. On his return he will begin to exert pressure. The day will soon come when he will say, 'Will you or won't you?' If you persist in your refusal, he will begin to plan your removal, but I shall forestall him. My plan is already made."
"Already. What is it?"
"Remember, Mevrouw, this which is new to you has been known to me for several months. When danger threatens—and make no mistake about it, it will be deadly danger—I shall get you away. It will appear as though, too hard pushed, you drowned yourself."
No dream had ever seemed more fantastic.
"Where should I go?"
He looked her full in the face and said, "To Ay. I have friends there into whose keeping I could safely commend you."
"Charles lives in Ay."
"That is so. He told you? Well, don't you think that you would be safe there? In Ay, with Charles?"
She almost laughed. The impulse to laughter was there, but she was afraid that if she yielded to it she would cry as well and become hysterical.
"Really, Doctor Hootman, that sounds so much like the ending of a fairy tale that it makes me wonder whether any of the rest of it is true."
There came across his face that same look as when she had explained her reason for taking food to Psyche.
"Look," he said, leaning slightly forward. "Isn't all the evidence in favor of Mynheer's plan's being cold fact? What do you think would have happened tonight had I not been ready, waiting?"
"Yes," she said, "that could be true."
"Isn't it also a fact that, being a man accustomed to his own way, he will be dangerous if thwarted?"
"Yes."
"Very well, then. What could I do except get you out of Rua? And where else could I send you? What is so fantastic, so much like a fairy tale about that?"
"It would be such a happy ending," she said simply. The hot color rushed into her face again.
"Mevrouw, after all our trials, don't you think we deserve a happy ending?"
Something peculiar happened to her mind; she could only see herself saying, "Let me do that," and lighting the fire for Charles. "Let me do that," and lighting the fire. "Let me do that," and lighting the fire. Over and over again, like a clock which had stuck and went on striking the same hour.
Doctor Hootman uncrossed his legs, and shifted in his chair.
"You'll have a day or two to think it over, I expect. Your best plan, for the moment, is to appear to encourage the young man when you are in company and discourage him when you are alone. Remember that you can count on my support if it is needed; but don't, too hastily, decide to oppose Mynheer. I wish you good night, Mevrouw."

The cloister lay sharply black and white in the moonlight. As he walked its length, moving from light to shadow, Doctor Hootman linked his hands and lifted and lowered them in a gesture very much like that of a man giving himself a congratulatory handshake.

Julia had known nights of uneasy, broken sleep, of sudden jolting wakenings and bad dreams before, but that night for the first time in her life she did not sleep at all.

"You look unlike yourself, my dear," said Mynheer. "Is anything the matter?" He watched for the betraying blush, the evasive glance, and was disappointed.

"I have a headache. I was lying down when you called me," Julia said.

It was midday when he returned and he had come straight into the house calling her name. The thought of facing him sickened her, but she must do so sooner or later, so she had come out of her room and found him in the hall, with a large parcel, wrapped in white linen, lying at his feet.

"I'm very sorry," he said in his kindest voice. "How long have you had it?" It wasn't credible that after all his careful staging a headache should have intervened ——

"It came on in the night."

"Well, I've brought you a present which I hope will cheer you, even if it won't cure a headache. Look."

He whisked away the linen and revealed some folded softness, a shimmer of blue and silver which revealed itself as a sarong of silk and a little jacket of gauzy stuff.

"It'll be cool to wear, and I'm sure you'll find it very becoming."

He expected, and awaited, some exclamations of admiration and of gratitude. She forced herself to say, "Thank you, Mynheer. It is very pretty," but the words came out listlessly.

"Your head is bothering you, poor girl. I'm sorry I disturbed you. Go and lie down again and tell Juno to rub your head for you. They have great cunning in their fingers and can often shift a pain."

As she turned to walk away, he asked:

"Where is Nicolas?"

"I couldn't say, Mynheer. I have not seen him this morning."

"Never mind. I shall find him. I hope your headache will soon vanish."

He went off briskly toward the plantation. When she reached her own doorway, instead of entering the room she turned and, leaning her arms on the cloister wall, put her aching head in her hands, and stared out into the garden. Mynheer was just about to enter the rose pergola.

From that distance he looked very small; and perhaps for that reason she made another effort to think well of him.

If I'd been different, she thought, his scheme, fantastic as it is, might have succeeded. Many women would not have found the bargain unduly one-sided. She thought of the hard-eyed woman in the tavern who, for some trivial sum, was eager to sell herself to a drunken sailor. The rewards here were very large, and Nicolas was young, attractive. Many women . . . but then I'm not any other woman, I'm myself. I am as I am, I can only be myself, be guided by what I feel and know is right for me.

Mynheer met Nicolas on the path and they exchanged a few remarks about the morning's work.

"You seem to have taken my place most satisfactorily," Mynheer said. "No need for me to go any further. Let us go and sit on the veranda and drink some well-cooled wine."

"Not for me, thank you," said Nicolas with a grimace. "I drank too much last night."

"Indeed? For you I prescribe lime juice, then. Does your head ache? Julia's does. What did you get up to last evening? A Bacchanalian orgy, eh?"

"I drank too much and I —— Uncle Simon, I think I'd better go home. If you don't mind, I'd like to go to Banda today and wait there for a ship. After what happened last night I don't think I can face Julia again."

"Good gracious me!" said Mynheer, putting his hand on Nicolas' shoulder. "Was it so bad? What happened?"

"I got drunk. Not very drunk—in fact, I didn't think —— But I lost my head and threw myself on Julia and . . . well, you can guess what happened."

The patchy pink in his face was engulfed in hot scarlet.

"That's just what I can't do. Nor can I see, in anything you have told me so far, why you should find it necessary to leave Rua. Did she . . . rebuff you?"

"Rebuff! She acted as though I were trying to rape her."

"Which was, of course, far from your intention?"

Nicolas shot his favorite relative a look of utter loathing, and said nothing.

"So she rebuffed you. Well, she wouldn't be a woman if she didn't do that at least three times! Surely you realize that."

"Once is enough for me, thank you!" Nicolas told him.

"Dear me. You are in a bad way. You're beginning to make me suspect that your feelings are seriously involved—to be taking the thing so much to heart. But I should be sorry if you cut short your visit. No harm has been done; you must make allowance for maidenly modesty and coquettishness, clumsily displayed. Poor Julia; I'll warrant that at this very minute she is trying some new dress or some new way of doing her hair in order to charm you."

"Or Pieter," Nicolas said.

Mynheer's hand fell away. "Did you say Pieter?"

"I think you've been wrong about them all along," said Nicolas, with some satisfaction at being thus able to shift a little of the blame. "I've come to the conclusion that she's in love with Pieter—which makes my behavior the more beastly. . . . And ridiculous."

"Well, of course," said Mynheer, now completely on his guard again, "that would be most desirable. I should have said that no woman who wasn't blind and deaf and equipped with the hide of a rhinoceros could possibly love anyone who had treated her as Pieter has treated Julia. But of course there are women who like to be ill used." His voice was thoughtful. After a pause he said, "Perhaps I've been a little blind myself. I've seen no sign. What makes you think so?"

"Nothing that I could put into words, really. Partly the cheerful way she goes off to spend time with him; and she won't talk about him. I admit I was—I mean I am—curious about him. Imagine if you went to stay in Java, or Macassar, and there was a member of the family whom you never saw—wouldn't you be curious?"

"I most certainly should," Mynheer agreed. "So Julia won't talk about him. That could be evidence on the other side."

"No. What she does say is all in his favor. The fact is, I've made a complete fool of myself."

"And I concerned myself unduly, or prematurely, about her happiness. I wonder. I don't usually make mistakes of that sort—and I see them together, you know."

"I saw her face last night. I was playing for her—it was her look, as much as anything, that was my undoing. She's in love with somebody, and it certainly isn't me."

Mynheer thrust his hand under Nicolas' arm. "I'm to blame, then; I misled you."

"I should have lost my heart—without any help from you, Uncle Simon," the boy said, in an easier way. "As it is, you do see why I can't stay here."

"I don't see that at all; but if you feel like that, I have an alternative suggestion. I was in conversation with an acquaintance of mine, Gerard Barnevelt, of Lonthoir, at dinner yesterday. I spoke of you and he extended an invitation for you to visit him. I flatter myself that I run Rua with moderate efficiency, but my methods are my own; there are others, and perhaps you should see something of them."

"I should like to do so," said Nicolas. "When could I go?"

"Not today, I'm afraid. It could probably be arranged for the day after tomorrow."

"That leaves me where I was as regards Julia."

"Do you carry a seal, Nicolas?"

"Yes—why?"

"Valuable?"

"It's silver."

Mynheer dived into his pocket and brought out his chain of keys from which his own seal swung. It was made of gold, inset with a large emerald upon which a bold V had been cut.

"I'll wager this, against yours," he said, "that her manner, when you meet, will be charming. You see, I'm still not convinced."

Under the soothing stroking, the gently prodding movements of Juno's firm fingers, the headache eased, and finally she slept, waking when the swift twilight had invaded the room and it was almost dinnertime. Instantly the memory of the information that Doctor Hootman had given her, and of the pattern of behavior he had told her to follow, settled like a heavy yoke upon her spirit.

Pale cheeks could be tinted, but even when that was done there was something wrong about her looks. Mynheer's eyes were sharp; and Nicolas' she dreaded to meet. She thought that perhaps if she wore the native dress it would divert attention from her face.

It was a wise choice, for the awkward moment of meeting was all taken up by exclamations of admiration, skillfully guided by Mynheer into a discourse about native weaving; and wasn't it remarkable that primitive people should have such perfect sense of design?

"Of course it may be that the word 'primitive' is here misleading. The arts of the so-called primitive people, in this part of the world at least, may be remembered things, the last echo of a vanished civilization. They say that all these islands are, or rather were, the tips of mountain ranges of some submerged continent."

With this kind of conversation, impersonal, speculative, yet well within his listeners' range, he enlivened the meal; and Julia, catching Nicolas' sheepish, immediately eager smile, smiled back. All seemed as before.

Presently Mynheer, leaping chamoiswise from one subject to another, mentioned Nicolas' imminent visit to Lonthoir.

"And how we shall miss you, my boy."

"When do you leave?" Julia asked Nicolas. He glanced at Mynheer, and he answered for him.

"I have dispatched the message. I suggested the day after tomorrow, unless that is particularly inconvenient for Mevrouw Barnevelt."

Across the table Julia's eyes met Doctor Hootman's. They were inscrutable, and almost immediately he looked down at the food piled on his plate.

Mynheer was now saying, "Daan—if Pieter hasn't retired when you go back, ask him to wait up, will you? A proposition was put to me this morning upon which I should like his opinion."

"I'll go now, and see if I can catch him." Doctor Hootman rose and hurried away.

A few minutes later Mynheer rose. "This business with Pieter won't take more than fifteen minutes," he said. "If you two like to go into the salon and set up two chessboards, I'll take you on both at the same time. You'll find a second set in one of the cabinets, Julia."

Walking along the cloister, Nicolas said, "Julia, I want to apologize for my behavior last evening. To say that I was not sober, I know, is no excuse, but I hope you'll take it into account."

"Let's not speak about it, or think about it any more," she said.

"Will you forgive me?"

"I have."

So long as we are full of self we are shocked at the faults of others.

FENELON

They entered the salon and she went to the cabinet where the chessmen she and Mynheer used as a rule were kept.

"Set these up," she said. "I'll find the others."

He stood there, holding the lacquered box in his hands. "I wasn't just being drunk and . . . lascivious, you know," he said in a rather miserable voice. "I do love you, Julia."

There was something touching about him this evening.

"I'm sorry, Nicolas. I wish I loved you. I really do. But I don't. And there's nothing I can do about it."

For the first time he seemed to accept this. "I wish I'd never come to Rua," he said. "Never set eyes on you."

There was hope for him, then, if he felt like that, she thought, turning away to search the cabinet for the second set of chessmen. I've only seen Charles twice; I may never see him again; I have nothing to hope for; but I wouldn't not have known him for anything in the world.

She found what she was looking for, and crossed to one of the tables and began to set out the game. Nicolas still stood staring at her gloomily.

"Uncle Simon's story was the only bit of family lore I ever found in the least interesting," he said at last. "Little did I think that mine was going to be the same—only more hopeless."

"What was his story?" Julia asked, hoping to divert him.

"He fell in love with a nun."

"With a nun?"

"On his way to Holland for his wedding with a girl to whom he had been betrothed for years."

"What happened?" Julia asked.

"They wanted him to be married in Holland; his father and grandfather had been travelers in their day and his father thought he should see something of the world. The woman was on the same ship; she was Portuguese, going back to Lisbon from Goa. Older than he was; and she'd been a nun for years, and was so well connected that she was practically royal. But this is where the case was different—she did love him."

"What happened?" she asked again.

"She got off the ship at Lisbon; he went on to Holland and talked himself out of his betrothal. That was more serious then even than it would be nowadays. Then he came home and tackled his family. It took him five years. Letters to everybody concerned—the head of the order, and to the Pope himself—and all of them taking seven months each way. But he got his way in the end."

"You mean he married her?"

"Yes. She was Pieter's mother. And within two years she was dead. My mother always says that that, and Pieter's accident, came as a judgment."

Mynheer believed that too. She remembered what he had said about having a feud with God; and about God being just, after all, and sending her to Rua. Suddenly that linked with what Doctor Hootman had said last night.

Her hands went limp, fell onto the board, knocking over several pieces. Against what had she pitted herself, what defied?

"It's quite a story, isn't it? And Uncle Simon told me himself that it was all well worth it. Two years with the woman of your choice, he said, was worth a lifetime of the other thing." His manner changed suddenly. "And that's made up my mind for me," he said in a harsh voice. "I shall not marry Greta Hoogenbeet. Nobody can make me. She can marry my brother and I shan't marry at all. It's too much to ask that when you're in love with one person you should be forced to go through the actions with somebody else!"

Just the way I feel, she thought, but I should protest, dissuade him; he'll ruin his life. It's no good his trying to copy Mynheer, he isn't made the same way, made of the same stuff.

Before she could speak Mynheer himself came into the room, saying cheerily, "Well, now, are you both ready? Ladies first, so I'll start with you, Julia."

Two days later Nicolas departed for Lonthoir, and dinner that evening was a quiet meal. Mynheer spoke little and was distrait of manner. When Doctor Hootman, with his usual perfunctory "If you will excuse me ——" began to push back his chair, he said brusquely:

"Sit down, Daan. I have something to discuss with you, and we might as well do it over a glass of brandy. . . . I'll join you later, my dear."

Julia left, and Mynheer sat silent for so long that even Doctor Hootman's equanimity cracked a little.

"Help yourself," Mynheer said at last, indicating the brandy. "Well, I have to confess myself defeated. It just wouldn't work. After all those years of scheming and waiting and planning. A crushing blow, Daan. A mortal blow to hope. How old are you, Daan?"

"Forty this year." His voice betrayed surprise.

"I wish you were younger. Still, you'll outlive me. I'm fifty-five and the years are beginning to tell."

"If you could take things more calmly ——" said Doctor Hootman in a smooth, false voice.

"I might as well tell you to take things less calmly. We take things as we must. However, I've made new arrangements. They involve a radical change in your position, Daan; one that I think, I hope, will be welcome."

"What change?"

"When I die, I shall leave all I have to Pieter, who cannot even write his name, who cannot, must not, be seen by anyone from outside. Did you ever ask yourself what would happen if my plans came to nothing?"

"I never carried my speculations so far. Keeping Pieter amused and occupied has sufficed to exercise my wits."

"It all works in. You are recognized as his friend, his resident doctor, the one man whose company he tolerates; but it would hardly do, after my death, for you suddenly to emerge as his man of affairs. That role you must begin to fill now. I propose, from this evening, to stage a very gradual retirement. I shall begin taking you about with me, introducing you and getting you familiar with the routine of running the plantation."

"I'm stunned," said Doctor Hootman. It was largely true. He was astonished beyond measure, not only by Mynheer's latest plan, but by the way he had taken the failure of his former one. At this very table, on the evening of Julia's arrival, Mynheer had confessed how long that plan had been in his mind, how deeply, how entirely he counted upon its success. Now, with hardly a whimper, he had abandoned it. Or was there, somewhere, carefully concealed, a trap in this new arrangement?

But I think I am a match for him, thought Doctor Hootman.

"Stunned," he repeated.

"Well, you've always had my confidence, and stood by me; and I shall feel that Rua and my poor boy are in safe hands. I shall begin to initiate you into the business tomorrow and then, in ten days, I shall ask you to undertake a journey for me—to Macassar."

Instantly it was all plain. Ha! said Doctor Hootman to Doctor Hootman as the light broke. He wants me out of the way! He does know of my intervention the other evening; probably he knows more. Now, with me on my way to Macassar and Nicolas back from Lonthoir, anything may happen.

"Macassar," he said thoughtfully. "That's a long way. I don't think —— It's Pieter I'm considering now. How will he manage?"

"Pieter must be weaned, as it were. You can't perform the duties of nurse and agent, Daan. Echo can look after him."

"Echo is useless," said Doctor Hootman quite angrily. "Pieter was dying of apathy, in Echo's charge, when I first came here."

"There's the girl now. She is, I think, genuinely devoted. She'll keep him amused."

"Yes, there is that." Doctor Hootman's voice was doubtful. His mind raced forward, weighing, assessing. "Pieter is, so to speak, my lifework—it isn't so easy just to hand over." He took a gulp of his brandy. "I can spare time to learn the business; I should indeed like to do that. But to be away so long, the first time I leave him—that does need thinking over."

Now, if the voyage to Macassar is just a ruse to get me away, he'll insist, Doctor Hootman thought, and if his suggestion is sincere he will compromise.

"Yes," Mynheer agreed. "Anyhow, one of us must go. The Queen of the East sails from Banda to Java in about ten days' time, and she will call on Macassar. I bespoke a passage on her this morning before leaving Banda. Whichever one of us sails in her will be sure of congenial company—Nicolas will also be aboard."

"Nicolas!" The single word, uttered in complete amazement, seemed to ring out and vibrate in the silence. "But his time isn't up."

"No. But he's of no use to me now. The sooner he's back under his father's thumb, the better. I shall arrange that whichever one of us sails for Macassar can take along what gear he left."

"I see," said Doctor Hootman.

There was no trick, then; no double dealing. It was an honest, straightforward arrangement. Nicolas aboard the Queen of the East and no other Vosmar nearer than Macassar. Safe. Better than safe. Promoted, elevated—everything handed to him on a platter. Was it possible? Could he believe?

"Of course," Mynheer went on, "if your devotion to duty—and I'd be the last to deny that it is admirable—is going to confine you here, this new scheme of mine can't work. If, in the future, you are going to act for Pieter, you must begin to act for me now. If you decide not to go, I shall; and if I go to Macassar I shall go on, to Java."

"To Java. Why?"

"Because if you don't go to Macassar I shall understand that you can't leave Pieter and therefore can't become what I want you to become. I shall consequently be compelled to make a different arrangement. I shall bring back a Vanderplasse boy. I'd prefer to have Nicolas, but he is the heir, they'd hardly spare him. There is, however, a brother, barely a year younger. I admit that that idea has certain attractions. Have done with all this pretense; tell the truth and adopt the boy legally. That might be best."

Doctor Hootman took a gulp at his brandy, and then, under cover of the table, wiped his sweating palms.

"I didn't say I couldn't go; I was just wondering how. If Nicolas isn't coming back here, it alters the situation. I could imagine Pieter in a screaming tantrum, me not here to control him, Nicolas in the house, all ears. After eight years, you know, one thinks of these things. Of course to adopt a young Vanderplasse would be a solution, but I do beg you, before you do that, give me time to get well away. I'm thick-hided, but I don't think I could face the talk and the scandal that would result from the divulging of the truth."

"That is the drawback," Mynheer agreed. "Then I take it that what I propose is agreeable to you? I add that I think you have earned everything you'll get, Daan." He lifted his glass and said, "I drink to your happy future."

Mynheer came tripping into the salon and took his place at the chess table.

"I'm sorry to have kept you waiting so long. I've been persuading Doctor Hootman to take a little holiday."

Her whole inside seemed to fall away. It was true, then. And somehow he knew that Doctor Hootman had promised to help her, so he was sending him away.

"Don't look so concerned, my dear. Is it that the thought of assuming more responsibility for Pieter distresses you? It really need not. Echo is perfectly competent. And Daan does need a holiday. He should have gone as soon as the rains stopped—but then Nicolas' visit was imminent. I confess that when we have a guest Daan is indispensable."

He had looked down at the chessmen, moving, with pernickety little nudges, one or two which were not in the exact center of their squares. Unobserved, she could moisten lips gone suddenly dry.

"What about . . . when Nicolas . . . comes back?" she asked.

"He isn't coming back. He's decided to curtail his visit and join the Queen of the East at Lonthoir. I thought you knew. So it looks as though you and I, my dear, will have to entertain each other. Now—my turn to be white, I think!"

So it was all over. That was, if it had ever existed. The will-o'-the-wisp delight which had danced at the final point of Doctor Hootman's scheme—that in the last event he would find some way of sending her to Charles for protection—flickered away into darkness. She had never really believed it, anyway.

Now the future stretched ahead, serene, if dull. Making pots with Pieter; playing chess with Mynheer.

He beat her with more than his usual ease and, leaning back, said, "Don't be discouraged; remember I was playing this game before you were born."

"I don't concentrate hard enough."

"No. And concentration is the secret. That and a certain flexibility."

He looked at the board as he spoke, but it was not of a mere chess game that he was thinking.

Teresa had known Mark for less than a week and he understood that she was engaged to Neville Morley. Their wedding date was set. Why then should Teresa find Mark and the mysteries surrounding him so disturbing? Elizabeth Cadell's romantic new novel, "Sugar House," is complete—condensed—in this issue.

THE DUKES ROLL UP THEIR (ERMINE) SLEEVES

Now that the paying public can visit Britain's famous homes, the titled owners are selling post cards, serving tea, even taking weekend guests. Usually the whole family pitches in for the tourist season. It's big business. Robin Miller gives details in "The Peerage Game."

"AFTER WE HAD BEEN GOING STEADY FOR TWO MONTHS HE TOLD ME HE WAS MARRIED"

Theresa is twenty-two. Although their religion forbids divorce, she says Charles plans to start proceedings soon. "We both feel we are too much in love to give each other up. I pray you can help us find a sound and sensible solution." Dr. Clifford Adams answers in "Making Marriage Work."

"WE HAD THE MISFORTUNE TO FALL IN LOVE WITH A HOUSE"

Marjorie and Wyman Riley and their seven children live in a 17-room house—three floors, four fireplaces, five bathrooms (two don't work) in Vallejo, Cal. Buying the house was "a financial error" but do they regret it? Heavens, no! Next installment of "How America Lives."

NOT MARRIED—BUT SHE WEARS A WEDDING RING

"I held my baby for five minutes," she said. "I knew if I held her one more minute I'd never be able to give her away." The story is in her own words, exactly as she told it to Margaret Parton. "When is Love Wrong?"

MARRY I MUST

affairs, clothes purchasing. They relaxed each other and stimulated each other. Andy's wit was without barb and she was a gifted mimic. T. J. was double your money's worth of vitality and enthusiasm. T. J. was ambitious for herself and Andy sighed and said personally she never wanted to go anywhere but here. "Maybe I could marry into the faculty and not even have to pack when I graduate," she said hopefully. It was a joke then. The faculty was elderly, and, if single, of the same sex. If younger, and of the other sex, it was well married before setting foot on the campus. There were one or two exceptions.

Their social lives differed. T. J. waded through dates as through a field of clover. Andy often went home for weekends, responsibly, and some of her social life was connected with boys she had always known who turned up at college in the form of sober young men who worked in lumberyards belonging to their fathers, or who were just starting out as engineers. By the time they were juniors, they had changed each other somewhat—Andy saw more people and T. J. was a little more selective about her dating—but not essentially. They still made jokes about Operation Marry-I-Must.

"I don't want to make any mistakes," T. J. said, about the time that Bull turned up.

Andy said, "You'd better sign up with some other race—nonhuman. Around here, it's moonlight and mistakes, moonlight and mistakes, day in and day out."

T. J. said affectionately, "Suppose you'd got somebody else but me for a roommate? Wouldn't it have been awful?"

"I'd have diminished her right off with Formula X," Andy said. "Stood her on the bureau and had the whole room to myself."

But this was nearly the end of their senior year and two things—two men—had happened. One was Chris Connors, who had been at Martens for two years, in the music department. He was already a composer of minor note and he lived in a small Japanesy house of the most contemporary design; it made him furious to have it described—by T. J. or anyone else—as a cottage small by a waterfall. He had a waterfall. He had written the music for the senior opera for which T. J. was doing the choreography and in which she was one of the leading dancers. Andy, although she protested she could only sing coex-coex, like other frogs, had a lovely, relaxed deep voice and had one of the main singing roles. It was the first time she and T. J. had done anything like this together, and both of them saw a good deal of Chris. Andy had her own beauty and her own qualities and she had never been a rival to T. J., who stopped men in their tracks. Suddenly Andy felt autumnal.

The other man was Landry Durham, inevitably called Bull Durham. He was a great, heavy-shouldered man, working his way with dogged endurance through medical school, piling up loans that would darken the first years of his earnings—and he still had an unpaid internship and house-officership ahead of him.

"By Hard Times, out of Earnest Intentions," Andy murmured when she met him first. She added slowly, "He's kind of special, T. J. I wouldn't fool around with him, if I were you. I'd mean it, or I'd let him alone." After a long pause she added, "One of my brothers married a nurse. She's still working—it works fine for them. But you have to want to be a doctor's wife to stand the grind."

"I hadn't really put him on the list of possible-probables," T. J. said. Unlike herself, she fell silent, and Andy knew that something had happened to T. J. and that it was Bull.

If they're in love, they'll find out for themselves, she thought. And it'll make them a lot of trouble. Heavens, what a nuisance T. J. will be for Bull!

She was right. Bull was goaded by T. J. as his namesake might be by a swarm of bluebottles. He flung his great head from side to side and occasionally bellowed—but he could not get away. He frightened T. J. He implied so much—a lifetime and a terrible responsibility which she had never before had to consider as any part of her plans. Because she was frightened, she went out almost desperately with other people. At about this time the opera got under way, and she and Andy were often invited to Chris Connors' little Sunday supper parties. He asked them early, to help—they were his hostesses, really. Until very recently, warned by his superiors about susceptible undergraduates, he had sought out girls he knew elsewhere, older girls, suitable for his thirty-one years. When he found himself staring too intently at Andy and thinking that, gentle and reposeful as she seemed, she gave him the impression of having a volcano of emotion in her heart, he quickly looked at T. J., so quick, so young, so gay.

The copper light of sunset flared down and a sudden grayness filled the corner room.

"Then you must have been with Chris," Andy said. "Not in the rehearsal hall. I tried to find you there."

"I'm going to marry Chris," T. J. said suddenly. She could not look at Andy. Her heart beat thickly.

"You're a dancer!" Andy cried sharply. "You've been offered a part in a show on Broadway next fall. How are you going to be a faculty wife?"

"He has an exchange professorship at Columbia next year, if he wants it," T. J. said. "That was one of the things we talked about this afternoon, and after a while we were talking about getting married. He's very lonely."

"And what about Bull? Last night you ground your teeth in your sleep all night long."

"I'm sick of quarreling with Bull," T. J. said, closing her eyes. "There's more to getting married than kissing and quarreling. I'm through with all that. It will be different with Chris."

Last night Bull had said, "I'd be crazy to marry you—a kid, a dancer at that!"

"Who asked you?" T. J. said furiously. "You think I want a great hulking medical student all wrapped up in getting ahead?"

"Yes," he said. He was suddenly white. "You do, and I do," he said. "I guess it's out."

At that point he had wrenched her head around to kiss her. She aimed sharp kicks at his shins. Today they must be black and blue.

"You heel," she said. "If that's your idea of love ——"

He stood looking like a bear that has been shot and hurt, she thought with a kind of remote noticing that had nothing to do with her own shaking, clamoring young body. He moved his head from side to side.

"You've been having it too easy," he said. "I guess I had to make you know what's going on. I'm afraid it's the real thing, and we'll have to make our plans accordingly. I don't like it any better than you do."

"I have no plans that include you," T. J. said. "Please go!"

If she had ground her teeth in her sleep, it had nothing to do with her waking. She wanted to make Andy understand that, but Andy had turned away and was dressing for the Spring Sing. They did not go down to the dining hall together.

Now it was dark. The seniors sitting on the stone steps in front of Administration House began their last song, "We who are about to leave you," and underclassmen in the dormitories around the campus lit the traditional answering candles to promise that the light of learning would never be extinguished. T. J. shivered suddenly. The Spring Sing always seemed to fall on an evening too cold for any outdoor occasion. Once it had even snowed, in April. But it was an interior winter she felt: all the warmth and confusion and excitement of the afternoon had left her. She told herself that after any commitment one always had doubts—it couldn't be helped. It was reaction.

At the last note of the song, before a pause could even consider beginning, T. J. got to her feet, ran lightly up the steps (a gift of the Class of '13) to reach the platform first. She gripped the delicate iron railing (a gift of the Class of '27) and looked out toward the audience, trying to find the only faces that mattered. But the indirect lighting focused on the steps and the candles flickering, a flashlight beam as someone moved across the new spring grass, the parking lights from cars beyond the green, all confused the darkness. She whirled around T. J. It was hard to locate even familiar fixed points. She thought she heard someone near her murmur, "She said she would and she did," but without any particular malice. People seemed to understand about T. J.'s having to be first. It was her maturity. She worked harder and usually deserved her honors. She felt a momentary regret that she had so often and so lightly pronounced her present purpose. Still, it didn't really matter. She was the first senior to make this announcement. Others were already crowding and rustling near her, wanting their turn to speak.

T. J. took a deep breath. Why was it so hard? This was the logical end to Operation Hurry-I-Must.

"I am happy to announce my engagement," she said. "To ——"

She paused, looking desperately before her for Andy's face. Andy should have been on the steps with the others, but, saying she felt too old tonight for stone steps and young voices, she had disappeared.

I have to find Andy! T. J. thought desperately. She's got to understand!

She could feel impatience around her. Hurry! Hurry! the others were voicelessly crying. Tell us his name and let us speak!

A roving spotlight suddenly brought Andy's white face out of the darkness. She looks as though she had been spending her time drowning herself, T. J. thought. Why is that?

The spotlight moved a few inches, and she suddenly realized why. How had she managed not to know before? Andy was standing between two men. One was Chris Connors, and the other was Bull Durham. T. J. felt sick. She had certainly never anticipated that Bull would turn up for the Spring Sing and, after last night's debacle, hear her public announcement. He deserved better than that. There hadn't been time to tell him.

Chris stared at her and she remembered his arms around her this afternoon, after a curious, rambling conversation. She remembered how the afternoon had ended, and how she had thought her confusion was natural, in the circumstances.

"I was going to be married, that is," T. J. heard her own transparent-sounding voice say. "I suppose I'm the first senior to stand here and announce a broken engagement. I'm terribly sorry, everybody."

In an odd hush, she spun around, wrenched her hands from the railing and plunged into the crowding anonymity of the other seniors mounting the steps while she was hurrying down them.

"What did that child say?" gray-haired Miss Masterson asked a wraithlike music-department companion.

"She said she wasn't going to get married," her friend replied.

"Well!" said Miss Masterson, bewildered.

As if to obliterate the unfortunate effect of T. J.'s spectacular words that had nearly shattered the sentimental atmosphere of the Spring Sing, other seniors began to take their places, one by one.

"I take great pleasure in announcing my engagement to Thomas W. Madison," one said, and somewhere in the audience a figure hurried forward to meet her. Someone else said, "I also announce my engagement to be married to Lt. John T. Keller, at present on sea duty. He'll be back in July." And so on. Several dozen seniors so announced their engagements and in a general restlessness the Spring Sing broke up. Seniors star-scattered through the grass and down into the town, realizing how little time there was left in these surroundings they had so often disparaged but now loved. Cars flashed by in the streets, people flung greetings out like confetti, conscious that it was only here, near the college, that they were known and had status. Out in the world, after commencement, it would be all to be done over again—finding a place, finding what it was they wanted, in a nervous kind of musical chairs. As in marrying, some would inevitably be left out. Seniors who had not announced their engagements felt, for the first time, like spinsters. Everyone wanted the friends she knew best. There was frantic calling out: "Hey, has anybody seen Jinny Banks? Jinny Banks around here?"

No one ever repented of being a Christian on his deathbed.

HANNAH MOORE

T. J. was not looking for her friends. She was hiding from them—if she had any. For once, she longed for one of those faceless hotel rooms with mottled taupe furniture and clean towels in the far-from-clean bathroom. She had stayed in many such rooms in the intervals between parents. It struck her that her only home for nearly four years had been the room she shared with Andy. It had been the best home she had ever known, and now it wasn't, because of what she had done to Andy. How could she have been so cruel and so stupid? Why had she never taken pains to realize that Andy was in love with Chris? The signs were there to be read if she had cared to read them. Andy was ready to be married as T. J. suddenly knew she herself was not. All those conversations about faculty wives—her silence when they came home from one of Chris' parties ——

T. J. put her hands deep in the pockets of her tweed coat and walked through the mean back streets of the little town. She looked into grocery-store windows and counted the cans of tomatoes on display. She looked into drugstore windows. She did everything but go where she might meet Andy until, after nearly two hours, exhaustion set in. She felt ghastly, remembered she had had nothing but a cup of coffee for dinner. Then she had been excited, wound up to tell everyone she had done what she set out to do and got a man to marry by Commencement Day. Would she really have married Chris? Probably, she thought. If he hadn't realized it wasn't me he loved.

I've got to get warm, she thought. She was shaking with cold.

The best place for encountering no one she knew was an olde-type New England inn, Sukey's Tavern. Its roughhewn walls were hung with bright brass and copper, old bills of sale, including one for a runaway slave, old framed mottoes, "Home is Where the Heart Is" being the one that caught T. J.'s eye tonight. Besides the tables there were some high-backed booths near the big fireplace.

By luck, a couple was just leaving a booth and T. J. slid in before one of the motherly, bad-tempered waitresses could come and tell her no booths for one person. The menu was rich in pineapple waffles and the kind of drinks Andy used to say they put marshmallows into. "Marshmallows, gin, and a green maraschino cherry." Once she and Andy had been taken, very gently and kindly, by an elderly faculty member to have tea here.

"I'll have a double Scotch on the rocks," she said. "And coffee, please." She looked the waitress straight in the eye. "I'm expecting a man to join me."

"I doubt it," the waitress said, and T. J. closed her eyes. She did not open them until she heard her glass set down.

Andy said politely, "After you've eaten your dinner on the rocks, perhaps we can have what is known as a few words?"

T. J.'s expression did not actually alter, but her pretty, wide face looked as though it were clenched like a fist.

"I don't know how Chris feels about all this," Andy said. "He just disappeared after your great exhibition. Another first for T. J. Dickinson! Hearts broken in public!"

"Don't!" T. J. begged.

But Andy, so gentle and round and honey-voiced, went right on. "What happened?" she said. "Why did you get cold feet, T. J.? After all, the damage was done."

T. J. shook her head, tears suddenly spilling out of her eyes—and she was a girl who rarely cried. These had been gathering for some time. She thought of Bull's expression when the glare of light trapped him.

"I knew you'd be hiding here," Andy said. "If you'd had any money with you, I'll bet you'd have gone to a hotel tonight, so you wouldn't have to face me. But why? I'm not the injured party. You didn't have to know how I felt. It's my own bad luck. But Chris didn't deserve what he got, and Bull didn't. I hope you feel the way Bull does, wherever he is. He left too."

T. J. sprang to her feet. "No more," she said, and Andy got up too.

"Come home, T. J.," she said gently. "It's the only home you've got."

Andy had to pay the bill and lead T. J. out with her coat collar turned up and her shoulders shaking.

Later, T. J., sitting in the dark and wept out at last, said, "What makes me feel so awful is he didn't really want to, Andy. It just happened."

They had been working, at first, alone in Chris' house, because it was quieter there. They had looked at each other, and since each of them had needed someone who wasn't there, to whom problems of responsibility and change were also attached, they had made a common human error of thinking they needed each other. That seemed easier. And when the sudden burst of emotion was over, concerned for each other as innocent victims, promising each other that if they married, it would at least be honest, and a decision of some sort, they had parted.

"And now I suppose you'll have pride, and you'll hate me forever, and Chris will be mixed up, and it will be all my fault—oh ——" But there were no more tears to weep. "Let alone Bull," she said.

Andy said, "O.K., T. J. You can't cry any more and I can't listen any more. I feel terrible. It isn't your fault, but the fact remains. I could have tried to do something about Chris myself, I suppose—but I didn't want it that way. I didn't want to interrupt his nea bachelor life until he thought of it for himself I can't stand any more of today. Let's go t sleep."

"Operation Marry-I-Must," T. J. said, with real bitterness. "The guided missile that go lost."

The next day Chris came to see T. J. H sat her down over coffee and said, "It was a awfully short engagement."

She blushed miserably. "Don't," she said "Forgive me, Chris. I seem to have done about as many wrong things as possible. You want me out of the opera?"

"You know you can't do that," Chris said.

The next day he telephoned Andy formally He asked her out, as though all the informality, and the mixing up, and the parties had never been at which he had let her be hal hostess, and not known how this made he feel. She accepted. Sensibly, he put her into his car and drove her three towns away before he took her to dinner. Andy came home a one, smiling and pale, and told T. J., "We're courting, officially. It was a word he used."

"I'm terribly glad," T. J. said humbly.

But Bull was not like Chris, and he did not come back. As in many other life situations there was nothing T. J. could do about it. She could not write him—what was there to say She could only keep thinking someone she saw, totally different in every way, was Bull coming toward her through a crowd, whe it wasn't. She could only grind her teeth, ever when she was awake, and tell herself, It' ruined and you did it yourself.

T. J. got up on the morning of commencement calm and already departed, in spirit; a she told Andy. She was packed, or nearly. She got dressed neatly and on time.

"You'll come back, T. J.," Andy said. "You'll come and see Chris and me and you'll think what a fusty, fuddy-duddy faculty life it is. It won't be your home—but you'll be a loved and welcome guest."

T. J. said, "I'm happy for you, Andy. And I'll come and stay in your guest room with a trap door right over the waterfall—just the thing. You'll never have to take your guests to the train when they leave."

"And we won't have to mail the toothbrushes they forget," Andy said. "Come on, T. J. Let's go and get diplomas."

T. J. looked out over the ranks of faces, friends, parents, faculty, underclassmen, and remembered that the Chinese said all Westerners looked alike, blowzy and pink, like peonies. And then she saw Bull, who did not look like a peony. He pulled her out of line as she walked by him.

"Why did you come back?" T. J. said.

Bull pushed the crowd away from them somehow, not with his hands, more with his will to have her alone. What had frightened her about him, T. J. realized, was his utter independence: he was what he was and no one could alter him. He would very probably amount to something.

"Why did you think I left?" Bull said. "You had to get married. So I had to get a job. Now I've got one, for the summer, anyway, until the internship starts."

"It's all right, I don't have to get married any more," T. J. said. "That's all over with."

"No it isn't," Bull said. "Here I've been going through hell, not seeing you and worrying and taking exams and job hunting—all so I could marry you when I had no intention of getting married."

"Oh, I love you, too—but there's no need to yell and there's no need to get married," T. J. said.

"Look, a dancer just starting in is just what a young medical man needs," Bull said. And then he stopped talking and snapped her to him so abruptly she was winded. Commencement fell all over them, but they neither knew nor cared. Other people were embracing, coming and going, laughing and talking, but Bull and T. J., lovers against their better judgment, were as good as alone.

This is the real commencement, after all, T. J. thought and realized what she should have known before, that home is not a place. It is a person. END ere Tracy was supposed to be. My telegram s returned with the notation that he wasn't r istered. Two days later he walked in, kissed n and began talking about the blistering hit in Dallas. I handed him the undelivered tegram. For a moment he was flustered. Jen he immediately produced a glib tale to t effect that the convention had adjourned ely and he had gone on to visit a customer in Houston. I knew this was untrue because I checked his itinerary with the local office, something I rarely do. I don't make a habit of riddling in his business. According to the ice, no convention had been held in Dallas ad Tracy was actually in Tucson, Arizona. I dropped the subject. Maybe I didn't want to know what he was doing in Arizona.

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

"Shortly afterward I learned the whole story. It was late at night and Tracy and I were in bed asleep when the phone rang. I answered it. Carol was calling from Arizona. She was high as a kite. Tracy got the telephone away from me and persuaded Carol to hang up. But he couldn't persuade me, hard as he tried, that she was one of his customers' girl friends. I thought she was his girl friend. Before the sun came up—we talked until morning—I discovered I was right.

"Tracy was deeply involved with Carol. If I hadn't been so heartbroken on my own account, I might have pitied her. As it was, I can't blame her for the mess. I couldn't. She didn't know Tracy was a married man, the father of three children. He hadn't told her. He lacked the courage, he said.

"The shock of his confession was shattering, although I concealed it. I thought I must have failed somewhere as a wife. I thought Carol must be more appealing to him physically. I felt obliged to offer him his freedom and did so calmly, but the truth is I was terrified I would lose him. Tracy said I had not failed and that he did not want a divorce. He promised there would be no more Carols in his life and that he would break with her at once. He did feel, however, that he owed her the consideration of a personal visit, and the next day the two of us drove to Arizona. I waited in a downtown hotel while he faced Carol. She put him through a rough experience. She cried, she screamed, she threatened to buy a gun and shoot him. Indeed, she gave him such a scare that I had to drive the car back to Los Angeles. He was still shaky after we arrived. He asked his office to relieve him of the Tucson territory and he and I went on a short trip. I was convinced he was truly sorry and I avoided recriminations. We were sweet and gentle to each other.

"It was my mother-in-law who introduced me to Tracy. At that time she was a national officer in my college sorority—I was a lowly sophomore—and Tracy was a bachelor of twenty-six, already graduated, and well established with the firm where he still works. He considered me just a kid and we saw each other only sporadically, but I regarded him as my most exciting date. When he went on his trips—he was sharing an apartment with his brother—I used to drop by their place and help her keep up with his mending and stuff. One time she and I redecorated and repapered his room. Tracy laughed at us, but I think he was pleased.

"When he was drafted and stationed in San Francisco I bombarded him with letters, got few replies. But the day he received sailing orders for the Pacific he telephoned me and proposed. His mother and I promptly took a plane to San Francisco. We were married in the camp chapel. A few days later his orders were canceled and he never did get overseas. One of Tracy's favorite jokes used to be that I owed my proposal to a fluke. I used to laugh at that joke too.

"Tracy's Army assignment didn't keep him on the post at night and by a miracle I found a small apartment where we spent two wonderful years. I continued my college studies in the morning—in the afternoon I held a job—and in the evenings we bowled and skated and danced like crazy. It wasn't until Tracy received his discharge and went back with his old firm that I discovered how demanding a salesman's work can be.

"Since that time I have often felt Tracy was married to his job, not to me. On the night Johnnie was born Tracy wasn't at the hospital; he was at a boxing match with a covey of customers. When Ruthie had her tonsils out, he was on a fishing trip with his boss. And a lot of his so-called business activities don't seem to me to have much to do with selling. Until the children came along, Tracy kept me busy wining and dining out-of-town clients, who usually appeared without their wives. Tracy often arranged dates for these married men. And after a long evening I would jump out of bed to go gift-shopping for the absent wives. I don't mind buying a pretty blouse for a woman I haven't met, but I hate helping a philandering husband to salve his conscience.

"Tracy lavishes much more attention on his customers than he does on the children or me. The customers come first. He dislikes liquor, but he drinks to put drinking men at ease. He dislikes rich food, but the proof of his high regard is a high-priced restaurant. I'm quite sure that Tracy's company expense account doesn't cover his entertainment spending, but I don't really know. Tracy likes to live splendidly and he wants everyone's good opinion. He can't bear to appear unpleasant and it is almost impossible for him to say no. Because it was a project of his civic club, Tracy spent every Saturday last summer teaching underprivileged kids to swim. He has yet to find the time to take our Johnnie and Stevie on a weekend camping trip.

"Tracy is liberal and freehanded, but somehow the family money is usually managed so the children and I get the worst of it. Our present house is far too small. It wasn't a bargain in the first place; I'm convinced Tracy bought it because a real-estate friend was in trouble and needed to make a sale. Our garage is too narrow to hold a modern car. Tracy hired a carpenter to enlarge it and the carpenter botched the job. Instead of withholding the check until the work was satisfactorily completed, Tracy paid promptly. As a result, I hunt every day for a place to park on our street.

"In all fairness, I don't believe Tracy realizes he spends more on his clothes than he does on me and the children. I'm sure he would deny it. Buying good suits, he says, is an economy, but he pays more for a suit than his boss does. Tracy just doesn't know what he spends; we have no family budget. Our electric refrigerator must be the oldest model extant, and for months I squirreled nickels and dimes from the household account in the hope of getting a new one. Then one fine day Tracy received a wire from an old friend—not even a customer—who needed a five-hundred-dollar loan. When that money went out of the house (we never got it back), I gave up on the new refrigerator.

"Last April we had a financial crisis, and not the first one. Tracy bought several hundred dollars' worth of luggage and a set of new golf clubs and drove away on a three-week trip. This left only eleven dollars in our bank account. In the second week, I went to work in a department store to tide us over, and my mother came to stay with the youngsters. It wasn't the first time I had taken a temporary job. But Tracy never knew; I didn't tell him.

"Not long after his return from that trip, I began to suspect there was another woman in the picture. Don't ask me why; maybe I just sensed it. I met Phyllis one evening without tumbling to the fact that she was interested in my husband. She was escorted by an out-of-town customer; the four of us went dancing and then dropped by our house for scrambled eggs. Phyllis was a bleached-blond divorcee with a nine-year-old daughter; she was a new receptionist at Tracy's home office and very wide-eyed about the fascination of the business. Just remembering those eggs I scrambled and served to her practically makes me choke.

"Phyllis was, of course, the other woman in the picture. That news was delivered to me by the postman. One morning I opened a bill from our dentist and was sure an error had been made; I called the dentist's secretary. The error had been mine when I opened the bill. Tracy was paying for a teeth-straightening job for Phyllis' little girl. I don't believe a bill for a mink coat would have made me half as angry.

"I called Phyllis on the telephone and she was delighted that at last I knew the score. She informed me that Tracy was also paying the rent on her apartment and that she expected to marry him when I obtained a divorce. When Tracy came home that night I had hysterics for the first time in my life. Our living room already looked like a department store. I had pulled his expensive clothes out of the closet and jammed some of them into his expensive suitcases. As he came in the door I threw the unpacked jackets, his silk slacks, his custom-made shoes on the front porch and tried to push him after them. Tracy tried to take me in his arms and comfort me. I hit him, I screamed, I wept. But why go on?

"That dreadful scene occurred two weeks ago. Tracy is still in the house. He insists he is all washed up with Phyllis, that she means nothing to him and never did, that he loves me and our youngsters, that he deserves another chance. Again and again he has promised there will never be another woman. Unfortunately, I have heard those promises before.

"At this point I don't know which way to turn. I feel completely baffled. I don't understand Tracy or why he treats me as he does. I don't understand the way he acts at all. In spite of my suffering and disillusionment, I am still fond of him in some ways. I would hate to bring up my children without a father, although I have no fears about my ability to provide for them as well as he has done. If I take a few refresher courses, I can get a teacher's certificate. The children and I can learn to live without Tracy, I suppose. I don't quite see how I can ever learn to live in peace with a man who is unfaithful, untruthful, untrustworthy."

Tracy Tells His Side:

"Like a good many other men, I lead two lives," said Tracy, who was thirty-eight years old and looked younger. His muscles hadn't yet begun to run to fat; his round, sunburned face was drawn in a scowl but seemed cherubic. "I have a home life with Elise and my kids. I have a business life that is separate and apart from my home. In my business life I meet women, lots of them, but I don't take up with stray girls at a convention the way many of the fellows do; I would rather sit and chew the fat and trade jokes. I'm no Don Juan, whatever Elise may think. I'm in love with her.

"Carol once meant something to me, I'll admit, although I saw her only a couple of times a year and thought of her as a friend rather than a sweetheart. She was a businesswoman with a good, sound head. I used to talk over my deals and cry over my worries with her in a way I couldn't do with Elise. One time early in my marriage I hinted to Elise that some little thing about my job wasn't absolute perfection and for the next six months I was fighting off her attempts to get me into an entirely different line of business. That experience taught me to keep my mouth shut.

"Carol fooled me about what she wanted from our association. I had no idea she was looking for permanence. She liked tennis and horses, she liked to swim, she played golf like a man. We had many good times together. Elise hasn't been on horseback since Johnnie was born. She gave away her golf clubs when Stevie came along. Since our five-year-old joined the family she has rarely put on a bathing suit. She lacks the time, she says. I can't imagine Carol ever being too busy for sports.

"Well, there's no point dwelling on the past. I gladly split up with Carol for my wife's sake, although in the final showdown I got the impression Carol had more genuine affection for me than Elise. She sure showed more flesh-and-blood feeling. Elise offered me a divorce as calmly as though she were offering me a second cup of coffee. Her coolness wasn't flattering. After all, she was my wife and had caught me in the wrong. She had earned the right to raise the roof, but she didn't even raise her voice.

"Elise isn't an easy person to understand. When she was a girl she seemed to be crazy about me. When the children began to come I soon began to feel I had been crowded out. I guess it's a common experience. Today I couldn't tell you how Elise really feels about me, what she really thinks. Apparently she doesn't think much of me at the moment. My guess is her thinking will change.

"For the most part, I would call Elise a self-contained and a self-maintaining woman. I can't believe that either she or the youngsters miss me during my absences. All three of my kids are bored with me and show it. I suppose it's natural enough. They look to their mother for their pleasures. I'm just that man who comes and goes. When I arrive home from a trip, it's nothing special to my family. No fireworks are shot off. Frequently, after two weeks on the road, I walk into an empty house. There isn't even a note for me to read. It's a lonesome sensation. I get the feeling I might as well have stayed away; that my family can do without me. Other men in my line of work have the same experience. I'm not kicking, I'm merely trying to understand Elise's side of the present foul-up.

SENECA SAID

We judge ourselves by what we think we can do. Others judge us by what we have already done.

He who injured you was either stronger or weaker. If he was weaker, spare him. If he was stronger, spare yourself.

As long as you live, keep learning how to live.

"I cannot comprehend why she forgave me four years ago without batting an eye and yet can be so hard on me now. My interest in Phyllis is completely dead and was always trivial. I saw Phyllis outside the office a dozen times at the most and I certainly don't propose to see her again. The sooner Elise and I quit talking about the matter, the better off we will be. There's been too much talk already.

"When Elise first discovered the situation, I'm willing to admit that I deserved exactly what I got. In fact, I didn't mind the punishment I had to take; Elise's hysterics seemed to prove she cared enough about me to blow her top. It was the first time I ever realized she was capable of violent jealousy. I know I shouldn't have stepped out on her even with an unimportant girl, and maybe I shouldn't have lied to her. I told the lies only when I was cornered, and then I told as few as possible. I still can't see that my telling her the truth during those earlier fishing expeditions of hers would have been helpful. Elise wouldn't have believed me. She doesn't believe me yet.

"If Phyllis hadn't had a nine-year-old daughter, the honest truth is that our acquaintance would have stopped in the office. I didn't ever promise to marry that young woman; I promised her nothing. Nor was I paying the rent on her apartment. I lent her one month's rent and though I didn't expect the loan to be repaid there is quite a difference. Phyllis was having a tough time supporting her daughter; they were newcomers to the West Coast and had no friends and I was sorry for them both. One afternoon the little girl came by the office after school and I bought an ice-cream cone for her. The child was more grateful for the ice cream than my sons were when I gave them the money for a plane ride.

"I drove Phyllis and her daughter home that afternoon. On the way Phyllis praised my sales record to the skies and I was surprised and pleased she had noticed. When I learned she was broke, a chronic condition with her, it seemed natural to stop and lay in a stock of groceries for her. It then seemed natural for me to stay long enough to sample her cooking. I quickly became aware I had made a mistake, that Phyllis was a talented gimme-girl and a troublemaker to boot, but I didn't know what to do about it. In the hope she would latch on to somebody else, I introduced her around and my strong hunch is she has already consoled herself. Phyllis is the type who is bound to light on her feet. It's preposterous for Elise to let that girl worry her and upset our marriage.

"Shucks, all couples have their troubles. Most couples have far more serious troubles than ours. Ill health, religious differences, arguments over children, insufficient money. I'm not a bad guy. In the main, I'm a pretty good guy. I wish Elise would think about my virtues for a while. I don't smoke. I'm strictly a two-drink man and I would gladly stay on the wagon except that in my business I can't afford to be a kill-joy. I support my family comfortably. Elise has never had to work. She is now talking of returning to college and getting a teacher's license, which is ridiculous. I'd prefer she didn't work. Anything in reason she and the youngsters think they need I am able to provide. It's true that we need a larger house and someday soon we'll probably be moving into one. If Elise doesn't get what she wants, it's her own fault. If the money doesn't go for one thing it goes for another, I often tell her. Sometimes I wonder whether she isn't extra thrifty in order to point up my extravagance.

"There is a streak of the martyr in Elise. She still remembers I was at a boxing match the night of Johnnie's birth, but seemingly she doesn't remember that she went into labor two weeks early, and I got to the hospital as soon as I could. As a rule, I'll admit, I let Elise take full charge when the kids are sick and I duck out on the hospital waiting. My philosophy is to avoid depressing places and depressing thoughts, and look on the bright side of things. Elise is the opposite of me in many ways. When I'm on the road I know she feeds herself and the kids hamburger when I would rather they all ate steak. It would make my own steaks taste better.

"As I look back I can realize I didn't expect my marriage would be one hundred per cent perfect. To be honest, in my youth I didn't intend to marry. I was comfortable sharing an apartment with my mother and I enjoyed running around with all the girls. To me marriage seemed too grim, too confining. Devoted as I am to my mother, I can recall occasions when she made it hot for my father because he didn't earn enough to suit her. Of course he had no right to run around with other women the way he did, but I didn't think it was his fault he lacked the money-making knack. When my parents were divorced and my father didn't fight for my custody or even ask for visitation privileges, I tried to kid myself it was because he couldn't afford my keep. But in my heart I knew the real reason he didn't want me around. My father, who was a great athlete in his day, considered me a weakling and a sissy.

"By the time I reached college age I was able to show him different. I had an athletic scholarship for two years out of the four. I wasn't heavy enough for football, but I was on the tennis and swimming teams. I landed my present job through my interest in sports. I met my big boss, the owner of our company, the summer I worked as a lifeguard at his country club. I am now a member of that club. He put me up for membership. It was a proud day in my mother's life when I received my invitation to join, and in mine too. On the other hand, I feel sure Elise secretly regards the dues as wasted money, even though she is too tactful to complain.

"In spite of Elise's tact, I know she doesn't think of me as being special in any way. I wish she could be proud of me. I've climbed high in a highly competitive business. The product I have to sell, the identical product and just as good, is offered at a lower cost by several of our competitors. My customers cheerfully buy from me. Why? They buy because I sell them service. In other words, I sell them on myself.

"Since I can sell myself in a rugged commercial field, I'm sure I can sell myself back to my wife. Elise is too levelheaded not to come to her senses soon. She doesn't want a divorce any more than I do. And I don't need a psychologist to tell me so."

The Marriage Counselor Says:

"Tracy was the kind of client we can seldom help. He was unwilling to grant there was anything seriously wrong in himself, in his marriage or in Elise. By this defensive maneuver—subconsciously, of course—I believe he had armed himself to evade the pain of self-knowledge and the possible necessity of change. My guess is that he was fearful of tinkering with the jovial public personality that had made him a social and business success. He wanted to think and to live on the surface, despite the fact that his infidelity clearly indicated that inwardly all was not well with him and with his marriage.

"Obviously the picture wasn't as right as he was determined to view and present it. Otherwise he wouldn't have appeared in my office as even a reluctant visitor.

"To almost every adult there comes a time for coping with bedrock truth and facing what classical scholars call the rerum lacrimae and translate as the 'tears of things.' This facing of his ultimate self and ultimate needs, and the needs of those close to him, this time of life when mature people formulate standards and ideals to live by, Tracy was determined to elude.

"At my request he and Elise took several psychological tests. Tracy was displeased with the results which strongly suggested that his jolly, backslapping ways were mostly a pose, that inwardly he felt insecure and afraid. After scoffing at the tests, he withdrew from further counseling.

"By then, however, Elise had decided to make an effort to understand the reasons for the failure of the marriage. She realized that a divorce would be hard on her three children, just as her parents' divorce had been hard on her. What Elise didn't realize until after our consultation was that in her own way she had been as unsatisfactory a wife to Tracy as her mother had been to her father. To be sure, she didn't nag, complain, lose her temper, spend too much of Tracy's money. Her house wasn't untidy, her food wasn't poorly cooked; but her virtues were negative, academic—they weren't the virtues calculated to meet the needs of a man like Tracy.

"Tracy had an unusual need for affection and reassurance. His ego was weak and he was chronically uneasy about the impression he was making, as are many people who push themselves into the foreground and snatch for the popularity prize at every party. A mamma's boy, rejected by his father, Tracy in his bachelor days was compelled to seek in each fresh conquest the proof of his virility and masculinity. Similarly, in college, he felt impelled to excel in sports.

"Elise started out in the marriage under good auspices. She was her mother-in-law's choice as well as her husband's choice, and she was eager to please. If she had recognized and fulfilled Tracy's basic needs, she could have made herself indispensable to him. Unfortunately, in an attempt to avoid her mother's mistakes she had built up a rigid conception of marriage that had very little application to her and Tracy. Her conception of herself as a wife was sugary, artificial. She was hopeful Tracy would respond with gratitude and ardor—she, too, had a strong need of approval—to something that was quite unreal.

"When she had a legitimate complaint against him she hid her annoyance under a sweet smile. She didn't get the grateful response she aimed for. He sensed her phoniness. Instead of voicing her valid objections to some of the more excessive demands of his job and trying to work out a compromise, she kept still. He sensed her dislike of his work and interpreted her silence as a lack of pride in him.

"Tracy needed honest feeling from Elise. hen she discovered his first affair, her calm havior screened inner tumult but left him th the puzzled belief that she was unmoved d indifferent. If she had taken a positive nd and expressed her outrage, it is possible ere would have been no second affair, alough Phyllis' appeal for him seems quite derstandable. Both she and Carol were terested in his work, or pretended to be. He lcomed the sympathetic ear he didn't find home.

"When her children came along Elise made fairly common but, in her case, a serious ror. She allowed Tracy to regard his own ungsters as rivals. She allowed him to feel e a fifth wheel in a concern that could erate nicely without him. She was almost king him to look for consolation in the eyes d arms of other women.

"Tracy was highly sexed. Underneath a cool terior, Elise herself was warm and affectione. Not once in the twelve years of marriage d she rejected Tracy's love-making, so ey both told me, but she had never made y loving advances to him. A conventional oman, she believed it was her duty to wait r his overtures. Elise was both amazed and agrined to discover by examining one of racy's psychological tests—a test in which he ve his impressions of her personality—that considered her very cold. In evaluating her n personality by means of the same test, ise had scored herself very high in the dertment of sympathy, tenderness, affection. hrough studying these psychological tests and after much delving into the past, Elise gained insight into herself and into Tracy too. After much hard thought she finally understood what her husband really wanted and needed from her and where she had failed him. Then, since she desired to save her marriage, she was able to effect radical changes and improvements in her whole relationship with Tracy. When she changed, he changed, too, even though I imagine he would still deny that changes were necessary or had occurred.

The romance in life consists in doing what you have to do decoratively.
DION CLAYTON CALTHROP

"Common sense dictated most of Elise's moves. In the first place, she introduced him to the fun of knowing and playing with his own children. It wasn't much of a trick. He was a patsy for kids and for sports. She found time for swimming, hiking, tennis, and insisted that he make time to enjoy these recreations with his family.

"In the second place, she stopped ignoring his business and began to talk about his commercial triumphs and problems. Her simulated interest quickly became genuine. She discarded her snippy disapproval of his customers and once again helped out on the entertainment end. She took note of his triumphs and successes. Above all, whenever she felt warmly toward him she showed it.

"Tracy needed responsibility. She gave him financial responsibility and thus helped bolster his masculine pride. Instead of secretly taking a job to bail out the family in a financial emergency—almost as foolish as Tracy's heedless extravagance—she asked him to weigh their income and their expenses realistically and arrive at a workable budget. She then began to spend more on herself and the children, especially for clothes, and thus gave him the satisfaction of feeling like an extra-good provider. As a long-term goal, Tracy listed a four-bedroom house on their budget.

"They now own the new place. According to Elise—I never see or hear from Tracy—he is a very proud homeowner and the contented head of a family. Their new home is graced with a swimming pool and Tracy can hardly wait to get there so he can take a plunge with the youngsters. Elise sees to it that he never walks into an empty house after an absence. Perhaps it is a coincidence, but recently Tracy was assigned more work in the local office and is out of town much less. I think it is quite possible he asked for this new assignment, but I don't know. At any rate, Elise is sure there is little danger of his ever becoming interested in another woman. She and their children occupy too much of his time. She says that all the hard work and hard thinking and the changing she did on her own were eminently worth while."

inches of sage, thyme and rosemary go into . Onion is only a whisper, salt and pepper e reduced to a minimum. She says the astry blanket goes on better if the turkey is ot too cold, so after she has stuffed her bird e leaves it standing awhile in the warm tchen.

Clean a 16-pound turkey very well, being re that all those pinfeathers are gone, and nge the wings or wherever it is needed. Rub ne inside cavity with salt and pepper. Stuff ell with chestnut dressing and truss to hold ne legs and wings in place. Now is the time cover with the pastry-blanket mixture, or luminum foil. If you use pastry, spread the ixture over the turkey from the well-stuffed reast to the tail. Roast the bird in a moderate ven, 350° F. Figure on about 18–20 minutes pound for the large birds, and if you are oing to do a smaller one increase the time to 5 minutes a pound. This will give you a oasting time for the 16-pound bird of around ½ hours. If the leg feels loose when wiggled, he bird is done. Remove aluminum foil 15 inutes before done. Cook 2 dozen sauages in the skillet (don't unlink them) just efore the bird is to come out of the oven, nd after it is set on platter festoon the bird vith the sausages. Garnish spectacularly vith parsley and bright red spiced pears.

To make the chestnut dressing: Mix together ½ cups each dry bread crumbs and crushed racker crumbs—the standard saltines will e best here. Pour over ⅓ cup melted butter n which ¼ cup minced onion has been saued. This procedure will save you a step—nelt your butter and cook your onions all at nce. Beat 1 egg slightly and add along with ¼ cup heavy cream. Season with a pinch each of sage, thyme and rosemary. Finally dd ¾ teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper, nd 12 finely chopped chestnuts, cooked and eeled. Then toss together with the rest of he ingredients. Makes enough stuffing for a 16-pound bird.

Laura, my serious-minded ten-year-old, is et to slicing mushrooms to go with the baby Lima beans. There are a few things, mother has to agree, that are just as good "bought in a shop" as produced the old-fashioned way, at home, and one of them is Lima beans. For years she planted Limas in her garden, and for years she battled with the frosts; now I bring frozen ones on Thanksgiving, and Camilla, my six-year-old, opens the boxes and empties them into a big saucepan.

LIMA BEANS WITH MUSHROOMS AND CELERY

Cook 2 packages frozen Lima beans according to package directions. Wipe (don't wash) 2 pounds mushrooms with a damp cloth. Cut the stems level with the bottoms of the caps and then slice. Mince 1 medium onion. Cut 5 stalks crisp celery into ½" pieces about as thick as a match. Sauté the onion and celery in ½ pound butter until golden, then add the mushrooms and cook them gently until tender. Sprinkle in 2 tablespoons flour mixed with ½ teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon nutmeg and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. (The shaker-top flour canisters are good for this.) Toss until it is well blended. Reduce the heat and stir in ½ cup heavy cream. Add to the cooked beans and serve in a hot vegetable dish. Garnish with lots of paprika. (Mrs. Appleyard has, on occasion, stirred in a little sherry just before serving.) 8 servings.

Six-year-old Camilla had picked over the cranberries for me the day before—the sort of job that needs her quick eyes and fingers. Now I set about making our

CRANBERRY-ORANGE-MARMALADE SAUCE

Combine 4 cups whole fresh or frozen cranberries with 2 cups sugar and 1 cup water and cook gently until the cranberries pop. Add 1 cup bitter orange marmalade. Let the mixture stand in a warm place until the marmalade softens and can be stirred in. Then chill until it stiffens. 8 servings.

In our Vermont, Thanksgiving rings the doorbell all day long, practically from sunrise on. Now my brother Hugh pokes his nose in the kitchen, in true Appleyard fashion. "Just checking," he explains. "Smells all correct." He borrows my son Tommy to help him fill the wood boxes in the kitchen and the living room. The house is filling up with good smells and good people. Cynthia gets out the heavy white damask cloth and sets the long maple table with places for Hugh and his family from their cottage down the road, and for my sister Sally and her family from Roland Hill, a few miles away from Appleyard Center. Out come the appetizers which I have been warming in the broiler. Much appreciated—I'm not a short-order cook for nothing—are peanut butter spread on rounds of toast, and sprinkled with crumbled bacon; mushroom paste (canned) mixed with more crumbled bacon, snappy cheese and chutney. There are some cold ones, too: deviled ham and cream cheese, mixed; cottage cheese made fascinating with horse-radish and catchup, and pâté de foie gras. (In our family these concoctions are more accurately called "appeasers"—something to keep grandchildren who have been playing and parents who have been chopping wood from eating one another before dinner is ready!)

In the kitchen, mother slides a dish of sweet potatoes topped with cashew meats into the oven for a final heating through and browning. "Just keep your eye on this for me like an angel," she murmurs. Mother's sweet-potato casserole is famous in the family.

SWEET POTATOES WITH CASHEW NUTS

Make a syrup of 1½ cups light brown sugar and 6 tablespoons hot water. Add 1½ tablespoons lemon juice, 1¼ teaspoons grated lemon rind, ½ teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon cinnamon. Layer into a buttered casserole 6 precooked, peeled and thickly sliced sweet potatoes and the above syrup. Sprinkle each layer with part of ½ cup coarsely chopped cashew nuts. Top with a layer of nuts. Heat until bubbling in a moderate oven, 350° F., 15–20 minutes or until the potatoes have absorbed part of the syrup. 8 servings.

The adult Appleyards, assembled round the living room's big Franklin stove, attack the "appeasers" eagerly. Tommy adds a fresh stick of wood to the blaze. Rock and roll comes from the kitchen radio for Cynthia, a Mozart horn concerto spins on the record player in the living room. The littlest Appleyard, in something yellow and fuzzy, crawls around like a busy caterpillar. By this time the turkey in its brown pastry blanket stands on the kitchen table, and mother prepares to make gravy. "Next year," Cynthia was saying to her grandmother, "I'm going to do the whole turkey myself."

cry leaves and tough stalks, a spray of parsley, 2 cloves, a pinch of allspice and a little poultry seasoning in enough water to cover. This will take several hours until the meat is tender. Check from time to time to be sure there is enough water still on hand to keep from burning. Strain the stock, discarding the vegetables. (Mother had done all this the previous day.) Chop the tender parts of the gizzard and heart, the meat from the neck and a raw onion together. Sauté the turkey liver for 3 minutes, chop it and add to the other meat. Put 6 tablespoons turkey drippings in a skillet and brown the mixture of chopped meat and onion. Sprinkle over this 4 tablespoons flour. Season as you like with salt and pepper. Blend the flour well and gradually add 2 cups strained turkey stock and 2 cups rich top milk. Makes 4½ cups gravy.

The moment for dishing up! Like a frieze on a Grecian urn, my daughters file into the dining room with the various dishes long and lovingly prepared. Festooned in sausages, wreathed in parsley, the turkey makes a noble entrance wrapped in its brown blanket. Laura carries in her Lima beans and mushrooms, Camilla follows with the casserole of sweet potatoes.

It's a family tradition, especially when the dining table holds sixteen table settings, to carve and serve from the sideboard. Now to decide who is to sit in high chairs, and who is to have the dictionary and the atlas. A moment of silence while Hugh says grace, and then the voices begin. Tommy unfolds his napkin. "What is this, a sheet?" I show Camilla the stories from Aesop's fables woven in the tablecloth, which was first used by my great-grandmother. Plates are filled, refilled and emptied. In time, even the hollow legs of little boys are solid. Would there be room for pumpkin pie? For this pie there would always be room.

PUMPKIN-CHIFFON PIE

Bake a 9″ or 10″ pie shell. Heat ¾ cup mil in the top of a double boiler with 2¼ cup canned pumpkin, 1½ cups brown sugar, ½ teaspoon salt, ¾ teaspoon ginger, ¾ tea spoon cinnamon and ⅓ teaspoon nutmeg Beat 5 egg yolks slightly. Gradually ad some of the hot mixture to the yolks, mixin rapidly. Readd to the pumpkin mixture an cook in the double boiler until thickened stirring constantly. Soften 2 envelopes unfla vored gelatin in ½ cup cold water. Add t the hot custard and stir until dissolved. Coo the filling until it begins to thicken. Beat egg whites until stiff but not dry, fold then into the filling and then chill—but don't le it set. Whip 1½ cups heavy cream until stif Add ¾ teaspoon grated orange rind and ½ cup sugar. Fold into the pumpkin mixture Chill until quite thick, then put in the shell Before serving, garnish the pie with spoon fuls of sweetened whipped cream and a littl grated orange rind.

In the living room after dinner, the tele phone rings. Tommy dashes ahead. "It's fo you, grandma," he says, handing her the re ceiver. "Some man or other."

Mother's cool "Hello" changes to an ec static, "Stan! Where are you? . . . Brazil? . . It sounds as close as East Alcott. And who that? . . . Tom!"

"Uncle Stan in Brazil," reports Tommy t the assembled relatives with barely suppresse excitement. "And Uncle Tom in Canad too!"

"I want to speak," cries Camilla.

"We'll all speak," I assure her, although knew I would find it hard to. Hugh had give mother and me the nicest kind of Thanksgiv ing surprise—a three-party line all round th Western hemisphere. Over two continents an two seacoasts the whole Appleyard family ha met for Thanksgiving!

they go to church regularly, believe God i an omnipotent and omniscient Spirit existing everywhere, that faith is superior to logic i solving important problems, that God guided or inspired the Bible, and that a good humar society cannot be built without supernatura aid, although they don't believe all atheists are bad.

The researchers comment: "To the Amer ican teen-ager who accepts these religiou values such scientific developments as th theory of evolution (now regarded by mos informed persons as an established fact) re main dubious: today's typical adolescent i not sure whether man has really evolved fron lower forms of animals . . ."

Now, that man has evolved from "lower an imals" is not accepted by anthropologists a proved. That the genus man as he exists today has evolved from a much lower form of him self has been amply established. But at any rate I find no logic in the belief that such a fact is incompatible with faith in an omnip otent, omniscient Spirit. Professor Einstein was a mathematical logician who also believed in God.

The fact emerges from the researches tha American teen-agers are, on the whole, con servative, and tend toward orthodoxy and conformity, largely reflecting the views of their parents and those prevailing in the com munities in which they live. They are not in dependent-minded—which to my mind is explicable by the fact that they are actually not independent, but dependent on others.

The researchers find a high minority and in some cases a majority of 75 per cent holding "fascistic" or "superpatriotic" views; 20 per cent feel that there will always be strong and weak and that it is best for the strong to domi nate; 22 per cent that whatever serves the in terest of the government is usually right; 37 per cent that some working groups should not have the right to strike; 49 per cent that large masses of people are incapable of deciding what is and is not good for themselves; 37 per nt that criminals and others, like the feeble-nded, should be prevented from having ildren; and 75 per cent that obedience and spect for authority are the most important bits for children to learn. The researchers d these results "tragic."

In answering True or False questions, it is ficult even for an adult accurately to express nself without qualifications. That there are ong and weak people, physically, mentally d in terms of character, is obvious even to a ild, who always recognizes and respects ength and often confuses the bully with it. ithout knowing what teen-agers mean by length, the answer is unclear. We live in an och which exalts the all-wisdom of govern-nt (provided its policies are our own); it is rtainly arguable that strikes in some occu-tions are a menace to the whole of society; e constantly published figures on the prev-nce of criminality, insanity, suicide, alco-lism and drug addiction demonstrate that a eat many people don't know what's good for em; not only Hitler believed in sterilizing the ngenitally unfit, but so does every geneticist know, if it is certain that the person is con-nitally unfit; and that obedience is an essen-l discipline for children (if they are ever to be ined at all) is the experience of the race.

"Young people today are highly realistic. Evidence of "superpatriotism" is reflected the opinion of 74 per cent of the youth eried that foreign countries have little to ntribute to American progress; by 28 per nt who object to flying the U.N. flag over that the U.S.A.; by 37 per cent who think immi-ation should be restricted, as endangering e American standard of living; by 42 per nt who think the greatest threat to democracy mes from foreign ideas and groups; by 42 r cent who believe we should firmly resist at-mpts to change the American way of life. "Superpatriots," comment the authors, re poorly informed and easily swayed by gh-sounding phrases." But without further erying to ascertain the frames of reference m which those queried make their judg-nts one should be cautious about de-ctions.

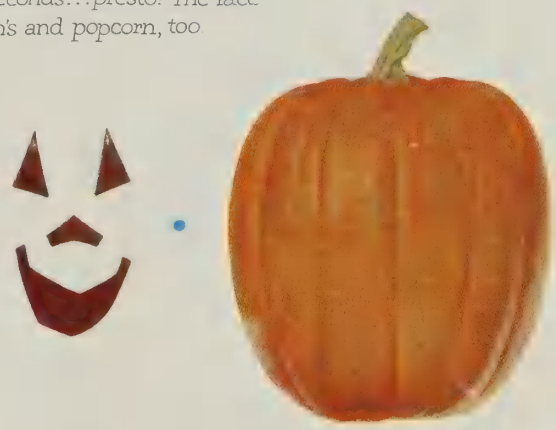
Do foreign "countries" contribute to Amer-an progress? What is meant by "country"? state? A culture? Unless that question is ear in one's mind the answer is meaningless. Do the social scientists want to fly the U.N. g above that of the U.S.A., and if so, why? he U.N. is not a superstate elected by "hu-anity," but a permanent assembly of the reign offices of the participating govern-nts, each pursuing its own interests and olicies and vigorously resisting any inter-rence in its domestic affairs.

ll countries, without exception, including e most liberal, limit immigration. If totali-rianism is a menace to democracy, it cer-inly has come, in our generation, from for-gn ideas. Mussolini, Stalin and Hitler were t Americans, and their theories and prac-es not of American origin. And resistance to tempts to change the "American way of e" needs interpretation as to what the teen-ers mean by the phrase. Since so many of em do express the desire for changes, they nnot be resisting change as such.

The large part of the research devoted to oblems of adolescence reveals little beyond hat everybody who is intimate with adoles-nts (or remembers his or her own youth) al-ady knows. It is a time of physical and emo-onal turbulence; of rebellion against, and earning for, parental and other adult control; assertiveness and shyness; of wanting to be ee and independent, and of anxiety at as-uming adult responsibilities. It is a time when e young person—neither child nor man—variably feels he is misunderstood—by ev-rybody except his closest friends of his own ge, and especially by his parents. It is a time hen the desire to be popular (among one's ontemporaries) surpasses all other desires; hen a boy's mind is full of girls and a girl's f boys.

The teen-ager is, of all people, most con-ormist to the prevailing mores of his group. He (or she) wouldn't be caught dead wearing nything but clothes like those of the others; r having different tastes from those of their riends. Booth Tarkington's Seventeen—is it still in print?—portrays the teen-ager as faithfully as the social scientists do (and more amusingly).

The miracle of adolescence is that anyone survives it.



But certainly what helps one to survive it are habits of industry and work cultivated long before the period arrives. Idleness and sloth are the worst corrupters of the adolescent. Fifty per cent of the youth covered by the Purdue study feel that actual work experience would be more useful to them than school—and those who make up that 50 per cent are probably right about themselves. But "child" labor laws and trade-union regulations keep thousands in school who might better be learning (and earning) as apprentices to a trade.

One final word: All of them, almost without exception, believe that high school can (and will) prepare them for their life occupation, and are harassed immeasurably by being unable to choose and plan for it. High school will not and cannot. A teen-ager rarely knows what he really wants to do or has ability to do, and if he is harried to make up his mind or encouraged to count on getting just the job he wants, he is in for disappointments. If his mind has been disciplined to accuracy, his character to self-reliance, his hands trained to work, and he is convinced that "anything that's worth doing at all is worth doing well," he will make his way, possibly through numerous jobs, until he finds, by experience, the niche or the arena in which he is most happy and successful. All work experience is useful, and need not be related to an ultimate goal.

The function of education—as I see it—is to fit the youth to do anything that can reasonably be expected or demanded after twelve years of schooling and character building. If we are not succeeding in this, our public education is a failure. END

GOOD-TIME BUFFET for 8

$1.00 per person

By MARGARETTA STEVENSON

In trying to put together a party meal for $1 per person, what you are really doing is substituting brains and skill for $ signs—which makes the results all the more triumphant!

Entertaining should be as natural as breathing, whatever the financial crisis. Here is the meal to do you, the occasion and the company proud—regardless of price!

A delicious, creamy spinach soup starts off the meal—what better party beginning could you find for "gourmets on a budget"? CREAM-OF-SPINACH SOUP: Melt 3 tablespoons margarine in a saucepan. Sauté 3 tablespoons minced onion until a pale golden brown. Stir in ¼ cup flour and blend well. Gradually add 1 quart milk and cook, stirring constantly, until thickened. Add 1¼ cups canned consommé. Cook 1 package frozen chopped spinach according to the package directions. Drain, if there seems to be an excess of liquid, before adding to the milk mixture. Heat. Prettify the top with grated raw carrot.

Our unusual and delicious casserole dish contains all the necessary meat and vegetables for a hearty meal, plus a piquant sauce whose surprise flavor brings approval from both men and women. VEAL ZINGARA: For 8 people, buy a 6-pound rump of veal and have the butcher slice it into ¾" to 1" slices. Cut out the bones with a little sharp knife and trim off any rind and gristle. Cut the meat into 2" chunks. Heat 2 tablespoons shortening in a large skillet. Dredge the meat in flour. Drop a clove of garlic into the skillet. Begin browning some of the meat. Season the meat with 2 teaspoons salt and 1 teaspoon pepper as it browns. Remove the browned meat to absorbent-paper toweling to drain until all meat has been browned. Clean ½ pound fresh mushrooms by wiping their faces with a damp cloth rather than spraying them with water, which tends to send their delicate flavor down the drain. If they're small, you can cook them whole; if not, slice them. Sauté the mushrooms in the skillet in which you browned the meat. You may have to add a little more fat. But use as little as possible, to keep the meat sauce from becoming greasy. When the mushrooms are tender, drain on the absorbent-paper toweling. Leave the fryings in the skillet. Make the sauce by dissolving 2 chicken-bouillon cubes in 2½ cups boiling water and adding to the pan fryings. Then add 4 tablespoons (or ½ small can) tomato paste. Stir until smooth, simmering slowly. Stir in the seasonings: 1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce, 1 teaspoon orégano and ¼ teaspoon each hot pepper sauce, saffron and allspice. Blanch 3 ounces filberts and slip the skins. Cut in half and stir into the sauce. Put the smaller pieces of veal in the bottom of a large casserole (let them be for the second helpings), build up alternate layers of meat, mushrooms, sauce, whole onions and potatoes. You'll need 8 small white onions, peeled, and 8 small white potatoes, peeled. Cover the casserole and bake in a slow oven, 300° F., for 1 hour and 45 minutes. About 20 minutes before serving, break up 1 package frozen green peas and add them to the casserole, arranging them in the center and in clusters around the outer edge. Return to the oven and continue baking at 300° F. for 20 minutes more or until everything's beautifully tender.

The salad is MIXED GREENS WITH FRENCH DRESSING: Prepare 1 head of lettuce, 1 bunch water cress, sliced radishes and a few young scallions, cut fine. Toss together with the following dressing. As for French dressing, everybody has his favorite, of course, but try this—it's good, too: FRENCH DRESSING: In a jar or salad-dressing shaker, mix together ¾ cup salad oil and ¼ cup wine vinegar. Add 1 clove garlic, ½ teaspoon each dry mustard, basil or summer savory, dried parsley, 1 teaspoon salt, and a pinch each of pepper and sugar. Let it sit for a few hours before using to get the full flavor of the herbs. Makes 1 cup. Use ½ of this for the tossed salad.

THE BREAD: Buy 2 long loaves of crusty French bread. Slice it, butter it (½ stick softened butter will do the job), and warm it in the oven at the last minute. Serve covered to keep it hot.

The dessert. The success of this dish depends on the flavor of the oranges, so buy good ones. ORANGE FLUFF: Scald 3 cups milk in the top of a double boiler. While the milk is heating, mix together ¼ cup sugar and 3 tablespoons cornstarch. Grate the rind of 1 navel orange and add. Mix in 3 egg yolks (refrigerate the 3 whites). Stir in ⅓ cup of the scalded milk and add sugar mixture to the hot milk. Cook, stirring constantly, over hot water until smooth and thickened (the custard will coat the spoon). Set the pan of custard in a pan of cold water to cool. Add 1 teaspoon butter, ½ teaspoon salt and ½ teaspoon vanilla. While the custard is cooling, peel and section 2 seedless oranges. Put in the refrigerator to chill. When the custard has cooled, add 2 tablespoons sugar to the egg whites and whip until stiff, but not dry. Gently fold the beaten whites into the custard. Spoon custard into serving bowl. Chill 1 hour. Garnish with orange sections and mint. Makes 8 servings.

ear Editors: Now that is unforgivable—Must be typewritten." Where would a com-on, ordinary farmer like me get a typewriter? o have it typed (where?) would be extrava-nt and farmers, my friend, can't afford ex-avagance. However, I've wanted to tell some-e about my wife for four years now and so re goes. If it's worth printing, let me know, have it typewritten and send me the bill.

1952 was a bad year no matter how you ok at it. In January my wife developed a ronic gall-bladder condition that had to be eated with pills and a fat-free diet. In May, nda, then five years old, came down with right's disease and had to spend the summer bed on a salt-free diet. The first week in ugust spinal polio struck me, affecting my ft leg and right arm. After a few weeks of ing unable to walk at all, I began to walk agging one leg after me. Every time I tried lift anything I found myself in a sitting sition.

With the help of her father, who has an en-rged heart, Helen kept this 160-acre farm nning smoothly. She prepared fat-free foods r herself, salt-free foods for Linda, and gave e three fifteen-minute periods of exercise ily. Having decided to keep on farming, nce it was the only business we both knew, e purchased modern machinery which left s deeply in debt and we could not afford red help. In 1953 Helen stored 6000 bales of ay and straw in the barn, kept twenty-two ows milked, fed and clean.

But it was not so much that she did this rodigious amount of work as the way she id it! One day I dragged my "ole" leg down the young-stock barn to see how she was aking out. Now to clean this barn you need wheelbarrow, fork and a strong back. And e she was employing these three very effi-ly with hoop earrings, lipstick, a shorts and boots on—and in those boots I were the brightest toenails in the neigh-od! Shorts, she carefully explained, were a necessity as long as the warm weather hung around, since legs were easily washed and you didn't have to hang 'em on a line to dry, nor did they require ironing. You see what I mean?

Today I can do a full day's work and I walk with only a slight limp. Thanks to a wife's sense of humor and efficiency, the time between was made bearable. She teaches Sunday school now and does those millions of chores farm wives do. Her pies can melt your heart, her homemade bread is soft and "woolly" in its brown crust.

Like most husbands, I think my wife is beautiful, but more than that she has class—for what is beauty without this quality? She's never too tired to comb her hair, brush her teeth or refresh her lipstick.

But when she sews she forgets to make dinner; when she works in the flower garden she forgets the weeds in the potatoes. She starches my overalls and serves me sauer-kraut and beets. She reads anything she can get her hands on until her eyes bug out. She hates to go to bed and she hates to get up. She daydreams and is forever rearranging the furniture. But have you noticed how love can ignore a multitude of sins?

Which only goes to prove I am a farmer; I have said so little of what there is to say. I hope somehow you can read all the anxiety, indecision, heartache and hope we went through at the time. And, of course, the financial worry, since we received no help and paid all our own medical expenses. Then, too, in the fall of that fateful year (1952) our pet Pekingese, Skippy, was struck by a car and died, a hunter shot a cow and someone stole a heifer.

You know what I'd do with that money? Put in a toilet! Can you imagine what it was like for my wife with two of us in bed? (Linda downstairs, me upstairs.) How did she manage? Field work, barn chores, special diets, exercises, a clean, neat house—and yet there she was clean, neat and pretty herself with lipstick in place and toenails polished. It never ceases to amaze me!

This much may I add: not being an author has one advantage for you—I couldn't make up or "embroider" a story to save my neck! And I hope you'll give all of us simple Americans with magnificent wives and no typewriters a chance—please!!

HAYWIRE IN A LOVELY WAY

Dear Editors: I was surprised when my wife told me she was writing you about why she loved me. And while I haven't the slightest idea what she said, it set me to thinking about why I love her.

I came up with the rather interesting conclusion that the reasons I love her could be the very reasons that might drive another man to distraction! That is not to say she hasn't been and still is attractive to other men. But rather that she is different in a rather maddening way. As you will see.

She is an only occasionally inspired cook, and while our meals are adequate, they are hardly dazzling. Since she operates on some time standard unknown to the rest of the country, our meals are served at odd hours. Breakfast may be at nine one morning and five A.M. the next. She has hauled everyone out of bed to watch the squirrels play in the persimmon trees or the cardinal build a nest in the vine by the door. And while her haphazard serving would scandalize most men, I don't mind at all because she knows the dishes I like best and she fixes them often and well. Now and then we are served a meal fit for a gourmet, in a setting straight out of Emily Post.

My wife is an indifferent housekeeper. But while the dust gathers, she can and does entertain me by the hour with her piano playing, everything from Bach to boogie. Closets and dresser drawers may often be tumbled, but the beds are always carefully made with fresh linens (this is a pet peeve of mine).

I believe she has the real secret of making a happy home. She instinctively knows what is important and the other things don't bother her. I love the way she looks when she talks to our two-year-old, and the way she brings out the hidden talents in our two other children. She has a delightful sense of humor and can make an ordinary errand to the grocery store sound like an adventure. She sees all the small wonderful things that keep life from being humdrum, and then she shares them with me (I'm not as astute as she is). Kind-hearted and tolerant, she is never disappointed in the lack of perfection in others.

I guess what I love best is that she isn't perfect. Therefore, she doesn't expect me to be!

In all honesty, there isn't much I would change, except I wish she would defrost the refrigerator when it first needs it, instead of three weeks later. And I wish she wouldn't let the children litter the car so badly. Most of all, I wish she would lose some weight. Not so much because I mind whether she is plump or thin, but because she does. She is forever either just on or just off a diet. I wish, dear JOURNAL, she would take a page from you and be one of your glamorous ex-fatties!

Yours truly,

HIS HEART STOOD STILL

Gentlemen: You say that you will welcome letters from happily married men telling why they love their wives. "Love is a many-splendored thing," and one can hardly put it in a test tube. But as I think of the woman I love there are some things that stand out plain.

If I close my eyes now, I can see her as she was the first time we met. It was at a reception soon after I had moved to the community where she was teaching. I caught only a glimpse of her. Indeed, it took some months after that to learn who she was and arrange a more satisfactory meeting. But that first picture was indelible. She wore a white dress that contrasted with her black hair. She was petite and pretty and vivacious. Since that night a score of years, three children, several pounds and some gray hairs have been added. But I still see in her that girl in white who caught my eye and quickened my heart. This is part of my love.

But during those years something else has been added: a deep admiration. Perhaps I felt that most when she had polio, coming home in a wheel chair after two months in the hospital not knowing whether she would walk again.

A few days later a friend called to say she wished she were able to come to a party she was having. To which she replied, "Of course I'll come. I'm not going to let one leg change my life." And she has not. So the slight limp that remained after months of painful exercises, strict regimen, braces and crutches is to me a badge of courage.

I admire also her outgoing interest in people, and her quick sympathy with their concerns and experiences. It is this, I think, that makes patients in the hospital where she goes as a Gray Lady feel that she has brought something far better than ice cream or mail or flowers. And perhaps the deepest reason that I love her is that out of this warmth of heart she has given me her love so lavishly.

If this seems like an idealization, I could easily make a list of things I should like to change about her. I sometimes wish that buttons were sewed on my shirts more promptly, or that other housewifely duties which are distasteful to her were kept more up to snuff. But then I realize that living with a perfect woman would be something of a trial for any ordinary man. It is both more comfortable and more exciting to have a growing comradeship with a lively and lovable human being. Each year that comradeship becomes stronger and more satisfying.

THE NEIGHBORS' CHILDREN: VISITING ANGELS, OR IMPS?

course, I'd be glad to," all over again. The mother in the letter says she loaned the skates to the gang that morning, but she must have realized that it was the wrong thing to do, because she told them, "This is the last time."

I think that the mother who finds herself being imposed on by neighborhood children and their mothers can help herself to some degree by recognizing the fact that it is her own fear of not being liked which is creating the difficulty and realizing that the neighbors, young and old, will actually like her better if she can stand up for her rights and keep them from taking advantage of her. She can also be more on guard against her weakness if she will draw up some rigid rules and will deliberately practice making some stock excuses, whether they are truthful or not. When she finds that they work and that the neighbors like her just as well, she will be emboldened by success.

Another kind of neighbor problem is brought up in a recent letter from a mother who complains that the other women on her street are always questioning her child-care methods. She sounds like a highly conscientious person who puts a lot of thought and time and effort into caring for her children. The neighbors, all of whom seem to be much more casual than she, keep asking her rather critically why she takes such precautions when a child has a cold, why she watches her younger children so carefully when they are out playing, why she bothers with naps for the three- and five-year-olds, why she reasons so much and spanks so little.

Of course every parent differs from every other in his methods, to one degree or another, but this rarely presents difficulties with the neighbors. When there is a lot of argument, one generally suspects that special factors are operating. Perhaps the criticized parent is way out of line in leniency or severity or fussiness and the neighbors can't help being bothered by what they see.

Another more likely possibility is that the mother who feels criticized is, without intending to and without realizing it, frequently calling attention to her own methods and implying that they are superior. In this way she puts her neighbors on the defensive. She makes them feel a little bit guilty and they try to defend themselves by arguing back. Now one person doesn't go out of his way to criticize another when he is really sure he is right. He is only trying to convince the other person and himself that he is right. When a human being is truly self-confident, he has a serenity about his own beliefs and is quite willing to let other people have theirs. If somebody else criticizes his point of view, he can let it pass. In other words, it's really true that it takes two to make an argument and that each of the two has to be slightly unsure of himself.

So it's possible that the scrupulous mother who feels that she is being criticized all the time is less convinced about her methods than she thinks; or perhaps she is insecure in general and is trying to boost her self-confidence by being critical of others. They sense her attitude and they counterattack.

I certainly don't want to suggest that it is a mistake for parents to get into discussions of child care. All parents feel the need to compare notes. They need sympathy from one another for the difficulties they are having at times. They need the comfort of hearing that others have got into the same jams. They know that they can get valuable tips and new outlooks from one another. People in all lines of work—farmers, mechanics, lawyers, beauticians—have always enjoyed talking over their occupational trials and triumphs. But if discussions between two people about children usually lead to tense feelings, it's a sign that there's too much sensitiveness on one or both sides and that it's better to avoid these discussions.

How do you stop someone who insists on arguing? The answer is simple but difficult: Don't argue back. You can change the subject or you can act politely bored or you can just keep listening and nodding your head. The head nodding doesn't have to signify that you've suddenly changed your ideas or that you've become completely insincere. It only says, "I see what you mean." The argumentative person is always compelled by his inner doubts to try to provoke arguments with others. But it's a great relief to him to find occasionally someone who is so secure that he can't be provoked and so understanding that he can listen sympathetically.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

the pounds piled on I didn't need words to reveal he had lost all husbandly interest in me.

It was when I started thinking about suicide that I realized I desperately needed outside help—someone to show me what was wrong and what to do about it. Private psychiatric treatment was too expensive. Fortunately, my doctor told me about a reliable clinic where I could join a group-psychotherapy class at a cost I could afford. For me it was literally "do or die." I went—gladly—and am ever grateful for the help I received. The class was made up of eight to ten women with mixed problems. We met for one hour once a week. I went to the clinic for almost a year. Here I gradually learned to understand myself. Ever so patiently and tactfully, it was explained to me that I was like a lost child. That I had to grow up. That I had to face facts and accept people, instead of rejecting them for fear of being hurt. That all my resentment toward life was buried deep within me, and until I could release it I would never be free of the inhibitions and complexes that kept me from having success with a diet.

I absorbed the advice and acted upon it, to the amazement of others. During the year I was taking therapy, my mother came to spend a weekend with us. In the past, I had always meekly submitted to mother's plans and suggestions, rather than risk the chance of having my own opinions ridiculed or fluffed off. On this visit, however, mother did something that annoyed me. At that instant, I recalled my therapist's advice: "When you're angry, speak up, get it off your chest—don't bury your resentments in a piece of chocolate cake." Suddenly I turned to mother and told her to go home! We were both startled by the unexpected order—but she went. That incident was the beginning of a new and wonderful friendship between mother and me. She began to respect me and my ideas more, and I began to have a more enlightened understanding of her.

Cheered by my new self-confidence, I made plans to attend a state hairdressers' association meeting in New York, something I would never have had the courage to do before therapy. In order to fit into my two prettiest dresses, I had to diet and lose 20 pounds. Searching my mind for someone who could really help me, I made an appointment with my childhood doctor, whom I remembered to be a gentle, understanding man. I was right. From the moment he saw me he was interested and encouraging. He never pressured me, never scolded, never made me feel ashamed or self-conscious. He reminded me that I had spent most of my life gaining so much weight, and that I shouldn't be in a hurry to lose it.

In September, 1955, he started me on a 1200-calorie-a-day diet. I lost my 20 pounds in time for my trip to New York. I told my doctor about it and said, "Please—if I don't show up for my appointment with you on the day I return, come and get me! I'm determined to stick to this diet." He didn't have to. I went back to him, after the meeting, and once every week for the following year. By September, 1956, I had reduced to 170 pounds, and today I weigh 155. I'm still dieting. My goal is 138 pounds, which my doctor thinks is ideal for me, provided I feel just as well as I do now.

My diet has changed my family's eating habits, as well as my own. Broiled meats, green vegetables, fresh fruits and salads, cottage cheese and eggs are the mainstays of our day's menus. But we do have our sweets. This way, just a taste of something I crave keeps me from harboring the thought of it in the back of my mind. On afternoons my bridge club gets together, I cut down on what I eat at lunch—and again at supper—so that I can enjoy a little of the refreshments being served.

In the first year of my diet, I went to a gym and took exercises (free) and treated myself to a weekly body massage ($1.50). These outings kept my skin firm—and gave me a new interest in myself. My only other indulgence was the purchase of a good bra and girdle. By being properly supported, I managed to look very presentable in the cheap dresses I purposely bought during the loss of so much weight. It is only now that I am beginning to invest in a permanent wardrobe. Everything I buy has to be easily "take-inable."

I still have to pinch myself to believe I'm Phyllis Hecht. People don't recognize me. A young friend of my brother's arrived at mother's house just as I was calling on her. "Phyllis," he asked, "is that really you? Golly, you look marvelous!" He opened the door for me. No one had ever before shown me that simple courtesy. My children laugh and say, "Mommy, we can see around you now." My father just won a $50 bet with a friend who wouldn't believe his two pictures of me "before and after" were the same girl. Irving says, "Phyl, you've always had a pretty face, now you've got what it takes to go with it!" Mother is so pleased. In the old days people would ask bluntly, "Who's the mother and who's the daughter?" Now, it's more apt to be, "You two must be proud of each other." We are!

Recently, I was walking along with a friend of mine when a teen-age boy turned around and w-h-i-s-t-l-e-d. "Isn't that disgraceful!" my friend commented. "No, it's wonderful!" I replied. "First time a man has whistled at me in all my twenty-eight years!" ENI

THE LIFE OF THE PARTY

By SUZANNE DOUGLASS

The hostess' mother is overworked;
The hostess is cross and sleepy;
She missed her nap and so did the guests
And they're all inclined to be weepy.

Half of the kids are too young for the games,
And the other half are too old.
And one little boy won't give up his gift
No matter how often he's told.

And though every child wants a frosting rose,
The hostess won't spoil the bouquet,
So the cake's finally cut amid sniffles and tears,
Which leaves just one thing left to say—

he reaches for my hand and I look up into the kindest, bluest eyes in the whole world, I know he's my man—"to love and to cherish, till death us do part."

Well, dear editors, that's the story of my marriage. The grammar may not be entirely correct, the spelling may be a little bit off, but the story is sincere and very true. It may not be worthy of publication in your magazine, but it's been wonderful to have had the opportunity to write to you and let you know that like the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL this marriage is forever.

MRS. ALBERT LINDERMAN
Hawthorne, New Jersey

THE "SQUAREST" KID

Dear Editors: My husband was, without question, the "squarest" kid in junior-high school. He was short and slight, and with his round metal-rimmed glasses and his wool scarf (he always seemed to have a sore throat) he definitely was not my dream of romance. Later, in high school, he was not "one of the boys," that group of rough-and-ready, sought-after, athletic, tanned and GI'd boys all the girls admired. He was manager of the basketball squad, not a player; he earned his letter in tennis, not football; and he still wore that scarf! He was a quiet boy who read books and thought thoughts.

In our junior and senior years we worked together on the staff of the school weekly. We spent many afternoons alone together in the Herald office long after the dismissal bell had rung, supposedly preparing our work for the paper, but, in reality, truly beginning to know and understand each other. It was during this time that the miracle occurred. Everything in him that previously my classmates and I had found odd and queer became (to me) precious and dear. His habit of spreading the fingers of both hands and bringing those long thin fingers together with silent applaudinglike movements, which I had found distasteful, became fascinating for me to watch. I found his hands to be not thin and cold, but warm and sensitive.

Even now I can see he occasionally affects strangers in that same way he used to affect my classmates and me. Perhaps it is some quirk of speech or his oddly directed sense of humor that not all can understand which bring about those expressions in strangers that show they are not won over by his personality. And I, standing by, know exactly how they feel. Yet I can see more deeply, and instead of feeling sorry for my husband because he is not completely accepted at the moment, I pity these strangers because they do not know him.

So this is why I love him: I love him because I know and respect the person he truly is. I love him also because he is never embarrassingly sentimental, but expresses his feelings in charming understatements. I love him because he is patient and understanding with our four young children, who love him with unmistakable delight, and running, shriek, "Oh boy, papa's home!" I love him because he married me while we were still students in college, and gave me unforgettable memories of being poor, perpetually pregnant, and happy in our oneness. I love him because he is Bob.

How then can I truthfully wish him changed in any way? The fact that he has faults for others to see but for me to overlook makes him truly mine. I love him wholly and completely and I thank you for giving me this opportunity to express it.

HE CAN SAY "I'M SORRY"

Dear Editors: My husband has never won a race, made a million, been in a movie, been awarded a degree, or caught the biggest fish in Payne County. But I love him because he's the one thing left in the world I can look at through rose-colored glasses and get no reprimands whatsoever.

He can drive a truck and look like a Southern gentleman sitting astride a Thoroughbred horse. He can dig a ditch and look like Teddy Roosevelt building the Panama Canal. My cakes always taste better than his mother's, and he can say "I'm sorry." He can worry just as much over a little daughter's skinned knee as a big business deal. He can say "That's great" and make what he's talking about sound like the greatest thing in the world. He has the instincts of a woman and knows when I must have my moments to myself, and the instincts of a man when I need physical love.

He's gracious, courteous, handsome, and thoroughly human. He can draw a map of the world from memory and forget to empty the garbage. He can do anything from fixing a broken can opener to building a sailboat, but he can't learn to pick up his clothes. He's always ready with a compliment and gives special praise when the house is freshly cleaned, then empties his electric razor all over the bathroom.

He's my listener, errand boy, plumber, baby-sitter, a smile and kiss at the end of a day, a happy tune in the shower, a TV repairman, yardman, my purpose in life, and all the things money can't buy.

But I love him best of all because he thinks his wife is the prettiest, smartest and most charming woman in his life.

I WAS A BAD RISK

Dear Editors: Thank you for inviting letters on the subject "Why I Love My Husband." I'm going to enjoy telling you!

On our twentieth wedding anniversary, last week, our twelve-year-old daughter remarked, "When I get married I want my husband to be exactly like daddy!"

That was not an unusual remark for a twelve-year-old girl, but I was curious as to why our daughter felt that way.

Because, mother," she answered my ques-n, "daddy seems so happy when he's with u and that makes me happy too." Her an-er set off my train of thought, collecting a ole load of appreciative thoughts as it led along.

So I especially love my husband for this ality of helping to create an atmosphere of tual happiness in our family.

And I love him for the countless little ways which he shows love for me—from cheery spooning up the lemon pie that didn't t" to measuring me while I was asleep for the right length Christmas slip!

love him because he doesn't lose his tem-during an argument—his calm usually others the blazes of my own temper!

love him because he doesn't criticize ople—and especially because he never crities my parents or his own. (He doesn't scribe to the popular trend of blaming e's shortcomings on one's mother! I hope son will have the affection and respect for that my husband for his mother.)

love him because doesn't bicker about ney. Although he dgets his salary carey, he doesn't object extra expense that ntributes to our fam-
's enjoyment—ether it be for fresh it in February, draw-

tant to accept money love my husband

es with the children

d church.

love him because

ner dishes, although

The reasons why I e my husband are too ny to be included in five hundred words, t the sum of them can be spoken in five rds: LIVING WITH HIM IS HAPPINESS.

What would I change in my husband?
-h! I write this explosively at the moment,
I look at his hat on the coffee table, his top-at on the sofa, his brief case on the chair, the wspapers scattered on the living-room floor!
om the moment he enters the house he bes marking his trail with his belongings. I sh he'd put things in their proper places! As I ite this, he has just tossed the last section of newspaper on the floor, and sits grinning me inquisitively—wondering, no doubt, at I'm writing with such feeling. Wonder-g, too, perhaps—though he doesn't ask—y I'm not in the kitchen finishing dinner eparations.

Would I change him, really? If I succeeded
'd be perfect. And think how inferior I'd feel comparison!

Even if you can't use this letter, I shall conler my time in writing it well spent, for I'm ing to give the letter to my husband. Come think of it, maybe he doesn't know why I ve him! Thanks for prompting me.

MRS. J. E. G.
Cincinnati, Ohio

S. Another reason I deeply appreciate my sband. This one, however, I would not clude in a letter which might possibly be blished with my name. Our marriage has succeeded despite high odds against it. My entire childhood—from one to twenty-one—was miserably unhappy because of constant conflict between "incompatible" parents. I loved them separately, but not together! (They were finally divorced when I was twenty-one.) According to psychologists, this background would have made me a poor risk for marriage. Knowing this, my husband married the "risk" anyway! And I feel that it has been his understanding and love that have made our marriage a success—despite the "risk"!

THE MAN ALIVE

Dear Journal: How selfish marriage suddenly sounds when you start describing why you love your husband! The more you list his virtues, the more you end up talking about what he has done for you, from helping add a rumpus room to building up your ego. So I can't avoid admitting that one reason I love Henry so much is that I'm permanently surprised and grateful for his loving me. Still it's an objective fact that he is the most remarkable man alive.

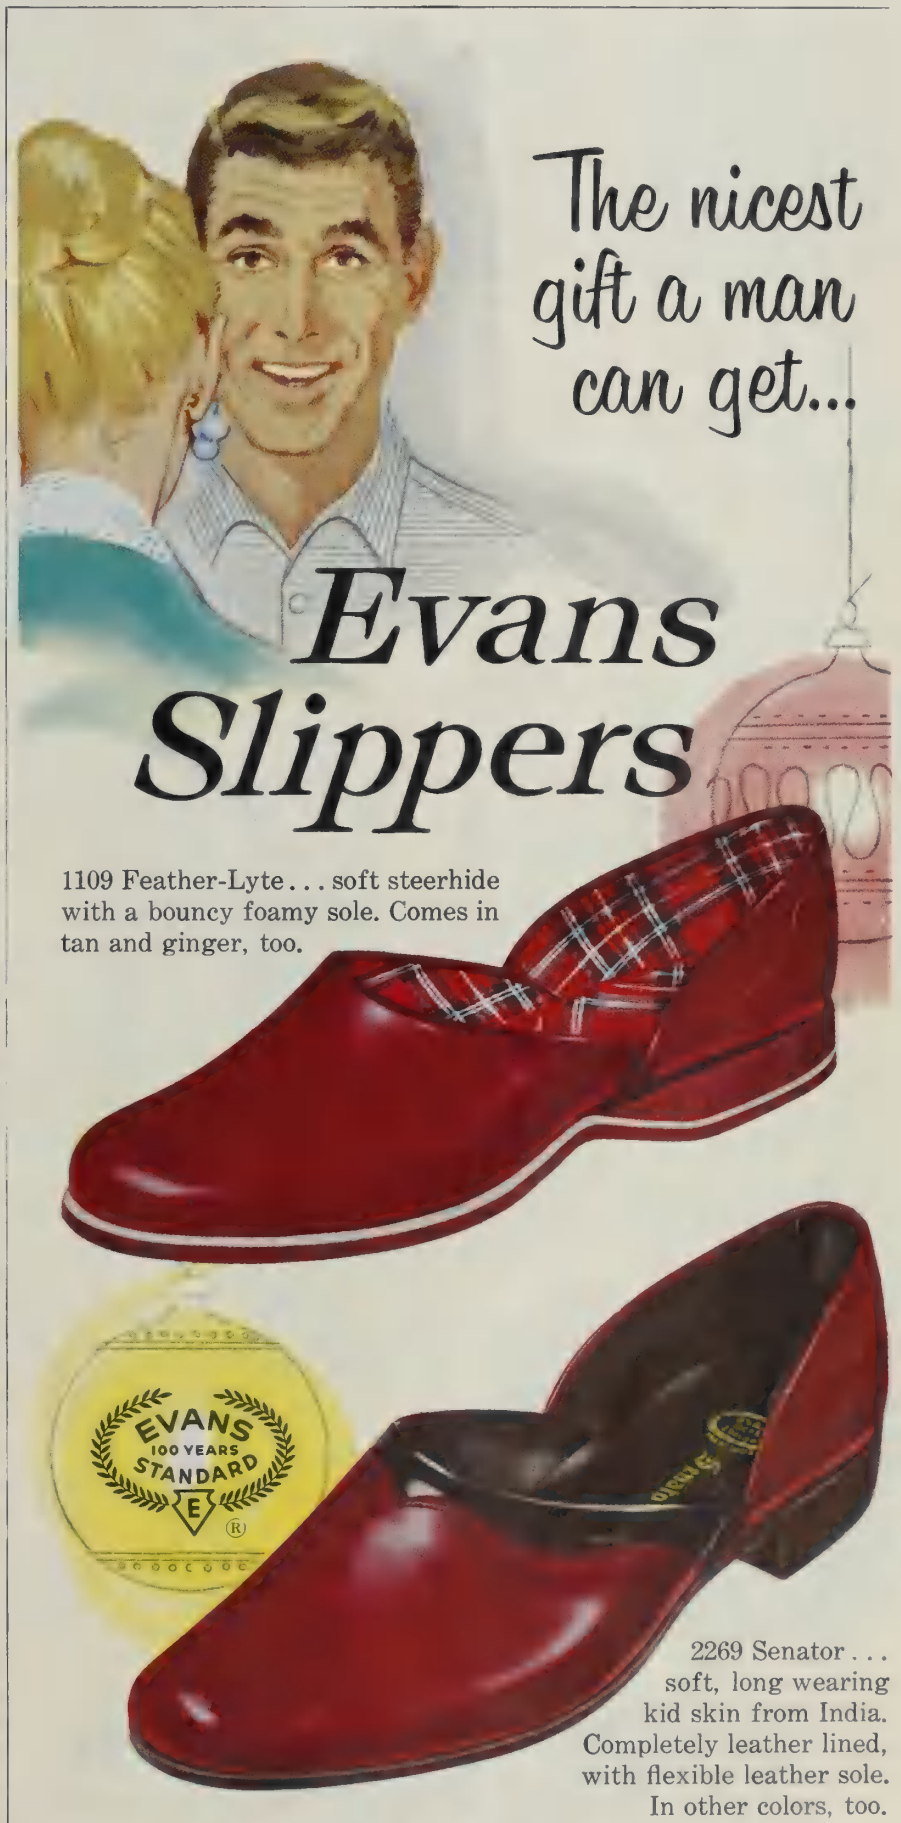
"Alive" is a pretty feeble word to use for the combination of vitality and humanity that is unique with Henry. If one of the trials of married life is being wakened out of a sound sleep to discuss ideas for a new project, a far greater reward is waking up at six to find the baby freshly changed and father and daughter breakfasting on graham crackers. Henry's Christmas shopping traditionally starts the afternoon of December 24, and yet he finds just the light meter the oldest boy is aching for, even though it's in a town fifteen miles away. The time I had a wisdom tooth pulled he produced unexpected guests for dinner, but that night there was a dime under my pillow. Our last child arrived early, in the midst of moving, and right before Christmas. I woke up to a jingling noise, which turned out to be Henry coming down the hall with a stocking in his pocket. He had dashed straight from the hospital to the 5 and 10 to get it, and it was already inscribed "Susan" to match all the others!

Henry certainly doesn't try to get something out of every minute of life—he dreads people who do—but he does have an insatiable interest in all individuals and experiences. This, together with a totally spontaneous outlook and an irrepressible sense of humor, gives him delightful perspective. Age distinctions vanish in Henry's presence, and he is only dimly aware that our friends cover a range of thirty years. He assumes that the baby, who still speaks mumbo-jumbo, really wants to discuss the weather forecast or the dress mummy found at the sale, and she glows. The boys treat him as a respected contemporary because they have never been treated otherwise themselves.

I think what I really love most about Henry is his boundless flexibility or his fatal unpredictability, depending on what mood I'm in. He invariably brings men home from the office for lunch on the day I'm defrosting the icebox, but his only arrest for speeding was once at 3 A.M., coming home from a trip a day early as a surprise. Last year he went away on business over the Fourth of July and missed the Little League play-off. Last fall he took our budding first baseman to a World Series game—on a school (and office) afternoon. His last anniversary present was a box of assorted cooking herbs, but on my bracelet is a tiny gold wishbone he came home with when we lost a baby through miscarriage, for better luck next time.

These are a few of the infinite reasons I love my husband; wouldn't you?

Yours truly,
LUCY LAWRENCE CHAUNCEY
Princeton, New Jersey



P.S.: What would I change in my husband? Frankly, it would be nice if he knew Mozart from Bach, and could at least pronounce a couple of modern artists' names. If he read some of the novels I read, he could share the nightmares they give me instead of saying, "I told you so." All my life I wanted to marry a messy man, who would make me look tidy, and I got one who cleans out his closet by himself. I sometimes would give anything to hear him say, just once, "What'll I do today?" and not "Look at all the things we have to get done today," or to see him bored instead of eternally on the go, two jumps ahead of me. But if I did get him to turn off the lights upstairs instead of complaining about the long-distance phone bill, to stay awake for a whole concert, or to lose his temper during an argument so I'd sound less like a screech owl—how then could I identify him as the individual I love most in the world? SHIPBOARD DANCE

By VIRGINIA SCOTT MINER

Now is the small girl's silence broken,
For someone tender and tall and wise
Has bowed before her and gravely spoken,
Reading the dream in her dazzled eyes:
And "Yes!" chimed her heart like a tiny bell
To "Voulez-vous dansez, p'tite mademoiselle?"

To many a dance will those light feet go
In the long, full years that will follow,
But no greater bliss will she ever know
Than to fly like a circling swallow,
Sure in a joy too deep for laughter
That she is a woman—and one sought after!

Watch Your Baby's Hands Grow Smarter!

● At 4 months, he plays with his hands like toys. Baby's new game of "fingering his fingers" shows he's using his head to make his eyes and hands work together as a team.

● By 10 months, he picks up tiny things with forefinger and thumb. Learns pat-a-cake, waves bye-bye. Not a good ball player; he can't depend on his hand to let go!

● Early in his second year he feeds himself. His mind tells his hand to find his mouth with a spoon. And before long, your smeary but happy baby begins to master his favorite skill!

Babies get tired of the same menu day after day. To make your baby's meals exciting, serve Heinz tasty Exclusives—such as Macaroni-Tomatoes-Beef-and-Bacon, Chicken Noodle Dinner, Split Peas-with-Vegetables-and-Bacon. ● Mother's helper? We know each baby is different but let's not forget fathers are different, too! This was pointed out at the 1957 Annual Conference of the Child Study Association of America. Some dads pitch in and help with baby and household chores, others just don't. There is no such thing as an Ideal Dad, but there are all kinds of different ways that a man can be a "good father." (Almost any husband—haven't you noticed?—will join in the family jobs and fun, and do it more often, the less he's urged to do so.)

● All babies are cute – but there's no denying that the pink-cheeked variety is the most appealing! Blood-enriching iron puts roses in your baby's cheeks, and makes him feel as well as look his best. Heinz Strained Egg Yolks are a wonderful source of this important iron—and of protein and Vitamin A, too. Over 3 delicious creamy yolks in every jar. Matthew was plowing toward her now and he began to hurry, stumbling over the freshturned earth hilled up against the cotton. "I brought you-all some fresh water, daddy," he said.

He took the bucket from her and drank thirstily. "That's mighty good, Miss Hattie," he said gravely. "I thank you."

She turned to go to the others. "I'll bring some more along about four o'clock."

Matthew shook his head. "I believe we'll be through by then. Now go on and give them boys a drink before they lay down and start hollering." He watched her slender, boned-down figure as she walked away.

Matthew wiped his hand across his mouth and started rolling a cigarette, his eyes watching the children of his loins. He was a stocky man, heavy built, with a broad, pleasant face that was easy to smile even though there wasn't much laughter in him.

He finished the cigarette and put it under his heel, took the handles of the plow into his broad, strong hands, and clucked to the mule. He plowed down until he was even with the group of boys clustered around Miss Hattie and her fresh water. Knox was kneeling before her, laughing, teasing her.

Looking at him, Matthew felt the old question stir in his mind. Was he the one? The question always came to him unexpectedly, in moments like this with his eyes on his children, trying to see them not as children but as they were, grown and growing in their own pattern.

Dunbar's Cove had never been split away in inheritances. It had come to Matthew in that way, and it would leave him in its entirety into another's hand.

Matthew himself had not been the oldest son. He remembered the moment when his father had made the choice, had laid a hand on his shoulder and said, "Dunbar's Cove will go to Matthew." Matthew hadn't expected to be chosen. He knew, as they all knew, that the choice was a matter of selection rather than tradition, that any man of the family—or any woman, for that matter, though it had never happened—could be the inheritor.

He stood watching his sons with Miss Hattie, considering them each in turn. Knox was the oldest and had the best chance, of course, as the oldest always had. He was big and sturdy, levelheaded except for that strange lightiness in him that did not go at all with the way he looked. He was a fast hand with dancing and the girls, but that would pass.

Jesse John, already married, settled, quiet, dependable. But he let his wife run over him. Maybe he was too meek, mild, too easy-going.

Matthew's eyes lingered longest on Rice, the youngest of the boys, the tall one. He was a real farmer; he had the joy in him, the feel of the land, that Matthew had himself. But he was only eighteen, still too young to tell.

Matthew shook his head. He wrapped the lines around the plow handles and walked across the cotton rows to join them.

"I'll take a little more of that water if you don't mind, Miss Hattie," he said. He took the bucket and emptied it. "Ah-h," he said, wiping his mouth, "Miss Hattie totes the best water in the world."

She scoffed at him, laughing. "Daddy! It's just old well water."

He smiled down at her. "But it changes when you tote it, child. It's got the taste of love in it."

She put an arm around the heavy muscularity of his leg, leaning against him. "You sure you won't need another drink before quitting time?"

Knox looked at his father. "How long you think it'll take us, sir?" he said. "I sort of had my mind on that dance tonight."

"I'm going, too," Rice said quickly.

Matthew looked around the field. "You boys go on and take out," he said. "I can finish up here." He liked to finish the laying-by all alone. He always found an excuse to send the boys out of the field when he started the first plowing for the year, and when he finished the last. He looked at Jesse John. "You go on, too," he said. "Connie's gonna be wanting to go to that dance."

"Yes, sir," Jesse John said. "I know she is." He turned away from his father and went slowly to take out Bodoc. She'd want to, all right, and she'd go. He actually believed that if he didn't take her himself, she'd go alone. She'd be dancing with everybody just like she was still looking for a man. And that just wasn't right. He hit his fist against Bodoc's leg, making him step over. He was gloomily sure that she would prevail. She always did.

Matthew did not start plowing again until they had taken out. He stood watching them, gripping the plow handles, his own mule restless and aggrieved because the other mules were leaving the field.

"Get up out there," he said softly to Prince. "Get up now. Let's finish this plowing now."

Prince leaned into the collar and the plow handles came alive. They trembled in his hands and he watched the earth, moist from kept moisture, curl and break around the rooted stalks of cotton.

Mark, his older brother, had been gone away in those days when Matthew had earned his inheritance. One morning in May his bed had been empty. That fall his brother still had not returned, nor had they heard from him. And on a day when the fields were full of cotton hands, during the mealtime on long tables under the oak tree, his father had laid his hand on his shoulder and said, "Dunbar's Cove will go to Matthew."

Matthew had stood still under the weight of the hand and the inheritance until the old man turned to him. "You can make next year's crop without me. I'm going to set down."

That spring Matthew entered the fields alone to make the first plowing in the land. Only then did he permit his two younger brothers to help him. They had plowed and planted and tended and gathered, and still Mark had not returned. He did not come until Matthew's sixth crop was in the ground.

But when Mark did come he had the look of far traveling in his hard face and his eyes were like agate marbles against the dust of roads and the coal of freights. He came with a strangeness in him, and an anger that glowed through his agate eyes at Matthew.

"I've come back," he said.

Matthew was standing on the front porch where he had come to answer his knock. "You are welcome," he said.

Mark's eyes shifted. "Papa," he said. "Is he dead?"

"No," Matthew said. "But he's old. He's given Dunbar's Cove to me."

He watched the flaring of the eyes, the quickly tightened jaw. "Until I came back it was yours," Mark said. "But I'm the oldest."

Matthew shook his head slowly. "No," he said. "He gave it into my hands. I aim to keep it."

Mark moved then, exploded, surging up on the porch. There was a sudden knife in his hand and Matthew recoiled away from him. He had never fought in his life. He caught the wrist as the knife moved in and hit Mark with the other hand, knocking him off the porch. They fought all over the front yard while Matthew's young wife came screaming from the kitchen, while his brothers Luke and John gathered around, afraid to interfere.

They were bloody and dirty. Matthew's shirt was torn from his back. They stood still finally, hitting each other with steady fists until Mark broke ground, giving back against the oak tree. Matthew pinned his throat with one hand and hit him four times, slowly, with the other, until Mark's hands covered his face and his body was slack and defenseless.

Matthew drew back then, panting. "Dunbar's Cove is Dunbar land," he said. The words came gaspingly. "And any Dunbar can find a home here. But you. If you set foot in this cove again, I'll kill you."

He stopped, waiting to see if Mark understood. Mark lifted his battered face. "I want . . . water," he said. "Then I'll ——"

"Go now," Matthew said. "There's no water here for you."

He moved again, his dead-tired limbs like lead but ready to fight if need be, and Mark wavered away from him, stooping to pick up his bundle, and went along the creek road toward the river, out of the cove. Matthew walked blindly, without seeing his young wife or his children or his brothers, to the edge of the porch. He had carried the memory of that violence in his mind ever since.

That was why he had to be right now. He had been the chosen, and he had believed that his father had chosen well, had believed even to the extent of fighting and violence to hold the inheritance. Not for his own hunger, but for the cove itself.

He lifted his head, realizing that he had finished with the laying-by. He went around the plow to unhitch the mule, and saw the stranger standing on the bridge, watching him. He was a young man, wearing clean-pressed khakis, the shirt open at the neck. He started coming toward Matthew, walking easily, carefully over the cotton rows.

"Howdy," Matthew said gravely when he was three rows away, and the young man lifted his face.

"Mr. Dunbar?" he said. "Mr. Matthew Dunbar?"

"That's me," Matthew said.

"My name is Crawford Gates. I'm from the TVA—the Tennessee Valley Authority. I suppose you received our letter recently?"

Matthew smiled. "Son, I ain't been in to the post office since I put the first plow into the ground this spring."

Crawford Gates kept the frown from appearing on his face. "Well," he said easily, "I guess I'll be the one to break the news."

Matthew turned away for a moment. "You go on," he said. "I got to take out. You won't mind if I ——"

"Go right ahead," Crawford said. "In fact, I'll help you." He stepped to the side of the mule and began looping up the plow lines on the hames. "The Tennessee Valley Authority wants to buy your land, Mr. Dunbar. That's what I've come to see you about."

Matthew didn't even straighten up. "My land," he said. "You might just as well quit talking right now, son. I ——"

"You don't understand," Crawford said. "We're building a big dam about ten miles down the river. All this land will be flooded. You'll have to move somewhere else before the water comes." He looked at Matthew seriously. "But you'll be paid a good price."

Matthew turned his head slowly, looking about him. Then he looked back at Crawford. His face was not angry, or set, or determined. It was even friendly, explaining. "Son," he said, still smiling, "I don't aim to sell."

Crawford Gates' father had been a peckerwood sawmill man, owning a portable rig that he transported to a site for a month, two months or a year of cutting, then dismantled and transported it elsewhere, so Crawford had grown up with the smell of sawdust in his nostrils, with a knowledge of trees and timber as unconscious as the woods wisdom of the fast-stepping little mules that snaked the downed logs out of the underbrush to the mill. He loved those sturdy little mules, just as he loved his father riding the carriage back and forth, slamming the levers with ungloved hands, walking the log into the singing saw.

STOVE

The word "stove" comes from an Old English noun, stofa, meaning a heated room. This name, by a common language change, became in time the name of the heating agency instead of the heated place. So the stove, or stofa, in early Northern European life, was a room in which one could safely, or even comfortably, take a bath or write. It was a "stuffy" place.

Stoves have been known in Europe since Roman times. In very early days, when our ancestors lived in forests, it was a simple matter to provide heat to the house by dragging a log to the central fireplace, which was merely a pavement on the floor of the "hall," with a louvered smoke vent in the roof above it. As time passed, and the woods were cleared or enclosed, fuel became scarce, and ways must be devised to save it. Highly decorated five-plate iron stoves were used in Northern Europe in the fifteenth century. Since the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, enormous and beautiful tile heaters have been used in various cold climates, many of them highly decorated with forms of symbolic art. Clay and brick stoves were often built against outer house walls and could be fueled from without. On the northern plains of Russia, enormous constructions of long and circuitous flues could secure a maximum of heat from a bundle of twisted straw or an armful of fagots.

Early American foundries made five-plate iron stoves highly decorated with Biblical scenes and sayings. These at first were used only for heating; they were considered more cleanly and elegant than the earlier fireplace. But for some time cooking continued to be done on the open hearth. Finally it dawned, probably on some adventurous woman, that cooking food might easily and neatly be accomplished by the stove! Then came into being the great old cookstove or range, as it was sometimes called, with its clean and ever-ready oven which soon superseded the vast outdoor structure of brick or stone which was a feature of most pioneer homesteads. The English Aga, cleverly devised to run for a day on one small bucketful of coal, has all the good qualities of the American range, at once cooking the family food and diffusing a volume of welcome heat. The word "range," by the way, is reminiscent of a Roman kitchen, where a row or range of brick boxes enclosed the separate fires which cooked a variety of viands in such a way that their flavors did not mingle.

The Franklin stove, designed by its famous inventor to be set into or before a fireplace, was planned to economize on fuel and to improve the diffusion of heat. When anthracite coal began to be mined in the Eastern United States, the "base burner" was invented, a magazine stove which could feed itself for a day on one scuttle of coal. Resplendent with mica glass in the doors and with nickel handles and footrests, it was thought by many housewives to have conquered dirt and mess. But alas, the ashes still had to be carried out!

The march of progress has left behind all but a few of the good old-fashioned cookstoves, but they are still the gourmets' delight to those who own them, for with them can be achieved every degree of slow and loving cookery, from the "smile on the side of the pan," through all the forms of braising, jugging and casseroling so hard to achieve with the clear, high, definite forms of heat afforded by most of the modern gas and electric ranges.

MARY K. BLACKMAR

By the time Crawford was twelve years old he could ride the carriage himself, walking the big, aromant logs into the slicing saw, his own small hands working the levers as well as any man's. He was a rangy, rawboned kid. He lived with his father in a tent on the sawmill site, for he did not even remember his mother, and the boys of whatever school he attended envied him his freedom, his tent life and the romance of the woods. But Crawford didn't swell with the envy; he wanted only to get away from the school and back to the woods.

By the time he was twenty years old he ran the sawmill, leaving his father completely free from the necessity of immediate supervision. He hired and fired men, he bought and sold timber, he arranged for tools and supplies and mule feed.

Then, that summer, he told his father that he was quitting. He knew exactly what he was going to do. He would go to college and study civil engineering. He did not know, then, that his credits did not even approach the requirements. He did not find that out until he had walked out of the woods one day, carrying a bundle of his clothing, and caught the train to Knoxville, Tennessee. He had $100 in his pocket, and the promise of his regular sawmill wages from his father.

He took a test to replace the certification of credits, and when he left the school for the summer of 1929 he expected to return in the fall. But he never did. In August his father was working with an old saw that should have been scrapped long before. The saw broke, and when they picked his father up from where he had been hurled one leg was hanging by a thin sliver of flesh.

That winter Crawford ran the sawmill while his father hobbled painfully about on the stump he had made out of a good piece of wood. The next year, during the long, slow summertime of 1930, they lost the sawmill. Bills had been piling up, and no one was cutting timber any more. Both Crawford and his father walked and rode for miles without finding work for the rig. Crawford's father cried when they came to haul away the old, rattly engine, the bright shining saws, the log carriage on which he had spent a life and a leg. Crawford did not cry. The next week he was working for another sawmill.

During the following years, ambition seemed to have left him; or perhaps it was only enough, in the depths of the depression, to hang on to the job he had, low and menial and ill-paid though it was.

Then Crawford Gates heard of the Civilian Conservation Corps. He joined. The CCC shipped him to a camp in Mississippi where he was promptly made an assistant leader, with one yellow stripe on his arm. Within two months he was a leader, with an added stripe, and six months later he had become a subaltern in a fire-fighting camp in Oregon, no longer a member of the corps but one of the commanders.

He liked the CCC. He seemed to grow younger in contact with these conglomerate boys from backwoods and city slums. There was still little money, for every month a blue money order went to his father. But there were the camp, the boys and the men, the incredible tallness and virginness of the Pacific Northwest woods into which he led his crews with McLeods and axes to dig fire lanes frantically against the sweeping burning of the senseless fires struck by God or man among the tall trees. He changed in those years, grew again, with the beauty of the trees around him and the responsibility of the boys in his hands. Only the summons that he received could have made him leave it, a telegram from his father that said simply, "Son, you'd better come home now."

He went home riding in a Pullman for the first time in his life. His father was dying. He died the second night after Crawford walked up the hill road and turned in to the door.

Crawford waited awhile after his father died, living alone in the little empty house, before he knew what he wanted to do now. When he read about the Tennessee Valley Authority in the newspaper, he knew that he had found it. He made his application, took his tests and waited. One day there was a letter telling him that he was accepted. He was a timber cruiser for the TVA. He was a part of the great plan that he had read about, that he had studied with avid attention during the period of waiting uncertainty. It was a big thing and he was part of it.

Except he didn't cruise timber. Not once had he entered into a stand of trees since he had been working at the job. With the illogic of needful change and urgency, he had been pressed into the Land Purchase Section, where his knowledge did not follow him as it would have with the timber. But he made the decisions and talked to the men, and he learned the function given him as capably as the younger men who surrounded him.

And so he came to Dunbar's Cove, with all that behind him, and so he looked at Matthew, seeing him and liking him and even understanding partly the stubborn ununderstanding, but still with the necessity of showing him the blank futility of resistance.

"Sir," he said, "you know what the TVA is doing here ——"

"I've heard tell," Matthew said. "Them dams they've been building up the river and down the river." He shook his head admiringly. "All that to make work for folks."

Crawford leaned forward. "It's not make work," he said. "It's the mightiest thing that God or man ever brought to this country. They're taming the river, harnessing it, puttin it to work where it's never worked before Matthew stood watching him, holding th bridle reins in one hand. He was too courteou too kindly not to listen.

"They take that running water and they p it through a turbine. They take the electrici and spread it over the land—so that folks lik you and me can afford it and use it like a doze extra hands in the field. We're not coming here to make you do anything. We're comin in to help and guide you in the change. W could just move in with a court order in o hand and a set amount of money in the othe But the TVA doesn't work that way. We ca you find a piece of land at a good price, ch and fertile as this cove."

atthew felt a touch of exasperation. There no way to make this insistent young man erstand. He might as well put an end to it t now.

Son," he said, "you been doing a sight of ching here this evening. And I always feed preacher a good meal. Why don't you e and take supper with us?"

rawford laughed. "I reckon that I have throwing the Good Book at you, Mr. bar," he said. "I ask your pardon. But n a man believes in something, he's just to preach it."

Matthew laid a hand on his shoulder. He was surprised at the firm stringiness of the muscles there.

They crossed the bridge and turned down the side of the creek, following the field road that angled toward the barn. They passed the watermelon patch, walking companionably together, the mule leading behind. Matthew halted and handed the reins to Crawford.

"I got me a couple of melons cooling," he said. "Wait just a minute."

He clambered down the creek bank and fished out the two melons he had put in the water at noontime. He tucked one under each arm and went back up the bank.

"I thought we'd have us a watermelon feast before supper tonight. Here, you tote one and I'll tote the other."

They started on again, each one carrying a cool watermelon on one shoulder. They went on toward the house, walking around into the front yard where the shade of the big oak sheltered them from the sun.

Matthew raised his voice. "The plowing's done," he yelled. "And I got me two watermelons out here. Who wants a slice?"

There was a sudden scurry of noise and laughter inside the house and Miss Hattie burst out of the kitchen like a flock of quail. "Daddy!" she hollered. "Watermelon!"

"Whoa, now," Matthew said, catching her up. "Wait till the rest get here. Where are the boys?"

"They went down to the swimming hole to take a bath," Miss Hattie said. "I'll go get 'em."

Matthew turned to Crawford Gates. "Set down and cool off. A hot man ain't got no business eating a cold watermelon."

But Crawford was looking at Arlis, coming from the kitchen with knives and spoons and a couple of salt shakers. Her apron had flour streaked on it, her hair was falling down on one side, but her good-humored, high-colored, tilted-eyed face appealed to him. She paused, startled, when she saw the stranger.

"Arlis," Matthew said, "this is Crawford Gates. He's come to take supper with us."

Arlis stopped, feeling a little flustered with the heat and her untidiness. "Pleased to meet you," she said. She looked at Matthew reproachfully. "If I'd known you was having folks to supper, I'd have killed a chicken and ——"

Matthew laughed. "No fried chicken," he said to Crawford. "Reckon you can stand it?"

"I reckon so," Crawford said, laughing too.

They heard a whooping and a hollering from the direction of the creek and turned to see the boys come boiling out of the underbrush. Knox was in front, trailing a pair of overalls from one hand, and Rice was chasing him, wearing only shorts and a shirt.

Matthew lifted his voice. "Get your clothes on, boys. We got company."

They sobered instantly, seeing the stranger, and Rice hastily slipped on his overalls. They came on to the house, shaking hands with Crawford in turn.

Our opinion of people depends less upon what we see in them than upon what they make us see in ourselves. SARAH GRAND

"All right," Matthew said. "You boys get a couple of sawhorses and some planks. I want to cut these melons before they get hot again."

The arrangements didn't take long and Matthew stood with the big butcher knife deftly slicing the melons. They were so ripe just the touch of the knife was sufficient to split them. The red, glistening meat separated almost of itself into V's of deliciousness.

Matthew laid down the knife and picked up one of the slices. He proffered it to Crawford Gates with a grave ceremony. Crawford accepted it and stood waiting while Matthew handed each of them a slice in turn.

Matthew looked at Jesse John. "Where's Connie?"

"She doesn't want any," Jesse John said.

Matthew frowned slightly. He did not like absences. But he went on with the serving, handing a slice with a lot of heart meat to Miss Hattie last of all. The boys were sitting on the roots of the oak tree, holding the melon slices in both hands, biting the meat out. Matthew did not touch his slice yet. He picked up the other one and walked with it to Connie and Jesse John's room.

He stopped in the doorway, looking at her. "You're missing out on some mighty good watermelon," he said.

She whirled around, ashamed of the thin slip she was wearing. "I . . ." she said, faltering . . . "I don't care for any, Mr. Dunbar."

"Come on now," he said gently. "This is a celebration. You can't just leave yourself out of a celebration."

"But I'm not . . . dressed."

He went into the room and put the watermelon slice down on the dresser. "Get dressed," he said. "And come on out." He turned and went toward the door. "Is Jesse John taking you to the dance tonight?"

"Yes. He said he wanted to take me."

Matthew nodded and went on. He stopped at the entrance to the living room and looked in. The old man was sitting in the worn rocking chair, his thin, blotched hands folded in his lap.

Matthew went into the room. He raised his voice. "How are you, papa?"

For a long moment the old man did not move. His face was thin, fragile, seeming as though the light, dry bones would break with a touch.

"All right, I reckon." The thin voice quavered and stopped.

"Papa," Matthew said, "they're trying to buy Dunbar's Cove. They want to take the cove away from me."

But the old man had not heard. Or he had not understood. Matthew stood looking at him for a moment, then he went outside to the watermelon feast again.

"Aw," Knox was saying to Arlis, "you can go one time. I can't remember when you've been to a dance."

"I've got too much to do," Arlis said. "After supper I'll have the dishes, and cleaning up—it's just too much trouble to try to go."

"Arlis," Crawford said suddenly, "I wish you'd let me take you to the dance."

She looked at him, a flush rising suddenly in her face. "I'm sorry. I have too much ——"

"Oh, go on, Arlis," Miss Hattie said briskly. "I'll do the dishes. You go on."

"Of course," Crawford said, looking down at his khaki shirt and pants, "I'm not dressed well for a dance, but ——"

"Well," Arlis said, almost reluctantly, "if it's all right with papa ——"

"Go right on, for all of me," Matthew said quickly, and it was done.

"What's your line of work, Mr. Gates?" Knox said.

Crawford glanced at Matthew as though asking how much he should tell. "I work for the TVA," he said.

"Crawford is a land buyer," Matthew said. "He come to tell me that the TVA wants to buy the cove. They want to back dam water up here and make a lake out of it."

Knox stood up. "Are they really going to build that dam?" he said, suppressed eagerness in his voice. "You think I could get me a job down there? I hear the TV and A pays mighty good money."

Rice was sitting still, watching Matthew. "Buy the cove?" he said. His voice was stunned, unbelieving. "How much do they want to pay?"

Matthew turned away from him to look at Jesse John. But Jesse John was watching Connie come from the house in a white organdy dress, tripping carefully down the steps, carrying the watermelon slice in one hand.

"Hello, everybody," she said brightly. "My, it's fun to have a watermelon feast." Jesse John went to stand close to her. He wanted to touch her. But he was afraid he might soil the fresh, starched whiteness of the organdy.

Matthew put down his unfinished watermelon. "If I'm going to do all the night work by myself," he said, "I'd better get started before supper."

He walked away from them and went around the corner of the house toward the solitude of the barn, the company of the animals.

The house where the dance was being held stood on a knob of hill. It was owned by Old Man Precise, who also owned a fiddle and three sons and three daughters, all of whom could make music. Inside the house, the living room was bare of furniture, the splintery pine floor bare, too, and the wood thumped and trembled from the rhythmic weight of many feet. Chairs lined the walls, occupied by old ladies who talked among themselves and kept an eye on the girls. Many an older lady had an unconsciously patting foot in memory of her dancing days.

And over it all, inside the house and out, was the music. Old Man Precise's fiddle sang and sobbed and chirped the songs, stirring the feet and hearts of the dancers.

Arlis said to Crawford, "Look at Rice and that redheaded girl. He's got it bad, hasn't he?"

Crawford grinned, and looked back at her. "Yes," he said. "But not much worse than me. He's just younger about it, that's all."

"How much younger?" Arlis said, avoiding the direction of his conversation.

"I'm twenty-nine. How old are you, Arlis?"

Arlis thought about it for a moment, her feet moving automatically with the music. She was twenty. But from fifteen to twenty she had missed the carefreeness of the age because of the kitchen and the work.

"You shouldn't ask any girl how old she is," she protested.

He looked into her eyes. "Twenty-three?" he said. "Twenty-two?"

She felt a slight stab of hurt. "Twenty," she said quickly, and saw the change in his face as he realized his mistake.

The music stopped and Old Man Precise called out, "I want me an old-timy square-dance set. Choose your partners!"

Crawford wiped at the sweat on his face. "I don't think I'd better risk it," he said. "I don't know how to square-dance."

"Let's just watch, then," Arlis said. She slipped her arm comfortably through Crawford's, looking around the room.

The square-dance set lined down the whole length; even some of the old women were in this one. Arlis looked for Connie and Jesse John, planning to go over and talk to them, but Connie was sitting alone in a chair against the wall. As she watched, she saw Connie get up and slip out the side door. She frowned. She knew that Connie was up to something.

On the porch, Connie hesitated, looking through the darkness toward the cluster of young men under the cedars, daring herself to approach them. The younger boys were reluctant to cut in on her, now that she was a married woman, and she knew that the old women disapproved of her dancing at all, even with Jesse John.

She saw Knox coming toward her from the darkness. "Knox," she said, "have you seen Jesse John?"

He stopped, one foot on the step, and looked up at her warily. "No," he said. "Went out to get a drink, I reckon."

Connie put one hand on the porch column. She felt suddenly light and easy. "He left me sitting in there like an old lady," she said, a pout in her voice. But she did not really care any more. She looked at Knox boldly across the darkness. "Why don't you come dance with me, Knox? Until Jesse John gets back."

"I reckon not, Connie," he said. "I'm not much to dance."

She listened to the tight carefulness of his voice. She moved a step nearer to him. "I remember when you liked to dance with me. When you ——"

Knox stepped down to the hard-packed earth away from her. "That was before you married my brother," he said. He was afraid she was going to touch him, put her warm hand on his arm, and he turned quickly. "If I see Jesse John, I'll tell him you're looking for him."

"Yes," she said, keeping the tremble out of her voice. "You do that, Knox." She turned and fled into the presence of the dancers again.

Knox walked quickly toward the group under the cedars. He was shaken. Nearly always he managed to keep people between them. Connie had been a summer night, two summer nights, over three years ago. But she persisted in cherishing it, bringing it up between them, even though she was married now to Jesse John.

"Howdy, Knox," a voice said as he joined the group. "Take a little snort."

"I'm toting my own," Knox said, "thank you." He took out the bottle and tilted it, feeling the fiery trickle down his throat. "Anybody care for a swallow?"

The voices murmured at him and he put the bottle away. "Jesse John here?" he said.

"Here," Jesse John said.

"Connie's looking for you."

"I was just going to see about her," Jesse John said, moving away from the group.

Knox stayed for a time, then he drifted from the house and looked in at the whirling throng. But he discovered he did not want to go inside and went instead into the grove of trees where his mule was hitched. He swung into the saddle and headed home in a shambling lope. At home, he unsaddled, turned the mule into the stable and walked around to the front porch.

"Home so early?" Matthew's voice sang from the darkness. "What's the matter at the dance?"

"Oh," Knox said, "it's just an old dance."

Matthew chuckled. "I've seen you ride twenty miles to one of them old dances, even knowing you had to hit the field at daylight."

Knox sat down on the porch. "I reckon you grow out of it," he said. "Papa, I been thinking. Now we got the crop laid by, I think I'll go down to that dam and see if I can find me a job of work."

"Why do you want to do that?"

"It's good money."

Matthew stirred in his chair. "It ain't never been necessary for a Dunbar to go out on public work," he said. "If you need money, I'll put money in your hand. How much do you want?"

Knox moved jerkily. "It's not just that I want to make it myself. I want to go, papa. I want to go tomorrow. Do you say I can?"

It is almost a definition of a gentleman to say he is one who never inflicts pain.

a long time. It's just resistance to change, differentness."

"How are you going to handle it?"

Crawford stood up. "I don't see but one thing to do," he said slowly. "Make old Matthew understand the real thing about TVA, how him and his cove don't have the right to stand in its way."

The man pursed his lips. "There's always recourse to condemnation."

"Sure," Crawford said. "But we've got time. They're not going to get that dam finished tomorrow."

The boss turned back to his papers. "You know how we operate," he said. "We'd rather have a friend of the TVA any time, instead of an enemy. Go to it."

Crawford smiled with relief. "I'm taking the map and the forms out there today."

He walked down the old dusty stairs and across the street to where he had parked his car and threw the folder into the back seat. The car was hot from sitting in the sun. He wheeled around the square, and took a street leading out. The pavement ended quickly and he was on gravel. He drove carefully, feeling the jar of the rough chert road coming up through the wheel into his hands.

He spun out of trees into cotton fields, then back into trees again, and stopped in the shade at the head of the cove. He got out, reached into the back seat for the folder and walked rapidly up the road. The front yard and the porch were empty. He stopped at the steps and lifted his voice. "Hello the house."

He waited, preparing to call again, when he heard a door open. He knew it was Arlis before he saw her. She stopped in surprise.

"Hello, Arlis," he said. "I ——"

"Crawford." Her face looked flushed and pleased. "I didn't expect you back so soon."

He wanted to move up the steps to her side, to touch her. "I came to see your daddy. But it's good seeing you, too, Arlis."

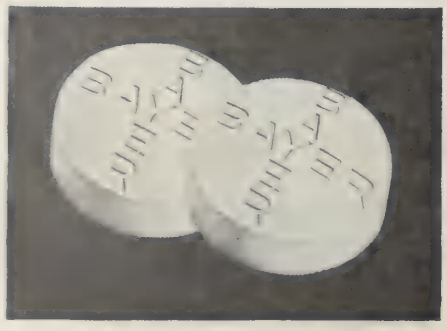
Here's what you should do about

COLDS or ASIATIC FLU!



1. See your doctor
2. Get plenty of bed rest
3. Drink lots of fruit juice
4. Take Aspirin for fever and pain

BAYER ASPIRIN MAKES YOU FEEL BETTER-FAST!

THE SYMPTOMS of the common cold—and of highly contagious Asiatic Flu—are remarkably similar. Fever, headache, muscular aches and pains, backache and sore throat are among the characteristics of both diseases.

The moment you are aware of any of these symptoms, you should, of course, get in touch with your doctor. Meanwhile, rest in bed as much as possible, drink as much fruit juice as you can, and take Bayer Aspirin without delay.

The importance of taking Bayer Aspirin at the first sign of a cold or Asiatic Flu cannot be over-emphasized. Both diseases, if neglected, can cause you serious trouble... Asiatic Flu especially —for it not only spreads with insidious speed, but can lead to pneumonia.

Bayer Aspirin will make you feel better fast—because it relieves aches and pains with astonishing speed, and quickly reduces fever as well.

We believe your own doctor or public health official will tell you that Bayer Aspirin brings the relief you need for the painful discomforts caused by colds or Asiatic Flu.

Remember—penetrating research confirms that Bayer brings the fastest relief ... the fastest, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief you can get.

She stood watching him and it was not at as she had expected. She had felt that the ncing and the togetherness and the kiss ould stand thickly between them, barring mmunication. But it was not that way; it as only easy and casual and friendly in the oad daylight.

"He's out in the woods working up the nter wood," she said. "They'll be in to din- r pretty soon. I've got some coffee on the ove. Won't you come into the kitchen?"

She opened the door and entered, Crawford hind her.

"Sit down," Arlis said to him. "I'll heat the offee."

She brought clean cups and a pitcher of eam and then poured sugar into a very old nd battered silver sugar bowl that she took om a top shelf. He knew that she did not use e bowl for every day.

She did not sit down with him until the offee was hot and poured, but kept busy out the stove. Then, while he spooned gar into his cup, she slipped into the seat op- osite him.

"Last night," he said. "Did you have a good me?"

She blushed. "Yes," she said. "Yes. It was good time."

"I hope you didn't mind me . . . there at the st ——"

"No," she breathed. "It was all right. I ean ——"

He leaned forward. "Arlis, before the others et here I wanted to ask you—I mean, I'm go- ng to the picture show in town Saturday. You ant to go with me?"

She sat very still. It is real, she thought. It eally did happen last night and I didn't just nagine it.

"Yes," she said. "Yes, I would like to go."

There was a sound at the porch screen door nd Crawford stood up as Matthew came into he kitchen.

"Why, howdy," he said. "I didn't expect to ee you." He looked at Arlis. "You got my linner ready, girl?"

"It's in the warming oven. It'll be on the able by the time you're there yourself."

"Good," Matthew said. "Come on, Craw- ord. Wash up and eat with us."

Crawford hesitated. "All right," he said. "I hank you."

He followed Matthew to the back porch nd out into the yard. They washed, side by ide, Matthew stooping over the pan and splashing the water heartily into his face and over his hands and arms.

Crawford said carefully, "If you don't mind, 'd like to go over your place with you. We've got aerial photographs to measure your land nd you can show me just where your lines go on the map. Then we can figure the acreage nd make you a price on the basis of that."

"I don't need no price," Matthew said firmly. "So I don't see no need for you to go to all that trouble."

"It's just a job I've got to do." Crawford smiled deprecatingly. "They tell me to go out and measure some land, I've got to measure it. It doesn't commit you to anything."

Matthew studied it for a minute. "All right," he said. "I don't want to get you into no trouble with your boss. You can measure my land from now to doomsday if you're a mind to." He grinned faintly. "It's gonna take you that long to buy it anyway, Mr. Gates."

After the hearty meal, Crawford and Matthew prepared to walk over the land. Crawford took out the aerial map. "I'll need to know just where your boundaries run," he said. "I've got a pretty good idea, but I have to be sure."

Matthew held the map in both hands. "Here we are," he said, putting his finger on the place. He was pleased. "I recognized it right away, even if I ain't never seen it from the air."

He gave the map back to Crawford and they walked out into the field road. Crawford looked around at the cove.

"It's a pretty place, Mr. Dunbar. A mighty pretty place."

"Yes," Matthew said, slogging on steadily in the heat. He always moved that way, slow and deliberate and steady. "Yes, it is. I don't never get over the pretty of it, myself."

Crawford was silent for a moment. They reached the bridge and he stopped, spreading out the map again. He got out the pad of blanks and filled in the heading. "You've got all this here in cotton," he said, moving a finger to indicate. "Is that right?"

"Yes," Matthew said. "That's all the cotton I raise."

Crawford started to write on the pad. "You can just about tell from the map what's growing. But we check it. And this is where the corn starts." He turned the pad over and multiplied some figures.

Matthew watched. "Yes," he said. "I've got a little jog of timber land right here, though." He indicated the place.

Swiftly Crawford altered the line. "I didn't know you went up that far." He smiled. "We were aiming to cheat you there."

He folded the map and they walked on. Crawford could feel the hot sun beating heavily through his khaki shirt. He said, "I wish there was some way I could show you the whole TVA, like I showed you that map. I'd like to take you down to that damsite sometime. Maybe ——"

"I'm a busy man, Mr. Gates," Matthew said. "I don't have no time to go gallivanting off this time of year. This is hay land. Did you get that?"

Crawford stopped, making notes on the pad of paper. "I nearly walked right by it," he said. "You've never had electricity in your house, have you?"

"No," Matthew said. "The power company talked once of putting a line through, but it never did come to nothing."

Crawford said, "When TVA gets through, there'll be power lines all through here. There'll hardly be a farm that won't have electricity."

"Yeah," Matthew said. "To hear you tell it, I ain't going to be here to enjoy it."

Crawford stopped in the field road. "But you wouldn't do a thing to keep anybody else from getting it? You wouldn't want to hold it away from all the other folks around here?"

"No," Matthew said slowly. "I reckon I wouldn't want to do that. They're my neighbors. I wouldn't turn a hand to hurt them in any way."

"You don't have to turn a hand," Crawford said bluntly. "All you've got to do is stand still in your stubbornness. That way, you'll be hurting the whole countryside, holding it back from the progress and the advancement it needs." He leaned forward. "Mr. Dunbar, tell me one thing: Just one thing, and then I'll shut up. If I can show you what a big thing TVA is, if I can convince you in your heart what it's going to mean to the people of this country—if I can do all that, will you agree to sell Dunbar's Cove?"

Matthew thought about it. He looked up at Crawford, a slight smile touching his lips. "Son," he said, "even if you could do all that—even if you did do all that—I still wouldn't sell Dunbar's Cove."

Crawford tried to smile. "I reckon I got my answer," he said ruefully. "Come on, let's finish up."

Matthew felt sorry for him, seeing the change come into his face. "Son," he said, "you can talk from now on, if you want to. I never yet shut my mind like a steel trap. So, if you got to, you just keep on talking."

They walked around to the front yard, into the shade of the big oak. Matthew looked at the boys sprawled on the front porch.

Both Knox and Rice sprang up at the same moment, fumbling out of sleep. They looked around, bewildered, and Matthew began to laugh.

"That's all right," he said. "We didn't lose too much time. It ain't no more than two o'clock."

Crawford was sitting on the edge of the porch, figuring on the back of the pad. "We had you figured for about two hundred and fifty-some acres," he said. "Adding in twenty-six acres for that woodland makes it something like two hundred and eighty acres. . . . I imagine you'll be offered around twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars for your place."

"That much?" Matthew was impressed.

"Of course," Crawford said hastily, "that's just a guess."

Rice sat up excitedly. "Papa," he said, "we could take that money and start us a dairy farm! That's the easy farming. No hoeing and plowing and planting—well, some, because you've got to raise your feed. But not like farming. It's not anything like farming."

Matthew could feel the freezing start inside him. He turned slowly and looked at Knox. "What do you know about this?" he said. "Are you ——"

"Oh, that's his idea," Knox said indifferently. "That's all he's talked about ever since the first word was said about selling the place."

Matthew looked at Rice again, seeing the excitement in him dull down under his probing stare, and then he turned to Crawford. "You done everything you need to do, Mr. Gates? I've got to get back to work."

"Yes," Crawford said.

He stood alone, watching, while Matthew led the boys around the side of the house out of sight.

It was good to be back in the cove again, even though he had been gone only for the morning. Matthew turned the T-model into the road paralleling the creek bank. He had not been out of the cove since he'd put his crop into the ground. But today he'd had to go to town for baling wire. He had meant to take his time with the trip, but he had not stayed long after all. The men in the barbershop had talked only of the dam. The men at the mule barn were telling stories about the wages the TVA was paying and how everybody, just about, could at least get on the crews for the summer that were clearing the reservoir. He had gone into the bank, and near the entrance there had been a sign with an arrow pointing up the stairs, saying TVA LAND OFFICE. As he stood looking at it, he saw Crawford Gates crossing the sidewalk without seeing him. Matthew, perturbed in his mind, had gone on into the bank and transacted his business hurriedly, anxious to get on back home to the cove. He drove into the shade of the big tree alongside the house, stopped the car and got out, and unwired the hundred pounds of ice from the front bumper.

"Arlis," he called, "bring me something to wrap the ice in. Hurry now."

He heard her moving in the kitchen and he waited until she came to the door with an old quilt in her hands. He took it from her and began wrapping the ice carefully.

"Have us some ice cream tonight," he said cheerfully. "I thought that'd be a good idea on a hot day like this. Where are the boys?"

Arlis smiled. "Knox took 'em back up in the woods," she said, "right after you left."

Matthew laughed. "Now, Knox knows I like to help make his run." He opened the screen door. "Well, when your mash gets ready, you've got to run it. I'll go see how they're making out."

He walked through the barn and out the other side, angling across the peanut patch. It was a fifteen-minute walk to the place where Knox always set up his still. There was a fast-flowing spring, good water, and the trees and brush were thick. Matthew was almost on the spring before he saw a shimmer of smoke in the air. He stepped out into the open and stopped abruptly, staring at the jugs and fruit jars that were already filled. Knox was making another run, the colorless fluid dripping out of the bright copper maze of pipe.

"Son," he said, "you making enough to last the rest of your life?"

Knox jerked up from the firebox where he had been stuffing in more wood. Rice and Jesse John stopped their work too.

"I thought you were taking the day in town." Knox said. "I ——" He stopped talking, snapping his mouth closed and turning away. "Go on back to the house, papa. We can make out all right."

Matthew moved closer to the still. "What in the world do you think you're going to do with all this whisky?"

Knox whirled around. "I aim to make some money out of this TV and A some way," he told his father. "Them men working down there in the reservoir are just crying for some good whisky."

Knox was angry, and scared too. But he would not let himself look away from Matthew. Matthew faced him, feeling the words going through his mind like knives.

"You're making whisky to sell?" he said.

"You won't let me go down there to work," Knox said stubbornly. "I'm staying at home, just like you wanted me to. But I got me a market for my stuff and I aim to ——"

Matthew stood still, fighting it inside him. He wouldn't let his mouth say a word until he could control the anger. "No Dunbar," he said at last, "ever lowered hisself to sell moonshine." He turned toward Jesse John and Rice. "Take that ax and start chopping glass until I tell you when it's time to stop."

Jesse John stood up uncertainly.

"No," Knox said.

Matthew looked back at him again. "All right, Jesse John," he said quietly, "stay where you are." He picked up the ax, hefting it in one hand, and walked back to Knox. "You're right. They ain't got no call to break up your own liquor. Take this and start breaking."

For a moment Matthew thought that he was going to refuse and defy. But, slowly, Knox's hand moved to take the ax, his face suddenly still and white and blank.

"You're making me do it?" he said hoarsely.

"No commercial liquor can be made on Dunbar land," Matthew said. "Not as long as I'm the man."

Knox lifted the ax and walked swiftly to the cluster of jars and jugs. He swung the ax against them in a sweeping blow. The instant pungency of the whisky swept thick as musk into the air. Jesse John and Rice stood watching as Knox labored over the breaking, the ax rising and falling, flashing in the sunlight.

"All right," Matthew said finally. There were five jugs left. "That's enough."

Knox paused with the ax lifted in the air and looked over his shoulder at Matthew. He threw the ax into the glitter of broken glass and went away from them, making his own path into the woods.

"Kill the rest of that run," Matthew told Jesse John and Rice. "And bring his copper worm to the barn. Take it up gentle now. We'll put it away for him until he's ready to use it again."

He watched them begin with the banking and dismantling, then he walked away.

Connie had waited long enough for Jesse John. This morning she had said something about going swimming in the creek pool and she had believed he would come to take her for he did not like her to swim alone. But she was not going to wait any longer.

She walked slowly, feeling the beads of perspiration on her face from the heat. The bathing suit under the white dress clung stiffly to her body and she kept thinking about the cool, tree-shaded water, where the boys had cut back the brush, and there was a homemade diving board. The creek widened and deepened in this part, a natural swimming hole.

She sat down to take off her white shoes, then reached and caught the hem of her dress, lifting it over her head. She walked to the edge of the pool, tugging at the bra of the suit.

"Just my luck," a voice said. "A bathing suit."

She recovered herself, startled, and saw him standing across the creek bank on the other side. "Who—who are you?" she said, feeling the fright creeping into her voice.

He was tall, with a smooth, tanned face and a tiny black mustache shading the upper lip. He wore overalls and a battered felt hat. "Ever' book I ever read in my life didn't say anything about a bathing suit when a man watches a woman go swimming by herself," he said, grinning. "Just my doggoned luck."

With his eyes on her, Connie felt as though she were not wearing the protective cloth at all. She slid quickly into the creek. "Who are you?" she demanded.

"Me?" He grinned elaborately. "My name is Ceram Haskins. I'm bossing one of those clearing gangs over yonder."

She felt better now. He was a stranger, but his voice spoke in the accents she knew. She smiled a trifle of a smile. "You shouldn't be sneaking around where a girl might take it in mind to go swimming."

He shrugged his shoulders. "I didn't aim to sneak around. I was just hunting a shady place to set for a while. Say, what's your name?"

"Connie." She bent her knees and waded deeper into the water.

"Why don't you come over?" he said. "We could talk better without the width of the creek between us."

She flirted her head. "I don't reckon I've got anything to talk about. Not with a stranger that hangs around ——"

"All right," he said. "I'll just have to come over there."

He jumped into the water, clothes and all, splashing a wave over her and into her face. She gasped, backing away, her hands wiping at her water-stinging eyes. When she had them cleared again he was standing shoulder deep next to her.

"Howdy," he said gravely. "Do you go swimming here often?"

"Just . . . once in a while. I've got to go now. I ——"

He reached out his hands and took her arms in them. They were big hands, holding her tightly. "You just got here," he said. "Don't quit now, just when I decided to keep you company."

She did not move. "All right," she said. The water was not that cold, but her teeth were chattering. "All right. I'll stay—for a few minutes."

He relaxed, turning loose of her. "You live near here, Connie?"

She moved her head toward the cove. "Back there. Just a little ways."

He stared at her boldly, appraisingly. "You're a mighty pretty girl to live way out here. I been a lot of places, and seen a lot of girls. But I can't recollect ever seeing a prettier." He lifted one hand to touch her cheek. "Not even with her hair down wet and hanging in her face."

She flinched away from the feel of his hand. "Don't," she said sharply.

He smiled, but the casualness did not reach into his eyes. "Doggone," he said, "you're a pretty thing. Reckon a feller could take you to see a picture show tonight?"

She tossed her head, turning full face toward him. "I don't think so. I don't think my husband would like it."

They were going to be magic words, making him disappear out of her sight. But he did not move. There was only a brightening in his eyes.

"No husband smart enough to get a good-looking woman like you ought to let her go swimming by herself," Ceram said.

She felt his hand touch her under the water. "Don't!" she said sharply. "Don't you ——"

But she did not move. His other arm went around her body, holding them together, and she could feel the strength and tautness of his legs.

"Don't!" She turned her head against his chest, hiding her face, feeling the trembling weakness paralyzing her will.

"All right, baby," Ceram said. His voice was low, husky. "All right, honey. Come on, honey."

She followed him out of the water numbly, clambering up the bank, telling herself that it wasn't true, it wasn't going to happen, she couldn't do this to Jesse John.

They moved back into the trees along the path, Ceram walking ahead of her, not even turning to look until he stopped and reached to pull her down on the ground.

Then he jerked away, startled into coldness. In the same instant a voice spoke out, "What's going on here?"

She sat upright and saw Knox standing over them. His hands were clenched tight and hard against his sides and she could see the angry grind of his teeth under hard lips.

"Look, mister," Ceram said. He was already on his feet. "Look, mister, I ——"

Knox advanced on him, his hands lifting. Ceram turned, starting to run, and Knox sprang, dropping him to the earth with ground-jarring suddenness. Ceram started getting up and Knox helped him, grabbing the bib of his overalls.

"You get out of here. You hear me? Get straight on out of here."

He hit Ceram again and shoved him away. Ceram stumbled.

"Look, mister," he said, "I just ——"

"Get on," Knox said. "Don't tell me about it. Just get on."

Connie sat staring at the two of them. Then Knox turned to her. "Slut," he said. "I ought to ——"

He moved toward her and she shrank away from him. "I couldn't help it," she said wildly. "I couldn't, I tell you. I ——"

"No," he said, "I guess you couldn't help the way you was born. But help it or not, I'm going to march you to the house and show you to Jesse John the way you are."

"Don't tell him," she said in agony.

"He's my brother," he said grimly. "I don't have the right to hide from him what I seen."

She straightened up, her voice flaring. "You got a right to talk. You started it, Knox Dunbar. You was the first. That's why I married Jesse John, just so I could be in the same house. Just so I could see you."

He did not believe her. And yet he had to believe. He remembered the way she had watched him after those few nights together. "You shouldn't have married Jesse John, then," he said, more quietly, standing still and looking somberly down at her. "All right," he said at last. "I won't see Jesse John again. I'm leaving the cove right now. I'm going to work for the TVA."

"You're leaving?" she said. "You're not going to be ——"

"No," he said. His voice tightened, rasping. "But let me tell you one thing, Connie. If I hear even one whisper about you and any other man, I'll come back. And I'll destroy you as my brother's wife. You hear me?"

"Yes," she said. "I hear you."

He moved a step closer to her. "And I'm going to make sure you remember it. I'm going to punish you. Just as if I was Jesse John."

His hand swung at her, slapping against her tender flesh, and she cried out. He lifted the hand again, hitting her with the open palm, catching her on her hip as she writhed. His hand was hard, horny with callus, and tears sprang into her eyes. He hit her again and then again.

Then he turned and started away. "Jesse John loves you, Connie," he said. "I wish you'd remember that. I've never seen a man love his wife the way he does."

Miss Hattie was up in the grape tree when she saw Rice come out of the woods and across the fields toward Matthew and the slowly moving team of mules. Miss Hattie had become a people watcher, abandoning the childish pursuits that had occupied her before. Her favorite subject was Connie. But this morning Connie was staying in her room, had not even come out for breakfast.

Miss Hattie climbed down from the tree and went along the path toward the creek, intending to go on to the field. But while she was balanced in the middle of the foot log she saw Connie walk by on the road, going toward the head of the cove. Miss Hattie came quickly off the log and paralleled the road in underbrush, keeping Connie in sight, waiting for whatever would be revealed.

Connie felt heavy-eye tired today, as though the sleep had not rested her. She had remained in the bed after Jesse John had arisen, feigning sleep until he had left the room. But she had lingered a long time after, trying to deny the decision in her, until at last she had stood up. She had thrown on an old house dress and a pair of shoes with run-down heels and there was no lipstick and powder on her face. Without the coloring her lips looked pale, but today she did not need beauty.

She came to the heading where the cove road angled into the dirt road going downriver toward town. For more than a quarter of a mile she walked in tree shade. She came out suddenly into the harsh straight line of clearing and stopped. She shaded her hand over her eyes and looked ahead. She could see the men working out there, not too far from the road. She stood a moment, watching, then she walked out slowly into the sunlight. She put a swing into her hips as she walked.

She was almost past before Ceram saw her, recognizing her instantly, and it stunned into him like the fist of an angry man.

He did not stop to remember that these men lived in this area and that they would immediately recognize her. He stood and watched, then folded up the time book and stuffed it into his shirt pocket. He went away from the men, angling across the new-cleared ground toward the place where she had disappeared into the trees.

He reached the woods, afraid that she had gone on. But she was waiting for him just inside the covering shelter of the woods.

"You've got to take me away," she said.

He stopped, frightened by her words. "What's the matter? What happened?"

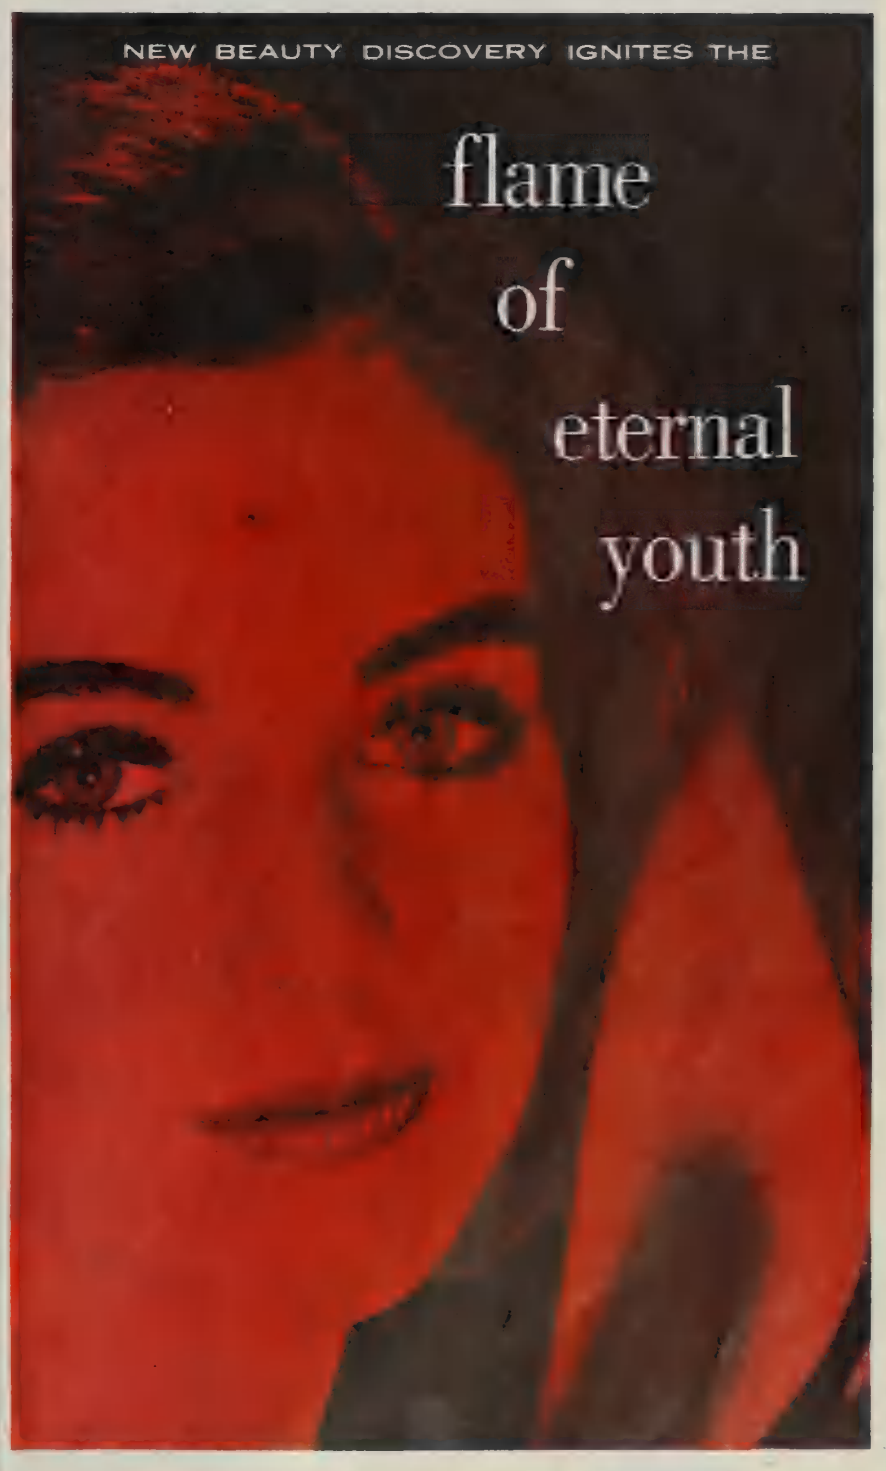
She looked at him, her face pale, almost drawn in the harsh light. Her eyes were large, open, looking at him and seeing the slant of his face, the bulk and heft of his shoulders.

"He nearly killed me," she said. "He was going to kill me, but—but his brother stopped him. You've got to take me away."

Ceram stood watching her. "I can't take you anywhere. I'll be working here for a long time. He'll be sure to find us."

"This isn't the only dam in the world," she said steadily. "A man like you can find work anywhere." She opened the front of the house dress. "Look."

There was a harsh bruise there and she looked down at it herself, remembering the weight and fall of Knox's hand. She drew a deep breath, shudderingly.



"He was going to kill me," she said. "And he will kill me if I go back."

Ceram did not even see the bruise. He saw only the breast, the shamelessness of her baring.

She closed the house dress again and came to him. "I've been thinking," she said. "All night I've been thinking ——" She was treming and his arms were holding her. "You're ing to take me away? You're going to ——"

He was not even thinking of the men, of the npossibility of going back to face them. He as thinking of the woman, the blaze in her, nd in all his bold years there had never been a oman come to him as she had come.

"Yes," he said. "I'll take you. God knows I take you."

Miss Hattie had listened to the talk, hearing e words clear and sharp. Without knowing e was moving, she whirled and ran away om them, fleeing out of the tangle of woods. he did not stop until she had circled through ees all the way into the safety of the cove. hen she approached the house from the back, ing through the barn. A voice reached for r and she turned, looking at Jesse John, his ms full of shucked corn.

"Did Connie get up yet, Miss Hattie?"

She took her eyes away from his unaware ce, looking down at her dusty bare feet. Yes," she said. "I saw her this morning."

Jesse John dumped the armload of ears nd started back to the crib. "I didn't know here she'd got to," he said. "What has she een doing with herself?"

Miss Hattie stared into his face. There was o way she could lie. He would know from e sound of her voice that she was lying. Don't make me tell you, Jesse John," she id. "Don't make me be the one to tell you."

He turned sharply toward her. "What do ou mean? What are you talking about?"

But he was looking at her and he did not ave to hear the speaking of the words. "She ent off with another man," she said. "I saw er. I followed her down the road until she et him and I heard them talking and then . . . e went off with him."

Her arm was thin under his sudden grip. How long have you known about it?" he id. "How long without saying a word ——"

She writhed under the harsh strength of his and. "I didn't know." She was crying. "I idn't, Jesse John. I swear I didn't."

He had never hurt her before in her life. He ad never hurt anyone. But the gentleness as jerked and shaken in him now and he did ot doubt the truth of the saying. He sat down n the open doorway of the corncrib, putting is hands over his face.

"I knew she'd do it," he said, his voice reaking on the individual lump of each word. I knew it from the day she married me, but I ouldn't believe it."

Miss Hattie went to him, putting her hand n his head. She felt very wise and womanly. You couldn't help it. It ain't your fault."

He lifted his head. "No man could love her e way I do. No man could treat her with the oodness I tried to treat her with."

Miss Hattie stopped, bewildered. "Maybe oodness ain't enough. Maybe it takes ore ——" She stopped, feeling young again, e acquired wisdom and thinking gone. "I on't know," she said shrilly. "How do you xpect me to know? You're the grown."

She ran away from him toward the house, rying, the sun blinding in her eyes.

In the barn, Jesse John waited until the nawing would be gone out of his mind. But it id not go; and after a while in desperation he ose, going toward the field, walking with the tiff, stumping steps of an old man.

He met Matthew and Rice coming to dinner. Papa," he said, "I come looking for you."

"What's the matter?" Matthew said in immediate alarm.

Jesse John's face was naked to Matthew's eeing. "Connie has left me," he said. His oice was blunt and heavy with the words.

It was not a surprise to Matthew; he had nown the restlessness and uncertainty in her. It was one of those TVA men," he said.

Jesse John shook his head. "I don't know. I idn't even know she ——"

Matthew put his hand on his shoulder. "No an can keep a woman that don't want to be ept. No man in the world."

Jesse John's face hardened into stubborn ines. "I'm going after her. I'm going to find er and bring her back."

"You still want her? After another man ad laid his hand on her?"

Jesse John nodded his head, ashamed. "I love her, papa. I've got to go find her."

Matthew studied him. "If you feel like you got to go," he said slowly, "I'm not going to try to stop you." He felt his voice choke up and he coughed, clearing his throat. "I'd have told Knox the same thing, if he'd stopped to ask me. You're men now. You know your own mind."

Jesse John turned away. "I didn't aim to leave you. I've just got to find her now."

Matthew put his hand on his shoulder again. It was an unaccustomed closeness between them. "Go on," he said. "But come back when you can. I'm gonna need a man to follow after me one of these days. Don't forget that."

"I'll come," Jesse John said. "I promise you that, papa. After I'm done looking."

It is difficult for two men to gather a crop planted by four. Matthew worked harder that fall than he had ever worked in his memory to keep up with the ripening of cotton and corn. Rice worked with him, as steadily.

Their only visitor was Crawford Gates. He came at least once a week, usually on Saturday to take Arlis to the movies in town. Matthew was civil with him, but the first friendliness was gone between them. He felt a tensing within him when Crawford was in the cove, awaiting momentarily the renewed assault upon his defenses. But it did not come. Crawford visited, apparently, only to court Arlis.

There are rituals for fall: the quick stoop and snatch after cotton, the splitting of stovewood dried from the summer's cutting, the cry of geese in the night going overhead from north to south. Then in November came the richest ritual of them all. Matthew, one night after supper, went to take the mail-order catalogue from the shelf. He brought it back to the table and spread it open. "I reckon it's time to make out our order," he said. "Every one of us is going to need winter clothes."

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

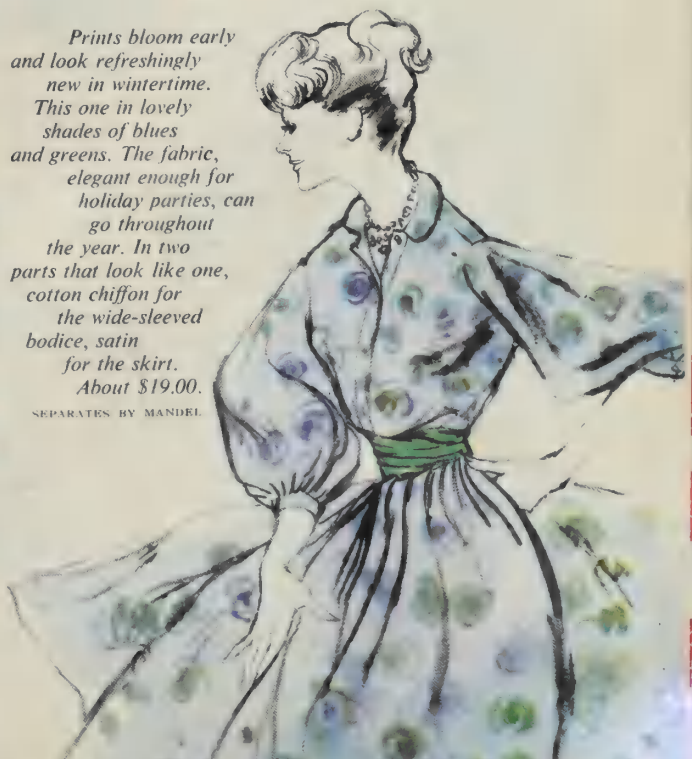
One Romantic dress

Barbara J. feels in a mood to spend a few well-earned fashion dollars, not (no, never) foolishly, but at least fancifully. She feels deserving of a special reward—and an extra-special one at that. After all, she's followed the straight-and-narrow fashion path to a well-rounded wardrobe and accomplished it on the strictest of budgets. The reward—something sparkling, something gay, to make her feel like a million dollars though it may cost only a very few of them.

Shopping in this case is the greatest of pleasures and these are four of Barbara's special favorites. Each one of them seasonless, they will continue on long after the last of the holiday parties. Her final choice is completely fanciful, but by now we know Barbara well enough to feel assured it fits perfectly into the whole scheme of things.

By BET HART

Pretty by candlelight, on a dance floor or in repose. Perhaps it is just the candlelight-and-lace romanticism which makes Barbara succumb to this special one. (Practicality-wise, we suspect it was due to the perfection of fit and the fact that it was particularly becoming to her.) Barbara wears it with its own pink cummerbund, adds a rose. A pretty contrast under her red coat, and she can wear her red sandals or, less formally, black pumps. $12.95.



DRESS BY VIRGINIA SPEARS

The most classic: a slim white reed of a dress. A perfect basic to change appearances for a party-a-night whirl with a different accessory each evening. The fabric, rayon ottoman; and the color—or lack of it—gives the dress its unadorned elegance. $10.95.

Soft crepe drapes beautifully into one of the most graceful of all silhouettes. The bodice is of tiny pleats with a wide square neckline. A matching satin cummerbund cinches in the waistline and makes the line of the gathered skirt appear even more fluid. $22.95.

DRESS BY ELAINE NOYES

Prints bloom early and look refreshingly new in wintertime. This one in lovely shades of blues and greens. The fabric, elegant enough for holiday parties, can go throughout the year. In two parts that look like one, cotton chiffon for the wide-sleeved bodice, satin for the skirt. About $19.00.

SEPARATES BY MANDEL

He saw the brightening and the quickening in their faces as they leaned toward him. "All right," he said. "Start telling me what you want, and I'll tell you what you can have."

Arlis put her hands together. "I'm going to need some things for the house," she said. "A new coffeepot, for one thing."

He looked at her, teasing. "How about some pretty clothes?"

She blushed. "I don't need any new clothes. Maybe a house dress or two—the ones I've got are faded by now."

Matthew laughed. "The price of cotton was better this year," he said. "So everybody gets something they don't need."

He turned open the book to the men's wear. "I'll start putting down papa first," he said. "He'll have to have some new overalls and shirts. Two pairs of long underwear too." He began writing carefully on the order blank. "What about you, Rice?"

"I need an overall jumper," Rice said. "I'd like one of them blanket-lined ones. And a pair of shoes."

The sound of the motor was loud in the stillness and Matthew, looking at Arlis, saw the change come into her face.

"It's Crawford," she said. "I recognize ——" She stopped, looking away from Matthew.

They all waited until the motor cut off, the door slammed, and then they heard Crawford's voice saying, "Hello, hello."

Matthew looked back at the catalogue in front of him. "We'll finish it tomorrow," he said.

Arlis led Crawford into the kitchen. Crawford was talking rapidly, his face lit with excitement. "Hello, Mr. Dunbar," he said. "He won. He won again."

"You didn't expect him to lose, did you?" Matthew said.

"Who won?" Rice said.

"Roosevelt!" Crawford said. "Landon didn't get anywhere. Roosevelt landslided him right out of existence."

"You sound like you was worried about it," Matthew said. "Shucks, you could have walked the coves for half a day and found out that Landon didn't have a chance."

Crawford sat down at the table. "TVA can go forward now. We know that we'll have the money and the support we need to finish the job. If the election had gone the other way, TVA would have been stopped."

"Maybe I should have voted for Landon, then," Matthew said mildly. "The TVA has only come to hurt me. That would be my own personal and true interest, to help stop the TVA."

Crawford watched him. "You don't really mean that," he said. "I can tell by looking at you that you don't mean it."

Matthew sat still. "Yesterday Roosevelt was elected again," he said. "And today you come with hurry and clamor to finish the job you're hired to do. The orders do come down fast, don't they?"

Crawford moved his hands impatiently. "It's not the election," he said. He stopped, holding his lips tight together. Then he burst on. "Sir, I've been sticking my neck out for you in that office all summer long. I've been telling them that you'd come to your senses. We've already bought out just about everybody but you. They knew that when the dam came they'd have to sell out, find another home and another farm where they could enjoy the benefits. All except you. You sat back here in Dunbar's Cove uninterested in what was going on outside and said, 'I don't want nothing to do with it!'"

"Son," Matthew said, "no man has ever talked to me in no such a way. What gives you the right to come into a man's house and ——"

Crawford stood up. "I got the right, Matthew. Because I've bet my job on you. I've stood before my boss' desk telling him that if I couldn't do it without resort to force or violence or law, I'd hand him my job."

"You oughtn't to have done that," Matthew said. There was a quickening harshness in his voice. "I didn't ask for your help. You didn't have the right to put me under obligation to you. For that reason I don't feel no obligation."

Crawford turned, looking up at Arlis. "I didn't do it for you," he said. "Well, partly, I guess. But mostly for Arlis."

Matthew, too, looked up at Arlis. "Did you ask him to do it?"

"No," Arlis said. "I didn't ask him."

Matthew looked back at Crawford and for a moment anger blazed in his face. "Crawford," he said, "I stand where I stood the day you first walked into this cove. I've got one job, and one job alone on this earth. I come here to save and preserve, not to destroy and to tear away. It was given to me to manage Dunbar's Cove for a generation, and to choose the one it'll pass to after I'm gone. With all that in back of me, you walk into the cove with a new idea and a piece of paper in your hand and expect me to lay down, on your say-so alone, what I was put here to do."

Crawford said quickly, "It's a new idea, I'll admit, that a farming man can live an easy, town kind of life, with electricity to do his work for him, and indoor toilets, and tractors to take the toil out of his life. That his land can be held against the erosion of wind and rain and protected against the tearing away of floods. That his crops and his produce can go cheaper to market with river transportation all up and down the whole length of the river. But it's a real idea, too, as real as Dunbar's Cove. Dunbar's Cove is an idea for one man. TVA is for the whole country. TVA is bigger ——"

"Bigness don't make right," Matthew said stubbornly. "Law don't make right." He stopped, glaring at Crawford. "And you might as well quit talking about all you've done for me. As far as I'm concerned, you ain't done a thing. It don't stir me none because I didn't ask you to do it."

"I didn't do it for you," Crawford yelled out of exasperation. "I did it for Arlis. I did it because I love her and I want to marry her and I ——"

His words stopped in the heavy silence. Matthew was looking at Arlis, saw the change and shift in her face, the quickly suppressed glow.

"Did you know about this?" he said.

"He never said it," Arlis said. "He never said it, before this minute."

"Crawford Gates," Matthew said, "let me tell you something. You walked into this cove on a day last spring. A day when my son Knox had not gone away to work for the TVA, at public wages day by day, a hired hand. My daughter-in-law Connie had not followed the wanting of her desire with a stranger-man come flaunting his money and his travels and his wildness before her, tolling my son Jesse John in search of her. And Arlis; on that day of your coming she was happy here at home, doing the work her mamma left her to do. She was contented with her daddy, she didn't have to oppose him as she's doing now on your account, putting a distance between us that's never been between us before. That's it, Crawford. This is the thing you've done in the few short months since your first coming. Is this the goodness you're talking about, the rightness and the power of the TVA?"

"I couldn't have done it, Matthew," Crawford said, "if it hadn't been already in them. You can't stop change. You've got to go along with it, shaping and guiding it."

"I'm keeping Dunbar's Cove like it is. You can talk all night, and you can't change my way and my mind on that."

"But you can't even do that," Crawford said. "I didn't have to risk my job, the best job I've ever had or ever will have, on your account. Or even on Arlis'. Because when the time comes the TVA can take your land, whether you like it or not. We don't want to do that, but we can if we have to. We'll pay you what it's worth. But we can take it with the paying."

Matthew's face flushed. "You lie," he said. "No government can take a man's ——"

"Yes," Crawford said. "There's a procedure for it. The property can be condemned for the common good, the right appraised amount paid over, and it's no longer yours."

Matthew moved around the table. "Get out of here," he said. "Don't set your foot in this cove again."

"It won't do any good," Crawford said. "You can't ——"

"Get out," Matthew said. "This is my house. This is my land. And I'm telling you to get your feet off my dirt once and for all."

"But Arlis ——"

"I don't care ——"

"Papa," Arlis said, "I love Crawford. I hadn't told him either." Her voice was shaky and uncertain. "But I love him, papa."

Matthew drew a long breath. "That don't change my mind," he said. "Go away from here, Crawford. Go on now. I'm telling you for the last time."

Crawford turned and went out the door, without a word, into the darkness.

The horn blew the following night before they had finished the mail order. Matthew had come into the house from the barn to find Arlis bending over the stove.

"Supper will be ready in a minute, papa," she had said. "You've just got time to wash up."

The coldness had gone out from around them. The kitchen was cheerful and there had been a burst of laughter at the table. It was quickly subdued, with furtive glances at Matthew sitting somber in his accustomed place, but he had lifted his head and smiled.

Then the horn blew. It was two quick staccato blasts, sweeping into the cove from the far road.

Arlis looked at Matthew. She stood up. "I'll be back," she said. Her voice was quiet, assured as always. "I won't be long."

She gave him time for forbiddance. He looked at her, knowing that she would go against the sound of his voice, and so he did not speak.

Arlis went quickly down the road toward the head of the cove. She saw headlights and stepped out into the beam of light so he could see her. He opened the door and stepped out, putting his arms around her. He laid his face against hers.

"You meant it," he said. "You meant what you said last night."

She drew away. "Of course," she said. "I wouldn't have said it if ——"

He stopped the words. His lips were cold against hers, chill from the touch of air from the north.

"Let's get in the car. I've got a heater."

She slid under the wheel to the other side. He rolled up the glass and the car quickly became comfortable.

He turned toward her, touching her shoulder. "I didn't know whether you'd come," he said. "Whether you could even hear me."

"I heard," she said quietly. "Papa heard too."

"What are we going to do?" He reached out for her and she came quickly into his arms again. "Why didn't you ever tell me before? All this long summer I've ——"

She laughed softly. "You didn't tell me either."

"I was scared to. I was downright scared to even ——"

"Me too," she said. "Of course, a girl ——"

They laughed and his arms held her tighter. After a moment she drew away. Their mood changed from the recognition and acceptance of love and her voice was sober when she spoke again.

"What are we going to do, Crawford?"

"Get married," he said, wondering how he could say the words so calmly. "Waiting won't help matters any—it'll just make it worse. Don't even go back there, Arlis. Leave with me tonight."

She shook her head. "I can't. Knox left him. Jesse John left him. And then me."

He turned. "He can't keep the cove separate from the world to the end of time, Arlis. You've got a right to live your own life. Doesn't he realize that?"

"I've got a duty just like papa has," Arlis said. "It's my job to clean and cook and scrub. I've done it since mamma died—and if I didn't do it ——"

"There's Miss Hattie. She's as old as you were when you took on the job."

She shook her head. "It's not the same. She wouldn't know how to do it. What's going to happen, Crawford? Will he ——"

"Yes," Crawford said harshly. "He'll lose the cove. In the end he'll have to give it up. There's no way to change that."

She turned in his arms. "But do you have to be the one?"

"No," he said. "I could quit my job. They'd put another man in my place, and it would go on. I don't want to drop out, Arlis." He looked at her in the darkness. "I can't quit any more than he can."

She moved out of his arms. "What's a woman to do when she loves her daddy and ——"

"Make a choice," Crawford said quickly. "She's got to make her choice and stick by it."

She shook her head. "I can't," she said. "I can't. I love you, Crawford. I said it in proudness, and I meant it. But if I went with you, not a soul in this world could say what Matthew Dunbar might do. I just can't let him be driven that far."

"Then"—Crawford took a deep breath—"I'm not going to see you again?"

"You can't come to the house," she said quickly. "But every time you blow your horn, I'll be down here." She laughed. "Even if I have to leave the dirty dishes in the dishpan."

He took her again in his arms. They kissed, and kissed again until Arlis drew away, opening the door on her side, and the cold wind swirled into the car. She slipped out onto the roadway and waved to him and went quickly away back up the cove.

Rice was the last now. He stayed with Matthew in the fields, working as hard and as long as he did. And he liked it, Matthew knew. He liked the feel of the plow in his hand, the curl of the earth over the shiny wing.

I could have a worse choosing, Matthew thought, looking upon his youngest son. He pushed the thinking away and concentrated on the plowing, absorbing himself into the rhythm and the swing of the work. He passed and repassed Rice.

Finally he stopped for a rest and led the mule into the shade of a tree. The mule was bellowsing his sides, and sweat was black on his flanks. Rice pulled up beside his father and stopped, grinning.

"You gonna work that mule down to a nub, papa," he said.

Matthew laughed. "He goes on four feet, while I just go on two. He ought to outlast me." He squatted down on his heels and started rolling a cigarette. "Better give your own a little rest, too, son."

"Yes, sir." Rice hawed the mule into the shade and sat down to shake out his shoes. "We ought to get through with this field before very long, now."

"Yes," Matthew said. He lit the cigaret and stuck the flaming match into the earth, quenching it immediately. "Son, you're eighteen years old now and you're doing a man's work—have been for some time."

Rice stiffened against the strange gravity of the words. "Yes, sir," he said.

"You know, I reckon, that when Jesse John and Knox come eighteen I started paying them their share for the work they done. I ain't done that for you as yet—I've just given you pocket money now and again."

Rice started to smile, then saw that it was too soon for joy and stopped the smiling quickly. "Yes, sir," he said. "I'd be mighty proud to have my own money."

Matthew went on. "You're due your share. In fact, you're overdue. I figure I owe you for last fall, too, when we had that crop together all to ourselves. So you'll have a fair sum in your hand."

"I thank you, papa," Rice said. "And I'll work hard. I'll ——"

"I know you will," Matthew said quickly. "You ain't never slacked on me yet, Rice. You can do as you see fit with your own money. You can spend it on women like Knox did, you can squirrel it away—or you can buy yourself some dairy stock ——"

"Papa!" Rice said. "Papa ——"

Matthew lifted a hand. "If you got the desire to handle dairy stock with your own money, I won't say a word to stop you. You can pasture them with my beef calves. I'll even give you corn-and-hay acreage to raise their feed on—acreage you'll have to work by yourself."

Rice stood up. "I'll have me a barn," he said. "A big, heated barn, like I've seen in the pictures in the Progressive Farmer. I'll stall them cows, and milk by electricity, and I'll have me a truck to deliver. I'll buy Holsteins—they're the best milkers ——" He stopped, turning toward Matthew. "Papa, I ——" He choked on the words.

Matthew stood up too. Carefully he put out the cigarette. "I don't reckon you'll do all that tomorrow," he said. "But you can get yourself a couple of milkers for a starter. You can strain the milk and have the milk truck pick it up every morning. They'll leave you a check every two weeks and with your check ——" He shrugged his shoulders, going to the plow. "Why, maybe by the time I'm ready to set down like your grandpaw, you will have that big barn and all them fine cows."

He wouldn't lose Rice now—there wouldn't be any way to lose him. He turned the mule and plowed away very quickly.

Rice was awakened by a sound. He came awake quickly, wondering about the day and the sound and the instant stir of anticipation. Then he sat up in bed, knowing and recognizing at the same time. The sound was the boom of dynamite. He jumped out of bed and slipped on an old pair of overalls, running down the dogtrot and toward the swimming hole in the creek. The water was cold, chill with the night, and he shivered with the sudden plunge. He came out of the water, dried himself with the old overalls, and put them on to wear back to his room. There he dressed in slacks and an open-necked shirt, and went into the kitchen. Breakfast was on the table and he slipped into his place.

Matthew looked at him wryly. "You gonna get them pretty clothes mighty dirty, plowing in them."

Rice looked up at him, grinning. "I didn't have it in mind, sir, to work today. I'm going to a stock sale to buy my first cow."

Matthew laughed. "Yesterday I make a partner of you and today you quit on me."

Rice frowned. "I'll be there tomorrow and every day after that. It's just that today ——"

Matthew stopped him with his hand. "I reckon I can get along without you," he said. "I've got that money I owe you."

Matthew took out the long purse and opened it. His fingers dug out the roll of bills and slowly counted them on the table. Rice watched avidly while Matthew picked them up, and at last handed them to him.

"There you are," he said. "You're gonna ve to work awhile before you get any more."
"Yes, sir," Rice said, staring down at the oney. "I ain't never had a pile of money like it in my whole life."
"Well, don't spend it all on one cow," Matew said, starting out the kitchen door.
"But that's just what I aim to do," Rice said. ne real fine cow. A registered Holstein."
He ate his breakfast hurriedly and went out the house. He cut away from the road, goig up over the thickety hill. He did not see e cluster of men far away at the other edge the clearing until their shouting voices ached to him. He stopped, seeing them, and ped up on a stump, waving to answer their eeting. He heard the shouts, the sharp, terying whistle, and saw the red flags. Somehere near him a stump erupted suddenly into e air and then another, closer, and earth owered over him. He looked down, beildered, and saw the thin curl of smoke from e sticks of dynamite.
He had just time to recognize them before e fresh morning world blew up in his face.

Crawford got into his car, driving toward e cove. The sun was high in the sky, burning it, and even in the movement of the car he s sweating. He parked the car at the head of e cove and started walking up the dirt road.
"Howdy, Crawford," Matthew said.
Crawford whirled, seeing Matthew sitting der a tree up on the close slope of the hill. e was smoking a cigarette and the smoke ibbled grayly between his fingers, going aight up in the hot noon stillness of the air.
Crawford turned off the road and tramped ough the dusty grass. "I heard about Rice," said, "too late to come to the burying."
"Yes," Matthew said. "I figured you didn't ar ——"
Crawford looked at him closely. "I hope u don't blame us for it, Matthew. The TVA, mean."
Matthew shifted his hands. "That would easy, wouldn't it?" he said slowly. "It uld make everything the easiest in the rld. You can hate, if you can hate, without y holding back."
"It's a hard thing to bear," Crawford said. wful hard. I ——"
"I've got to bear it," Matthew said. "Just e I got to make the crop by myself now. A an can do what's necessary."
Crawford sat down on the ground, putting s back against a sapling. "You need someody to help with that crop, all right. It's a g place you've got here."
"Jesse John will be back before long. I ok for him before gathering time. He's a od worker too. You can depend on him."
Crawford looked at him curiously, hearing e intensity of the words, and he found himf hoping that it was true. "Matthew," he id, "next spring that dam will be closed."
Matthew's head snapped around and Crawrd held up his hand. "Listen to me. I'm going to find you a piece of land that's better than here. And I want you to promise me to come and look at it. If you don't like it, I'll find another one. There's bound to be one farm that you'll like well enough to give up this senseless hanging on against the TVA."
Matthew stared at the cove. "There's just one thing wrong with that," he said. "Any other land you'll find has borne the names of other men. Only this land is Dunbar, has always been Dunbar. And that makes it different from all the other land." He laughed suddenly. "So you just wear yourself out looking, son. I'll go with you when you say the word. But I'll tell you here and now, you'll never take me away from my own."
The words made a freedom in him. He wasn't afraid of Crawford any more. He knew that Crawford had tried to take Arlis away from him. But she had not left him; and now she never would. With his plan, there was no need to fear either Crawford, or the TVA, or both together.
Matthew leaned over and slapped Crawford on the knee. "Yes, sir," he said, "I'll do anything you say." He smiled. "In fact, I don't see any reason why you should court Arlis down there in the car. Come on and sit up on the porch like respectable folks."
Crawford studied Matthew. "I'm glad to see you've decided the right way," he ventured. "We'll find that land together, and then I'll bring the papers for you to sign. You'll be able to finish this crop and next winter you can move in plenty of time to get your new place ready ——"
"Move!" Matthew said. He stood up, sweeping an arm to point at the head of the cove. "You see that narrow neck of land, where the hills come down so close? Come laying-by time, I'll take a team of mules and hook 'em to a scraper. I'll lay me a high dirt dam all across the mouth of that cove. Who's talking about moving?"
Crawford, astonished, stood up, looking where Matthew was pointing. "You don't mean it. You can't mean to ——"
Matthew whirled. "I'll tell you I mean it," he said. "You're the one that's scared now, Crawford. All this time I've been walking in fear and trembling because of you and the TVA. But now I've got something to do, that I can do with my own two hands. I'm gonna build that earth dam high and tight and when the TVA water starts rising, I'll sit snug behind my own dam and laugh at all of you."
"You can build your earth dam all right," Crawford said. "But what are you going to do about the creek? If you dam it up, you'll flood yourself out. And if you don't, your dam won't do you a bit of good."
He walked away quickly, leaving Matthew dumfounded. He had overlooked the problem of the creek.
"I'll still do it!" he hollered. "I'll make it work. I'll cost you your job yet." Crawford had reached the road and was walking toward his car. He turned and waved and walked on.

Matthew finished the laying-by and still Jesse John had not returned. Matthew was not satisfied with this laying-by as he usually was, for he didn't really finish so much as quit. His crops were grassy, as they had never been, and the perfection of his soul was not satisfied to leave growing grass in his fields. But he had done the best he could. He had come to accept many things at less than their ultimate.
At night he lay in bed half asleep, dozing from his tiredness, and listened to the soft murmur of voices from the front porch where Crawford sat with Arlis. Every night it went on, the soft murmuring, and lilt of laughter, and long silences that were more disturbing than the talk. But he endured it. To forbid, now, would be an admission of weakness. And he trusted Arlis.
Twice Matthew, in the middle of the laying-by, left his plow and started walking up the creek bank. But he had too much work at hand to spend his time in exploration of the dilemma, and each time he turned back. The day after he was through, though, he set out early in the morning determined to search out a solution in the twists and turns of the channeled water.
And he found it. Far back up the slope, where the creek was very narrow, he found a place to suit his purpose. The creek bank was

● There are some days in San Francisco traffic court, Judge William A. O'Brien told a reporter recently, when he is reminded of a cartoon tucked away in his desk drawer. It shows an automobile crumpled against a tree and its irate lady driver snapping at a startled man in the adjoining house, "You the owner of that stupid tree?"

Judge O'Brien said he knew just how that man must have felt because many of the women offenders brought before him take that same attitude—"Everybody is wrong but me." Worried by the rising number of hit-run drivers—those who clip another car in traffic or crash into a parked car—the judge has been fining heavily in such cases. But some women drivers either don't understand the law, he feels, or have no conscience. One eminently respectable lady, who crashed into a parked car and sped away without leaving her name or address, thought it quite enough to explain, "But I'm a nice person and I have a nice car."

Another "nice" lady, provoked at being haled into court, protested, "But I just knocked a little piece off his fender"—though the repair bill came to $200. Still another excuse was "I didn't know I hit that car," even after witnesses testified the impact resounded two blocks away. A third woman said haughtily, "I'm fully insured"—but she had made no attempt to report the accident.

When the judge finished talking about women drivers, he got around to what he considered the biggest problem on the road today: men. "Take drivers' licenses away from every man aged eighteen to twenty-four," he said quietly, "and we could close traffic court."

high on one side, and the water was fast here. But the other side was low and there was a flood channel, starting out as a shallow sheet erosion and then deepening into a gully.

He explored down the gully, a fear in him that the flood channel would open into the cove. But it did not; the first low roll of ridge bordering the cove ran up high enough, and nearly all the way to the river, a tight, high, narrow swell of land that had never been cultivated. A creek could flow here, making a new way for itself to the river, and he would be rid of it.

He went back to the creek, marveling at the chance structure of the earth that gave the water a choice of ways to the river, wondering why it had chosen the cove when actually that was the more tortuous path. He did not know that David Dunbar, when he had discovered the cove, had turned the creek at exactly this point and that the gully he had found was the old original route.

David Dunbar had done the work in a day's hard labor with a shovel. But now the creek was fast here, too fast, and Matthew would have to lay a firm dam against its strength to turn it. But he had to make it work. Without stopping he went on to the barn, where he hitched up the mules to the wagon and got the ax and the shovel and a pick out of the tool shed. Then he began wrestling the scraper toward the wagon.

Matthew got into the wagon and whipped the mules into motion, making them trot. From the bottom of the cove he had to make a road to the damsite and he slowed the mules, stopping once or twice to cut away saplings that were too big to bend under the axles of the wagon. He was already sweating by the time they reached the place.

Matthew unhitched the team and tied them to the wagon wheels. He took the ax to the bank of the creek, went to a tree as big around as his waist and began chopping it down. He worked furiously, and very quickly the tree crashed down toward the creek.

Matthew brought the second tree down and dragged the trunks to the creek. He trimmed a sharp end on a couple of straight limbs and stuck them upright in the bed of the creek, driving them down with the flat of the ax until they were standing strong against the current. Then he would get out of the water and make more pilings, driving them in a solid, thick row across the width of the creek. The water swirled and boiled around and around the two logs resting against them.

By the time the work was finished it was sundown. Matthew stood looking at the evidences of his labor. There were two rawly new and ax-jagged stumps low on the ground, a pile of brush from the treetops that could be thrown into the dam after enough logs had been added, and in the creek two logs bobbing and threading against the upright piles. It was such an infinitesimal block upon the flow of the creek. But it was large as a beginning. Matthew was satisfied.

It took him almost until gathering time to finish the creek dam. Every morning he was at work by sunup, and he did not quit until almost dark. Day after day he piled logs and brush against the row of stakes. After the logs and the brush were in, he began hauling dirt. He used both teams of mules, alternating them, to pull the scraper. He was taking the dirt out of the flood channel, lowering the level of flow he would have to achieve with each inch of earth removed, and the water was backing up from the dam, coming high and quiet along the bank.

He was lucky with one thing: there were no heavy rains to wash out the entire sum of his daily travail. Behind the dam the water piled up, inch by hard-fought inch, the level coming up steadily as he built the dam higher and higher.

There was still a lot of work to do. But he knew that he had won in this phase. And he had learned a lot about building a dam, enough to know that the greatest task still lay unstarted ahead of him.

He could not possibly do it alone. He would have to have help, a lot of help; and thinking about it, he remembered the men who had come to Rice's funeral. And Jesse John, who would be home soon. For he was more determined than ever now. He was going to win all the way.

He went home and put the mules into the stable. Then he went on to the creek. The flow was stopped completely now. The bed of the creek was muddy, as the water was muddy, and he could see fresh animal tracks crossing where the water had always been before. He went on down the creek to where the backwater from the river began to show, looking to see where the big dam would have to go across.

It would require only work, a lot of work, and soon now he would have to stop to gather the crop. But he could use the time beforehand in rounding up the help he would need, hands and mules and scrapers to pile the earth along the mouth of the cove, damming the entire mouth from shoulder to shoulder of the ridge. He loitered, looking at the area of his endeavor, seeing it in his mind as complete as a ripened field of corn. At last he went out on the road, going toward supper, tired and happy. Headlights swept into the cove and he stopped, seeing it was Crawford's car. Matthew stepped out into the yellow beam, lifting his hand, and Crawford stopped, leaning out the side.

"Mr. Matthew," he said.

"Howdy," Matthew said. "Come here. I want to show you something."

Crawford got out of the car and they went together to the edge of the creek bank. Matthew stood watching Crawford while he looked at the creek. Crawford studied it for a moment, seeing the lowered water level.

"What happened?" he said. "You ——"

"I fixed that creek so I can lay a dam across it," Matthew said triumphantly. "I turned it into a new channel back up yonder so it doesn't flow through the cove at all."

Crawford sat down on the stump where the diving board was fixed. He stared up at Matthew in the darkness. "There just ain't no way to stop you," he said. "No way in this world."

"No," Matthew said, his voice agreeing.

"I've been scouring this countryside," Crawford said, "looking for a place for you to buy. I turned down places in my mind that any man would be proud to own, because I know the way of your thinking. But I finally found one to suit you. I was going to take you there tomorrow."

"I'll go," Matthew said. "But not tomorrow ——" He stopped. Then he went on. "Tell me about it."

Crawford lit a cigarette. "It's a good place," he said. "Good black dirt, well watered, and even bigger than Dunbar's Cove. Fine cotton land, and a good pasture watered with a free stone spring. It's called the Old Outlaw Place."

"Sure," Matthew said. "I know it. Them Outlaws have lived on that land ever since I can remember. His daddy bought it from Snodgrass back before the World War. You want me to go look at it? When?"

"No," Crawford said, the single word admitting defeat. He stood up. "But I'm going to keep right on, all the time you're throwing up your dirt dam against the world and the river. You'll never do it in time. They'll be through building Chickasaw next spring. You can't make a dam all by yourself between now and then. You're setting yourself to the impossible, Matthew."

"I'm not one man," Matthew said stiffly. "I've got kinfolks. They'll come. And Jesse John will be back before too long. There's my brother John and his family. There are Dunbars you've never even heard of who'll come when I call."

It was September before Jesse John found her. He was walking along the dirt street of a dusty construction town, and he was just on the edge of leaving, for he had learned that Ceram Haskins had been here and gone.

He passed a shanty café with a sign that said, "Eats for Gents." He stopped at the door, thinking about eating, and then went on.

Six steps down the street, he stopped. He stood still for a moment and then retraced his steps, looking through the glass panes of the door again. It was her, all right. The corner of his eye had just caught her coming into the café from the kitchen, with a tray of beer bottles.

He went in, threading his way among the tables, and sat down near the back of the room. The walls were rough, scaly with old paint, and the kitchen was closed off by raw new wood. The tables were old and scarred, without tablecloth or napkin. The café was nearly empty; only two men sat at the tables, drinking beer, their voices quiet and droning.

She came out of the kitchen, hurrying toward him without looking. She was plumper than he remembered and she wore more makeup, the lipstick smeared red on her white, tired face. "What'll you have?" she said. Then she saw him and put her hand on her throat as though she might scream.

Jesse John smiled at her. "Hello, Connie," he said. "It's good to see you."

"What are you doing here?" she said.

"Looking for you. What else would I be doing?"

She stood uncertainly, not knowing hat to do. She looked at the order d in her hand and said, "Would you e something to eat?" as though he ere just another customer.

"No," Jesse John said. He looked her reproachfully. "You know hat I want, Connie. You know what come for."

She began to breathe hard, she be- n to be afraid. "Don't start any- ing here, Jesse John," she said. You'll cost me my job if you do. I ed this job, I need it bad."

Jesse John stared at her. "I'm not oing to start anything, honey," he id softly. "I just want you to come ome with me."

The kitchen door opened and the t man, her boss, waddled out, going ehind the counter up toward the cash egister.

"I've followed you all across the ountry." Jesse John smiled again.

The restaurant owner had a deep oice. "Take the man's order," he id to Connie from the cash register. Don't stand there chitter-chattering ll day long."

Connie jumped and moved her ands nervously. She didn't know hat to do.

Jesse John looked across the empty bles. "I'm not ordering," he said ildly. "I just come in to talk to her minute. We're ——"

Mr. Newcomb leered at her. "You'll e off at ten o'clock. You've got until leven o'clock tomorrow to meet your iends." He turned around, search- g. "There's a man up there wanting nother beer."

Jesse John stood up from his chair. I just wanted to see her for a minute, ister."

Mr. Newcomb wheeled toward him, onderous as an elephant. "I don't see dime's worth of food or drink on our table," he said.

Jesse John took Connie's arm. Come on, Connie. You don't have o worry about working here any ore."

Connie struggled her arm away. She ared at Mr. Newcomb appealingly. I'm sorry. I won't let it happen gain."

Jesse John took her arm again, rmly this time. "Come on," he said. Let's go."

Mr. Newcomb went away toward e cash register. "Go on," he said. I don't need any notice. I can get nother girl by nightfall."

Connie tried to follow after him, and en she quit the struggle. "My oney," she said. "You owe me ——"

Mr. Newcomb did not even turn. I don't pay for short weeks," he said. Go on with your boy friend."

Connie let Jesse John lead her to- ard the door.

"She's my wife, mister."

"Wife or woman, get her out of my lace of business," Mr. Newcomb aid without looking up. "Go on, ow."

They went out into the glare of sun- hine. "It doesn't matter," Jesse John old Connie. "We'll be going home ow, anyway."

She stopped in the middle of the treet, beginning to cry. "But I can't. don't want to go home with you."

Jesse John's hand clutched cruelly t her arm so that she flinched. "I've een hunting for you and hunting for ou, all this time. You don't say that."

She put her hand on her face, wip- ng away the tears. "I can't. I won't go back with you," she said. "I better talk to Mr. Newcomb right now. Maybe he'll give me back my job."

"But you don't need to, Connie."

She lifted her voice. "I'm not going back to the cove. You hear me?"

Jesse John believed it then. He put his hands down at his sides, staring at her. "That man," he said slowly. "Ceram Haskins."

She shook her head. "He's gone. He's left me already. Just picked up and gone."

"You see," he said, "there's nothing to hold you back. Nothing at all."

"Yes there is. I'm fixing to have a baby."

He looked at her, oblivious of the people passing by and turning to look curiously at them. He took her arm and they walked slowly on, Jesse John staring down at the ground. He had not expected this; somehow he had believed she would be the same as the day she had left, unchanged, as he was unchanged in his travels, by her experience with Ceram Haskins. He felt a sickening jealousy. He fought it within himself as he walked silently by her side. They came to the older part of the town and passed the bus station and Jesse John turned back, guiding her, and went inside. They sat down on a bench and by that time he had fought down the hurt and anger.

"Then why ——" he said.

"I told him about it," she said bitterly. "And he left that night."

Jesse John was all right now. He thought about the anguish of her aloneness with the child in her belly, the almost insuperable problem of having it alone, without a man to tend and support her.

"It's all right now, Connie," he said. "It'll be mine, too, because it's yours. Nobody will ever know the difference. Not even the baby."

Connie's eyes brimmed again. She stared at Jesse John through the haze of tears. "You'd take his child? And me again, after ——"

He put his hand on hers. "That's what I come for. You're my wife, Connie. I want you to keep on being my wife."

She bowed her head over their hands so he could not see into her face. "Jesse John," she said helplessly. "Jesse John."

He felt her voice, and he knew that he had won. The rest did not matter. "I'll find when the next bus leaves. And we'll be on it. We'll be home in the cove before you know it."

She thought of the cove, of Arlis, and the inquisitive eyes of Miss Hattie. And her own father and mother, all the people who knew that she had left with a stranger-man. Her shoulders crumpled again. "I can't go there," she said. "Don't you see I can't?"

He put his hand on her shoulder. "Why?"

She lifted her head. "Do you want me to live my life holding myself against the people who know?" she said, a whimpering in her voice. "Do you think I can stand them looking at me, knowing they're thinking how I run off with another man and came back with a baby that was mighty quick for the time that Jesse John found me again? Every time they lay eyes on me, they'll think it."

"But it won't make any difference," Jesse John protested. "Let them think. You and me are the only ones who matter."

Her hands clutched at his arms, and she buried her face in his shoulder. "I can't face it," she sobbed. "I just can't face it."

Jesse John held her, working his way laboriously to an understanding. He had always meant to return. That had been the simple plan from the beginning: to have Connie, and be home again in the cove where they belonged.

He turned to Connie. "I'll stay with you," he said. "We'll make our home right here."

She could not accept this final saying. She had watched his face, and she knew the struggle. "No," she said. "You want to be back there. That's where you belong to be."

He smiled at her tenderly. He put his arms around her, pulling her close. "I need to be where you are," he said. "Where you can live and be happy. That's all that counts."

As Matthew drove off the square he remembered the post office. He stopped the car, parking it, and walked around to check his box. He got the mail and walked to the writing counter. His hands stopped suddenly, seeing the letter and knowing the handwriting immediately, though he had never received a letter from Jesse John in his life. He opened the flap and took out the single sheet of paper:

Dear Papa: I have been meaning to write for some time but have not been able to get around to it. I hope you are well. We are fine here, and I have a good job.

I run up on Connie the other day and everything is all right. After talking it over, we have decided it would be best if we did not come back there, especially since I have a very good job here at steady pay. Yesterday I made a down payment on a house trailer for us to live in as we will have to move from place to place on this work I am doing.

Well, I just wanted to let you know that everything is all right and Connie is happy that I came after her the way I did.

I hope you-all are well. I guess you will be picking cotton by the time you get this. Hug Miss Hattie and Arlis for me, and say hello to Rice and Knox.

Your son,
JESSE JOHN

Crawford came reluctantly to the cove that day, with a reluctance that had grown deeper and deeper with the passage of the winter, so that now he had to force his hands to steer the car in the right direction. Only the thought and the hope of Arlis had kept him coming to the cove at all. He stopped the car outside the earth dam that reached now across the old road, blocking his entrance, and walked up on the piled dirt.

On his right there was a cluster of men and mules, scraping soil from a shoulder of the ridge. Down past him to the creek was a slide road where the slips had passed carrying the dirt. While he watched, a team swung past him, one of John's boys on the reins. Another team crossed them on the return trip. Crawford studied the useless effort, feeling the reluctance mount in him until he wanted to drive away without seeing either Matthew or Arlis. But he could not do this and so he went down off the high pile of dirt, looking for Matthew. He had put it off too long already.

Matthew was wielding a shovel, loading a box mounted on a slide with runners. "Come to help out?" he said, smiling grimly.

Crawford shook his head. "I'd like to talk to you."

Matthew looked around, then back to Crawford. "I ain't got no time to talk," he said. "Go on up to the house. Arlis is probably waiting on you."

GRANDFATHER'S BELIEF

By JANE H. MERCHANT

"Belief," Grandfather Robbins used to say,
"Is knowledge people act upon. It's not
A fine possession you can store away
To pride yourself upon because you've got
A better than your neighbor's. You can do
That very well with things you merely know.
But if you once believe a thing is true
That isn't possible. You've got to go
And put it into practice. Most of us
Know we should love our neighbor, be forgiving,
Speak ill of none, be patient, generous
And kind to all, in all our daily living.
But if you watch us closely, you'll perceive
That most of what we know, we don't believe."

He finished loading the slide and it pulled away toward the creek. Matthew turned then, looking for the next task, and saw Crawford still waiting patiently. "I told you I don't have time to talk," he said. "Go talk to Arlis."

"It's you I came to see," Crawford said. "Why don't you sit down and rest a minute?"

Matthew glared at him. His eyes were red, too dry, and there was a smear of dirt on his beardy face. "I can rest when I get this dam finished," he said. "Then I can rest all my life if I want to."

They were away from the men. Crawford glanced back to see if they were far enough so their words couldn't be overheard.

"Matthew," he said, "you've got to put an end to it. It won't work. It just won't work. I've told them to condemn your land."

Matthew felt the air rasping in and out of his lungs. "How can they condemn land that won't be covered by their reservoir waters?" he said. "Their law says land that will be flooded. The cove won't be flooded—not after I get that dam built."

Crawford felt hopeless, exasperated. "Their maps and their studies show this land is necessary. That's what they go by."

"They'll just have to change their maps and their studies," Matthew said inflexibly. "They didn't figure on me building a dam, and they'll have to change their figuring." He glared at Crawford belligerently.

"They're coming," Crawford said heavily. "You'll be served with the papers on the condemnation proceedings any time now. So you'd just as well stop, let these men go back home and do their own useful work."

"No," Matthew said. His voice was short, heavy, final.

Crawford moved closer to him. He said, "They're all gone now. All up and down the coves on the river, in the river bottom. The Sheltons and the Precises and the Upjohns, all those who have coves named after their names; they've moved out now, the houses are torn down and the land is cleared ready for the water. You're all alone now. You'll only kill yourself trying to stand against it."

"Come here, Crawford," Matthew said. "I reckon the time has come to show you."

He turned and led Crawford toward the house, up on the porch and into the dogtrot. Matthew, beckoning, opened the door into his own bedroom. Crawford followed him. Matthew went to the foot of his bed and put his hand on the high post. There was a tight smile on his mouth. Then he moved his hand, shoving the bed forcefully on oiled casters halfway across the floor.

Crawford gasped. He stared uncomprehending, unbelieving, down at the floor boards. There were guns. Pistols, and shotguns, and rifles—even a .22 rifle—were laid out on the floor, and boxes of shells and cartridges were stacked neatly against the wall.

He lifted his eyes to look at Matthew. "You can't mean it," he breathed.

Matthew nodded. "I mean it. Those men out there—they're not going to melt away with the coming of the law. I've told them already what to expect. You can serve your papers. You can serve me a ton of 'em if you want to. But they can't take this land with paper."

Crawford did not want to see the guns again. He stumbled out of the room into the fresh air, knowing that he could not bear the presence of Matthew any longer. Matthew came out of the bedroom and went past him without looking or speaking, going back to the men and the work. Crawford stared at his broad back. Uncertainly he went into the kitchen. He wanted Arlis, but the kitchen was empty, and the emptiness was a blow to him.

Crawford had never held a gun in anger. He tried to imagine the feel and the heft of it, the determination and the anger it would take to pick up the gun and fire it, the sound of the shot, the cry of a struck man. He was sunk into the awesome contemplation when Arlis came into the room.

She put her hand on his bowed head, her voice quick with alarm. "What's the matter, Crawford?"

"He's got guns in yonder," he said. "Guns he's ready and willing to use."

He felt her hand tighten against his head. "I know."

He drew away from her. "You knew? Then why didn't you tell me?"

"I kept hoping it wouldn't travel this far," she said, her voice faint, despairing. "I was afraid, if you knew, you'd force him to it. I kept hoping ——" Her voice stopped.

"Once he picks up a gun in his hand, he'll go to jail," he said. "They'll kill him or jail him. Doesn't he know that?"

"He knows it," Arlis said. "You can't stop him, Crawford. There's no way to stop him." She turned toward him. Her face was cold, tight, hard as his own, icy-white. Crawford put his hand on her arm.

"It's time now," he said. "It's time for us to go."

She did not move under his touch. "Us?" she said as though she did not understand.

"Us," he said violently. "You and me. We're going to save ourselves, at least."

She withdrew her arm. She felt the call of his words. But she could not answer. "You go," she said. "I have to stay."

"He's changed, Arlis. He's not the Matthew he was. This is a stranger, a man we'll never know."

Arlis watched his face, feeling the truth of the words. She said slowly "He still needs me, and as long as he needs me I'll have to answer."

Crawford went to the table and picked up his cap. "I'm going now."

She watched while he walked to the door. Her voice stopped him with his hand on the doorknob. "Can't we hope?" she said. "Can't we even hope any more?"

He turned his head. "I don't think so."

"You won't come back?"

"Yes," he said harshly. "I'll have to come back. I'll be serving Matthew with the condemnation notice."

Arlis woke quickly, as she always did. But immediately with the waking she felt a weariness so great she could not stir to move out of her bed. She turned her head to look toward the window and the shock of lateness swept into her. The sun was high in the sky, at least ten o'clock. She could not ever remember having slept so late.

Groaning, she forced herself to sit up. It did not matter that, incredibly late, she had not prepared breakfast for Matthew and grandpaw and Miss Hattie, and for John and his boys, who were staying at the house. The only mattering was the departure of Crawford. He was gone, and so her days were empty before her. And yet—she could not have followed him.

She lifted her head. She had denied him by standing on her duty—and here she was sleeping it away. She stood up, dressing quickly in a light cotton dress.

She opened the door into the kitchen and stopped. The table was cleared, the washpan was piled high with dishes, and there was a fire in the stove.

She looked around. There was a pot of turnip greens bubbling on the stove. Miss Hattie leaned over the dishpan. She straightened up, feeling a presence, and turned to look at Arlis.

"Well!" she said. "So you finally decided to get up. Set down, I'll fix you some breakfast in just a minute."

Arlis went to sit at the table. Miss Hattie tested the coffeepot gingerly with her hand and poured out a cup, bringing it to Arlis.

"Here" she said. "Drink this while your breakfast is getting done."

Arlis did not touch the coffee. "You cooked breakfast?" she said unbelievingly.

"Sure," Miss Hattie said. "I kept you some biscuits warm too. Want some 'lasses to go on them?"

Arlis shook her head. She waited while Miss Hattie finished cooking the breakfast and placed it before her. The eggs were just right—not too soft, not too hard.

"Where in the world did you learn to cook?" she said.

Miss Hattie sat down across from her again. She was grinning. "From you," she said. "Where else? I reckon us Dunbar women are just natural-born housekeepers."

Arlis put down her fork. She stared at Miss Hattie, seeing her no longer as a child. She's almost fifteen, she thought. As old as I was when mamma —— She stopped. She stopped the thinking dead still and let it hit her, coming into her with the force of a blow.

Miss Hattie moved uneasily. "I didn't aim to make you mad."

"I'm not mad," Arlis said hastily. "I'm glad you did it. I'm just wondering, that's all. Miss Hattie do you—do you think you could take care of papa?"

"Of course," Miss Hattie said boastfully. "I ——" Then she registered the seriousness in Arlis and her stance changed instantly. "You mean ——"

"What if I went off with Crawford?" Arlis said.

Miss Hattie studied her face intently. "You love that man, don't you?" She was standing holding the coffeepot. "Sister," she said seriously, "if you've just got to go with him, go on. Don't worry about this house or about me or about papa. You just follow what you've got to do."

Miss Hattie had not called her "sister" since she had been a little girl, a very little girl who had just lost her mother. Arlis felt the weakness, the sudden sense of release, flood over into tears. They were the only happy tears of her lifetime.

Crawford was following in his own car behind Sam when he heard the single, blasting shot. Sam drove on for a couple of hundred yards and then pulled to the side of the road; Crawford parked behind him and walked up on the roadside.

"They know we're coming now," Sam said.

Crawford nodded, thinking, They have the guns now. He looked at the lawyer. Sam was a tall man, big and gangling, with heavy shoulders and a big head.

Sam shifted in his seat. "Well," he said cheerfully, "he can't shoot us just for talking to him."

"Better let me go first," Crawford said. "He knows me."

They went on down the road to the head of the cove and turned in. Crawford could see Matthew standing on top of the dam, watching. He was holding a pistol.

"Howdy, Mr. Dunbar," Crawford said.

Matthew stood looking down at them. "Howdy, Crawford. What can I do for you?"

Crawford could not help looking at the gun. He looked back at Matthew's face. "This is Sam MacClendon. "He's a TVA lawyer."

Sam opened the folder he carried and extracted an envelope. "Mr. Dunbar," he said briskly, "here is your notice of the Declaration of Taking. You'll find all the information, including the price we're willing to pay. This will serve to make notice on you that this land is now legally vested in the ownership of the United States Government."

Matthew stepped away from the proffered envelope. "I refuse to accept it," he said. "Get off my land."

Sam turned toward Crawford for a cue.

"Matthew," Crawford said, "this is just a formality. You'll have the right to appear before the Condemnation Commission. If you'll let us, we'd like to send our appraisers to make a reappraisal of the land. You can hire your lawyer, and have him prepare your case. The Condemnation Commission will hear you—they're good men, and they're fair—and then they'll make a decision. If you want to, you can appeal, then, to the Federal District Court. That's the legal way of handling it. It's the only way."

Matthew eyed the white envelope as though it were a water moccasin. "You see this dam?" he said then. He gestured with one hand. "When I get it finished, my land won't be touched by the TVA water. So you don't have any right to take it."

Sam said, "I'm sorry. We can't recognize such a stand. Our experts have certified that this land is necessary to the proper and full development of Chickasaw Dam. You'll have your day before the Condemnation Commission ——"

"Can they decide that the TVA doesn't have the right to take my land?" Matthew asked quickly.

Sam shook his head, starting to speak. Matthew forestalled him.

"All they can do is decide how much I ought to get for it. Is that right?"

"Yes," Sam said.

Matthew moved his hands. "You don't give me a chance," he said. "By just consenting to the procedure, I'm giving up." He shook his head. "I think you'd better go."

"If you don't appear, the proceeding will be summary," Sam said. "They'll authorize our price without question. I've already told you, title is vested in the Government right this minute. Immediately after the hearing, the District Court will issue an eviction notice and you will be moved off the premises."

Matthew took the gun out of his overalls and motioned with it. "Get off my land."

Sam proffered the envelope. "I've got to give you this," he said.

Matthew ignored him. Sam held the envelope for a moment, then dropped it to the ground at Matthew's feet.

"Go on now," Matthew said to Sam. "Get into your car and don't stop moving while you're still in sight."

Crawford could not help him. He nodded his head imperceptibly at Sam, telling him to go. Sam went on to his car and got behind the wheel. They watched while he turned it around and drove away. Then Crawford looked at Matthew.

"You can't win," he said quietly.

"Not your way," Matthew said. "My way—maybe I can."

Crawford looked at the cluster of listening men, beyond them toward the cove and the house under the big oak tree. "Matthew," he said, "you're going to shoot somebody down before it's over with. Then you'll go to jail."

"That's the chance I've got to take," Matthew said. "You'd better catch up with your lawyer friend. I've got work to do."

Crawford turned away from him. He went down the side of the dam, got into the car, backed it and drove away, leaving Matthew standing on the top of his dam, holding the pistol in his rage-trembling hand.

Once out of the cove, Crawford slowed his car. He was driving almost without watching the road. Then, looking up, he stamped on the brakes, hard, swerving to the side of the road. Arlis was standing directly in front of the car, a blue weekend suitcase in her hand, wearing a pretty dress he had not seen before.

He opened the car door and got out. "Arlis," he said.

"Can I go with you?" she said.

He stared at her. She dropped the suitcase, running to him. He grabbed her, tight.

"Yes," he said, "yes, yes."

They were married in Rising Fawn, Georgia, by a tall, gangly minister whose wife and six children stood by watching. Arlis wore her pretty dress that Crawford had never seen before and he wore the khakis he had gone to work in that day.

But it did not matter. There was a radiance in Arlis as she spoke the promises, and when she turned her head to look at Crawford she could not see him clearly through the golden haze. He was Husband. He was the dim and shadowy and golden figure she had always brought to life in her adolescent dreaming.

As they walked back to the car, her hand tucked under his arm, Crawford felt a sudden stab of incomprehension and doubt. This was a long and twisting way from the sawmill where he had started and he wondered, with a sudden sharp wondering, how he had arrived at this moment of time and space, married to this woman at his side. He could not trace out the convolutions of chance and circumstance that had brought him to the climax of elopement with Matthew Dunbar's daughter, from Dunbar's Cove, and he was panicky with his inability as though, not understanding it, it could not be real and true.

Then he straightened up. "I didn't kiss the bride," he said.

"No," she said nervously. "You didn't."

"To tell you the truth, I was afraid to in front of the preacher. I didn't think he'd approve."

They laughed, and he reached for her, and the kiss made everything all right. He searched her lips and she gave herself to him through hers, the golden haze deepening around her so that she was dizzy with the wonder and the happiness.

"Now," he said when he released her, "let's go home."

It was dusk by the time they arrived in town. Crawford had planned it out in his mind: they could stay at the hotel—of course they couldn't go to his boardinghouse—until he had a chance to rent a house and put the furniture in it.

Arlis began to feel strange as they carried her single bag into the lobby of the Rainey Hotel. There were old men sitting in chairs around the wall whom she knew slightly, and they watched while she and Crawford walked to the desk to register.

In the room, Arlis waited until the bellhop had deposited the suitcase, received his tip and departed. Then they looked at each other.

The clerk had given them a corner room, large and high-ceilinged. "Hungry?" Crawford said. "Shall we go down and eat supper in the dining room?"

"No," she said before she realized the implication of her words. She stopped. "Yes. I believe I ——"

He turned around. She saw his look and on the instant it was all gone, the driving and the going and the returning, the men in the hotel lobby, all of it. She was his wife. She did not wait for him to come to her. She met him halfway, her arms going around his body even as he took her into his, and their lips drank at each other thirstily, as at a cool woods spring of pure water.

Before the TVA had come, Matthew would have known that Arlis was absent before she had been gone half an hour. As it was, he did not know until the next morning. At supper that night they all sat around the big round table, the nine men, Matthew and John's oldest boy, while Miss Hattie dished up the food. Matthew assumed that Arlis was in her room, not feeling well. Besides, he was too worn out to think about anything except food and bed and a deep sleep in preparation for tomorrow. He had chosen the men for watches to guard the cove while the others slept and he rose at three o'clock to take his turn, holding a shotgun to use for a warning shot in case of trouble.

He waited through the dawn and then he went back to the house to find Miss Hattie in the kitchen, fixing breakfast.

"Arlis still feeling bad?" he remarked, going to sit at the table.

"No," Miss Hattie said.

"Then where is she?" Matthew demanded.

Miss Hattie turned toward the stove so she would have the courage to say the words. "Why, I reckon she's gone and got married. At least, that's what she was aiming to do."

Matthew went to her, took her cruelly by the shoulders. "Why didn't you come and tell me?"

She did not step away from him. She regarded him coolly. "I figured I'd give her as good a head start as I could. I figured she'd need it."

Matthew glared, jerking her toward the table with both hands. He sat down in a chair, flinging her across his lap in one violent movement, and lifted his hand high, bringing it down stinging on her buttocks. He had not spanked Miss Hattie since she was six years old. But he blistered her now, working out his anger and his frustration in blow after blow.

At last he stopped. He was not through with his rage but he stopped, releasing her, letting her get to her feet. "You all think you're grown," he said. "You all think you're not my children any more. Even you. Even Arlis."

He could not bear the looking on her any more. He went to the kitchen door, going toward his bedroom.

"Don't you want your breakfast?" she said.

"I don't have time for breakfast." He went to his bedroom and got the pistol he had left on the bedpost. He strapped it under his overalls, and went out to the barn. He had a hard time getting the car started—he cranked and cranked the sluggish motor. At last, when he kicked the car and cursed it, the motor started with a roar and a jump.

He got behind the wheel, and drove out past the house, wheeled out on the river road and toward town. He stopped the car behind the hardware store where he always parked it.

Mr. Gross, the owner of the store, came out on the sidewalk, pushing a rack of hoes and rakes. "Mr. Matthew," he said cheerily, "how are you today?"

Matthew answered him shortly and started to move away. Mr. Gross called after him, "Heard your daughter got married yesterday. Heard she made a fine match."

Matthew wheeled around. "I was the last to hear it," he said. "Can you tell me where she is?"

Mr. Gross straightened up, startled. He stared at Matthew. "Why, Old Man Whitehart told me she and her husband checked into the Rainey Hotel last night."

"Thank you," Matthew said shortly. He walked away and went on up the street.

He stopped when he saw the hotel. He glared at the building as though he would search out their room by the very appearance of it from the outside. But it was not possible; the blank face of the building was inscrutable. He entered and walked up to the register desk.

"My daughter is registered here," he said. "What room is she in?"

The man turned to a tickler file at his elbow. "What name?"

Matthew could not bring himself to couple "Arlis" with "Gates." "She's with a man," he said. "Crawford Gates."

The clerk turned to look at him. "They're married. I saw the marriage license myself."

"All right. What room are they in?"

"Mr. Dunbar," the clerk said, "we don't want any trouble. As far as we're concerned, they're legally married. That's all we have to worry about. We don't care if ——"

"A man has a right to visit his daughter," Matthew interposed. "If you'll just give me the room number ——"

"Three hundred," the desk clerk said. "I'll send the boy up to tell them you're here. You can wait in the lobby."

But Matthew was already walking toward the stairs. "Don't bother," he said. "I'll go up."

He mounted the stairs, climbing slowly, holding down the panting in his lungs that did not come from the climbing. He reached the third floor and went down to the end of the corridor, watching the numbers on each door.

Three hundred. He stopped in front of it, lifted his hand and knocked. He knocked three times, deliberately, heavily. And the door opened before him.

Arlis' second thought, that morning when she awoke, was of Matthew. The first was of Crawford, asleep beside her, and she turned, touching his face lightly, lovingly with her finger. He came awake with the touch and smiled.

Arlis sat up in bed, looking down at her pretty nightgown that had been saved so many years for this one night.

It was then she knew it. "Crawford," she said, "I've got to tell papa. Today."

"Sure," Crawford said lazily. "We'll drive out there after breakfast. Hungry?"

"Yes," Arlis said. "I'm starved."

She flung back the covers and got out of bed. She went to her open suitcase, found fresh clothing, and began dressing without consciousness or embarrassment. Crawford lay watching her while he smoked a cigarette, then he got up too. He had only the khakis he had worn yesterday and he began putting them on.

"I've got to get some clothes today," he laughed. "Don't want to wear my wedding clothes all the time."

Arlis, combing her hair, felt a shudder pass in her. "I dread the telling," she said. "He's going to ——"

"It'll be all right." Crawford went behind her, putting his hands on her shoulders and leaning his head down beside her face. "He couldn't have kept us separated forever. I wonder now why we let him do it for so long."

"Me too. I was just a fool, I reckon."

The knock sounded on the door. Once. Twice. The third time. They froze at the sound, touching each other like children.

"Papa," Arlis said, starting up from her seat.

"Wait," Crawford said sharply. "Let me."

Matthew had not lifted his hand after the third knock. He waited for a long second and then the door began to move, opening, and he walked into the room. Crawford stood holding the doorknob. Arlis was sitting before the mirror on a low bench, holding her comb in her hand.

He had expected her to be subtly changed from the daughter he had last seen. But she was not changed; she was heavy, graceful, her half-combed hair down around her face in a comfortable, accustomed combing.

"Come on, Arlis," he said. "Let's go home now."

"Wait a minute," Crawford said. "She's my wife now."

Matthew looked at him. "Don't get in my way," he said. "Arlis, are you coming?"

She did not move. It was a long minute when she did not move, and then at last she began to stand up. "Papa," she said, "we're man and wife ——"

"That's what you think," he said. His voice whipped at her. "I'm not going to argue with you. You've had your night of frolicking. It's time to go home."

Crawford went toward Matthew, a matching anger rising up in him. "I've had enough of this. Get out of here, Matthew. Get out before I ——"

Matthew wheeled toward him. "Before you what, young man?"

Crawford's hands went out before him, the fingers curling into fists. "I don't want to hurt you. But I'm going to. If you don't leave our room this minute ——"

"I'm leaving," Matthew said. "I'm taking my daughter with me."

"She's my wife," Crawford cried out blindly.

He started to move. Matthew, seeing it, put his hand inside the overalls, quickly lifting out the gun. "Stand back," he said. "Stand back."

Crawford would not have stopped without Arlis' voice cutting between them, snapping the thread of conflict.

"Matthew!" she screamed. "Crawford!"

They stopped. They had forgotten her. Now they both looked at her. She came between them.

"You've got to stop it," she said. "You——" She stared at the gun in Matthew's hand. "Papa," she said, "put up the gun."

"Are you going with me?" he said.

"Papa," she pleaded, "listen to me. I ——"

"Are you going with me?"

There was no answer. Crawford moved suddenly around Arlis until she was behind him. He ignored the pistol lifting toward him. "No," he said, "she's not going."

Matthew looked down at the pistol in his hand. "She's got a choice," he said. "She can go home with me. Or I'll kill you, Crawford."

"She's staying with me." Crawford put his hand on her, touching her, holding her. "You can't kill me, Matthew. You know that."

Arlis looked at Matthew. She saw the killing in him plain and clear. Matthew knew it, too—he could feel the hair-trigger urge to tighten his finger. He wanted to murder; it was a living wanting, like a raving appetite for food or sex.

"Put your gun down, papa," she said. "I'll go."

Crawford's face was white, drawn. "If you go now," he said, "you'll never come back."

I will, she cried silently inside her. Nothing can keep me from it. She went to him and touched him with her hand on his face, trying to tell him with the feel of her fingers. But his flesh was not listening to her.

She turned on Matthew. "Had you rather kill him than take me away? Are you waiting for the chance to kill him?"

Matthew moved then. He did not put up the gun, but he walked to the open door.

Arlis went quickly out of the room and the door closed. She walked blindly toward the stairway leading down into the lobby, Matthew coming behind her. At the stairs he put the gun into the holster.

In the kitchen Miss Hattie did her work, leaving Arlis' room a silent center untouched by the living going on around it. Arlis lay on the bed in her closed room. She was not thinking; she was not feeling. She was not aware of the heat of two o'clock and the slow lessening toward the relative chill of night. When darkness came she did not rise to light her lamp. The men came clumping through the dogtrot to supper, but they did not pass through her hearing. After the men were gone out of the house again Miss Hattie came to her door and tapped gently, asking if she wanted supper. But Arlis did not answer; she moved her throat, but there were no words and she desisted after the first effort.

Matthew had not eaten either. Miss Hattie went back to the kitchen to wash the dishes. Then she sat alone in the kitchen.

It was nearly midnight before Arlis moved. It was clear in her mind then. She could only wait. The feeling between Crawford and Matthew was not her alone; it was the dam and the cove and the TVA. She would wait until that was cleared out of the way. And then she would go to Crawford. Only then could Matthew not use her against Crawford.

She got up and went into the kitchen where Miss Hattie was still sitting with a cup that had held coffee before her on the table. Miss Hattie looked up at her and smiled.

"I knew you would be all right," she said. "I knew you would get hungry."

Arlis sat down at the table. "I only left because of Crawford. Papa was going to ——"

"I know," Miss Hattie said. "Don't talk about it. I know."

Matthew wandered a restless night, back and forth in his mind. He was tired. But he could not stop. His feet moved ploddingly, pacing through the fields. He told himself that something must be wrong in an endeavor that did not allow him time for a planting of the seed. He had never missed a planting in all the years of his lifetime.

But at last he could no longer avoid the consideration he had been fighting all the long night. He wanted to sleep; he could feel the want of it gnawing in him. And yet he could not stop, he could not close his eyes before he traced out the fatal end to the endless thinking. He wanted wildly to change it all back, in a sudden wildness that shook in him. I was wrong, he thought. Wrong. I ought to have another chance. He had started with good beliefs. And yet the actions that had come out of them —— His mind cringed as he thought of Arlis, of his dead son and the departed sons. He thought of the guns waiting in the hands of his men, and his stomach moved again. He felt suddenly the weight of his belt that he still wore.

With frenzied hands he stripped it off and flung it into the crib. He walked out of the barn into the lot. Dawn had come suddenly and the light was pearly in the sky. He could see the far reach and sweep of the cove, all of it lying within the sight of his eyes.

The shot rang out and he turned, looking down toward the head of the cove. Then the night—all of it—was forgotten. He ran, snatching open the crib door and scrabbling among the ears of corn to recover the pistol. He strapped it on again, his fingers fumbling with the hurry.

When he ran toward the cove some of the men were moving, roused by the warning shot. Matthew was the first to reach the dam. He ran up the face of the dam and stopped. He could hear the sound of a car.

Then it came around the curve of the road. It was Crawford's car—only Crawford's car. He felt the sudden movement and excitement ebbing out of him. He turned toward the men below.

"It's all right," he said. "It's not them. Not yet."

Crawford was getting out of his car. Matthew stood looking down at him. "Did you come after Arlis?" he said.

"No," he said. "Not this time." He stopped, watching Matthew. "They were coming this morning, Matthew. The United States marshal and his men."

"Were?" Matthew said.

Crawford steadied himself against the seeing of the gun on Matthew's hip. He began climbing the face of the dam toward Matthew, feeling the distance a very long way.

"I want to talk to you," he said, with the same words, with the precise tone he had used so often.

"Don't you think we've done about enough talking?"

Crawford shook his head. "I want to show you some land. Will you come with me?"

Matthew felt the explosion of words in his mouth. "Good Godamighty!" he said, loud and startled. "You want to show me land? Now? Now, when the law is coming ——"

"I told you," Crawford said. "They were coming this morning. But I talked to the marshal, and got him to wait until tomorrow. They'll be here tomorrow morning at ten o'clock. This is the last chance." His voice was hard, blunt, unforgiving. "Or do you want to do the shooting?"

Matthew was jarred by the words. "You're sure they're not coming today?" he said.

"Yes," Crawford said. "I promise you that."

"This is my dance. You can do that any time."

Matthew turned his head. The men had gone back to the house now. He would not even have to tell them yet. "All right, son," he said gently. "I'll go with you."

They went across the highway and down a dirt road on the other side, following the river toward the dam. Then the dirt road swung away from the river and began looping up the side of the mountain. They did not talk, listening to the pulling of the car. Crawford thought he would have to take low to make it, but the car topped out on the shoulder of the mountain, slowing down but still pulling. He swung to the side of the road and stopped.

"There it is," he said, "Chickasaw Dam."

Matthew looked out the window of the car, down the long steep wooded slope. He could see the dam far below. The gray concrete powerhouse looked almost white in the sunlight. There was water banked behind the dam, though the gates were still down. The swarm of working men had lessened now; there were only a few figures around the south embankment and in the switchyard beside the powerhouse. The dam was almost finished.

"Is this what you brought me to see?" Matthew said, a trace of indignation rising in his voice.

Crawford laughed. "No. It just happened to be on the way. Pretty, isn't it?"

Matthew looked at it again. "Yes," he said ungrudgingly.

Crawford started the car and drove on. He turned away from the river, going deeper into the mountains, following a road paralleling a creek. The trees were close around them. Part of the way the creek had cut deeply into a rocky gorge and it flowed white-watered below them. They passed an old water mill. The road became very rough and the car jounced in the ruts. There were no houses; only the rocks and the trees and the fast-running creek.

A couple of miles farther on, Crawford turned off the road where the close-lying hills suddenly opened out around the creek. A smaller stream flowed to a juncture here, making a tiny cove. There were clearings among the trees, grown up in bush and briers. Crawford stopped the car and they could hear the joining waters flowing quietly together in the little interval of peace.

"Well," Crawford said, "here it is. What do you think of it?"

Matthew was bewildered. He opened the door and got out to walk to the creek bank. "This?" he said.

Crawford was out of the car. He said, "No man has ever laid his name on this cove. It's been Government land since it was taken from the Indians. It's yours, if you want it."

Matthew stopped and grubbed up a handful of the soil. It was rich and black in his hand. He rubbed it with his fingers, remembering that so far this spring he had not yet found the time to turn his own soil.

This cove was smaller than the Dunbar by at least a third. But it was well watered and drained by the two creeks, and the trees were thinly spaced so that clearing would be comparatively easy. Farther up the creek there was a high, drained deep-green-cedared knoll where a house could be built. From the front porch a man would be able to look out upon all his land.

"Crawford," he said, "what would you do if a man told you you had to quit the TVA? What would you feel about that? Tell me honest now."

Crawford looked uncertain. Then his face firmed. "If he offered me something better," he said. He looked at Matthew. "I should have found this cove in the first place, Matthew. I should have known what you needed. But I thought only of putting my idea into your head, not of strengthening and building your own. I only came taking, and not giving. But just look at it, Matthew. It's rich and it's new, it's waiting for the labor of your hand. You can shape it the way you want it to be shaped." His voice was eager, pressing.

Matthew could feel the pull of it. It was the first land he had ever seen outside of Dunbar's Cove that pleased his eye.

"So I'm supposed to give up the generations that have gone into Dunbar's Cove, and start out new again. You want me to kill Dunbar's Cove for good and all."

Crawford could not hold back now. "Do you think Dunbar's Cove will die without that land?" he said. The words sounded angry with their force. "Dunbar's Cove is not in the land, Matthew. It's in you—you're the Dunbar. Not the earth, not the river and the trees and the creek and the buildings. None of that means a thing. It's you."

Matthew turned away and walked to the bank of the smaller creek and sat down on the ground, looking at the flowing water. It had been a long time since he had seen flowing water, for the creek that ran through the cove was low now, almost dry. He picked up a handful of small rocks and began flipping them into the creek. The pebbles were like marbles, smoothed and flattened over the years by the action of water and travel.

When his hand was empty he rubbed it on his trousers leg to dry the moistness. He stood up and walked back to where Crawford waited by the car, smoking a cigarette.

"We'd better get back," Matthew said. His voice was low, passionless.

Crawford flipped the cigarette to the earth, ground it out carefully with the toe of his shoe. "I'll quit the TVA," he said. "I'll ——"

Matthew looked up at him and smiled. "I wouldn't ask you to do that, Crawford. There's no need for it."

They got in and Crawford backed the car, turning it, and drove out of the small cove. They were silent as the car jounced over the harsh ruts, back down the slope of the mountain, all the way back until they crested out on the shoulder of the mountain, where they could see Chickasaw Dam below.

Crawford stopped, not wheeling the car out of the road but keeping it in position ready to go on. "Well," he said, "they'll be raising the gates before long. Chickasaw is finished."

Matthew looked down toward the dam. He was impatient to get home, but he did not show the impatience. "Yes," he said. "My boy helped build that. And now that Chickasaw's finished he's off somewhere building some other dam."

"It's a good work," Crawford said.

Matthew looked at him and then away. "I guess it is."

Crawford turned, shutting the dam out of his sight. "Be careful, Matthew," he said, "tomorrow. Don't get yourself killed."

Matthew could not look at him. "I'll be careful. As careful as they'll let me be. Take me home, son. Take me home."

The old man was asleep, dozing with the quick, dozing tiredness of old age. Matthew stood looking down at him. The face was sunken, the skin like white parchment stretched dry and tight over the high cheekbones. "How have you been, papa?" he said.

The old man struggled his head up to look at him with the milky-blue eyes. "Fine, son."

Matthew felt the desperation that was so familiar to him now. He could not communicate with him, either, any more than he could communicate with his own sons and daughters. He wondered if the deep gulf laid down between the generations was to protect one from the other, the protection more valuable to the species than the help and the advice and the knowing that would have been transmitted more surely without the gulf.

The old man's head started lifting again. "Matthew," he said. "Matthew."

Matthew leaned over the bed, close to him. "Yes, papa?"

His father stared up at him. "It's time," he said feebly.

"What, papa? It's time for what?"

The old man rolled his head on the pillow in a sudden agony. Then he stopped. He lay still and calm and deep in the bed. "I'm going to die," he said. "It's time for me to die now."

Matthew stood over him. With gentle hands, with a gentleness Matthew had not known for too long, he moved and straightened the covers over the old man, making him more comfortable. "Go to sleep, papa," he said. "Go on back to sleep now. Get your rest." He brought a chair to the bedside and sat down in it. He began to wait with the old man.

With the sun, life stirred again. The men were up and washing on the back porch, they were in the kitchen with coffee and subdued voices, there was the rattle of skillet and plates. John and Miss Hattie and Arlis tiptoed into the room one by one to look upon the old man, and at Matthew's gray face, and then they went away.

Matthew felt his father would not die now, until the night came again. But he could not be sure. Arlis came into the room and Matthew gave her the chair, going into the kitchen, knowing that he would need breakfast.

He sat down at the table, rubbing his hand over his bearded face. For two nights now he had not slept. But he was not tired. He was beyond tiredness, beyond any feeling in his bones and muscles or in his mind. He waited until the plate was set before him and then he ate, not with appetite but with the same dogged duty and dedication with which he faced everything now.

He started into the living room again, but before he reached the door the blast of a shotgun rang through the cove.

He had known it was coming, but still it was a shock. He stopped in the living room, looking toward the old man, knowing that it was necessary to go and yet not wanting to. He touched Arlis on the shoulder. "I've got to go. Call me if—call me, no matter what ——"

Then he went out and hurried away to duty. The men were already spaced out along the dam, lying down, their guns in their hands. Beyond, Matthew could see the cluster of cars in the head of the cove and the men behind the cars as though fearful of shots coming in their direction.

Matthew inched up the face of the dam to look at the men. There were four of them, in addition to Crawford. They spaced out and began walking toward him. There was a tall, heavy-set gray man in the lead.

Matthew looked back at the advancing men. "All right," he said. His voice was clear, loud. "That's far enough right there."

They stopped. "Mr. Dunbar," the tall man said, "I'm United States Marshal Wilson. It's y duty to evict you from this Government operty. I waited until ten o'clock today, like romised Mr. Gates. Are you ready to give the cove?"

Matthew watched him, feeling a deep reluctance to start the violence and perhaps the bloodshed. "I need a little more time," he said. "If you can give me one more day."

Marshal Wilson studied him. "Will you promise to give up the cove peacefully then?"

Matthew shifted his eyes to Crawford's face, then looked back quickly at the marshal. "I won't promise a thing," he said. He added stubbornly, "I need one more day."

"Why?"

Matthew moved his head in a jerking motion toward the house. "My daddy is dying up there."

The words stopped them. But suspicion moved in the marshal's eyes. "If you'll give me your solemn promise ——"

Matthew shook his head.

"Then what's the difference between today and tomorrow?" the marshal said. "No use putting it off."

Matthew turned to go back behind the bulwark of the dam. He heard Arlis' voice from the house. He twisted around.

"Papa," Arlis called, her hands cupping her mouth. "Papa. Come quick."

He dropped down off the face of the dam, beckoning to John. "I've got to go to the house," he said. "If they move in on you, start shooting. You've got to hold them until I can get back." He looked into John's white face. "I'll be back as quick as I can."

There was no time for any more. He ducked, running along the face of the dam. He did not want the marshal to know that he was gone. He skirted along the close-in ridge and came up behind the chicken house, running. He went through the dogtrot and stopped, seeing Arlis still standing on the porch.

"He's calling for you," she said. "He ——"

Matthew did not wait to hear any more. He opened the door into the living room, seeing Miss Hattie standing beside the bed. The old man's head was turning fretfully on the pillow. Matthew leaned down to him.

"Papa?" he said. "Papa?"

"Stay with me, son," he whispered. "Stay ——" His eyes closed again, cutting off the thread of voice.

Matthew sank into the chair. He looked at Arlis and Miss Hattie, inclining his head toward the kitchen. They went away at his nod, leaving them alone. Not a sound, not a creak or settle of the old house or the obtrusive blast of a shot, broke the dead-of-night quiet.

Matthew did not know when the old man died. He lay quiescent with the steady rattle and husk of his breathing. In one of the seconds the thready husk and rattle stopped. Matthew sat on, holding the hand, for a beat of undetermined time afterward before he became aware that the sound of his living had ended.

Gently he took the arms and crossed them on the breast. He did not feel anything; only the release that his withered father must have known himself. Matthew took out his leather purse and fumbled two half dollars from its depths with clumsy fingers. He stroked the eyelids closed and put the coins on them to weight them down.

Then he turned from the bed, going to the kitchen door and opening it. Miss Hattie and Arlis looked up at him. "Children," he said, "your grandfather is dead."

He walked through the living room, not looking at the bed, and now he was listening for the shot, holding his breath to hold it back as though it would surely come, now that the dying was finished. But he walked out of the house without the sound of it in his ears, and toward the dam. He went straight to John, not trying to hide himself away from the marshal and his deputies.

"John," he said gently, "your daddy is dead. He died just a few minutes ago."

He saw John's face twist. He looked away from him toward another man, a first cousin.

"Walter," he said, "will you go up to the house and tend to him?"

"Of course, Matthew," Walter said. He handed his gun to another man and walked quickly away.

Matthew looked over the top of the dam toward the cars. He took a deep breath. He walked up the dam, moving toward the marshal and his men. The marshal stood up, too, stepping away from his shelter.

"What do you want now?" he said in a steely voice.

Matthew ignored him. "Crawford," he said, "you did make me a true promise yesterday, didn't you? I can buy that cove you showed me?"

"Yes," Crawford said. "I put down a binder payment for you myself. The Government's selling that land, and I wanted to be sure ——"

Matthew did not listen to the rest. He turned back to the marshal. "Marshal Wilson," he said with dignity, "if you'll give me the time to bury my dead, and get my plunder ready for moving, I'll surrender the cove."

There were a great many things to be done, a kind of planning that Matthew had never faced. He had to think about how they would live until he could build a house, and planting a crop, in spite of late moving and new-ground clearing, for he couldn't afford to miss an entire crop year, and the fact that a new barn would have to come before living quarters. He had the stock and the feed and the weather to think about.

"If there was time, the TVA would let you move these buildings," Crawford told him. "But there isn't."

"What about a tent?" Matthew said. "We could put down a floor for it, and by laying-by time I could get a house built."

He went to town and found a big tent. It cost a lot more than he thought it should. But he bought it, anyway.

Miss Hattie and Arlis helped more than he had thought they could. Each afternoon Crawford came to the cove after his TVA hours. He would go first to Arlis, then he would hunt up Matthew and fall silently to the task beside him. There had been no discussion of the marriage or of their impending departure. Once though, Crawford let drop the fact that his work was almost finished, that they were only closing out the paper work—and Matthew knew he would soon be transferred to another project. He could depend on Arlis only for the moving.

The first night in the new cove Crawford went back to town. But he came early the next morning to help them get settled. They had pitched the tent up on the cedared knoll near where Matthew planned to build the house. They had found a spring on its back slope, that would do until a well could be dug. Matthew stood before the tent, watching Arlis run to meet Crawford. Already the cove bore the scars of their presence; smoke lifted from the knoll, and there were the beginnings of a road where the truck and the car and the wagon had passed back and forth. Down the other way, Matthew had made a lot for the stock, fastening wire from tree to tree. The fresh grass was already trampled under the feet of the cows and the mules, and the chickens were ranging about, picking busily.

Crawford and Arlis climbed toward him, hand in hand.

"Well," Crawford said cheerfully, "I figured you'd have you a crew out here to build you a house and a barn today."

"I've got a crew coming tomorrow for the barn," Matthew said. "But I'll have to build my own house. I'll bet there are lots of old log houses on that Government land back up yonder." He turned, motioning with his hand. "When I get time, I aim to find me enough seasoned, sound logs to put up a house like they used to build."

Crawford frowned. "That's a lot of work. I guess you'll just have to forget about making a crop this year. You can't possibly build your own house and ——"

"I've got to," Matthew said firmly. "I aim to get some corn planted anyway. I found some wild Johnson grass I can cut for hay. Hay and corn this year—cotton the next." He looked up at the sun. "And I'd better get at it. If you come here to work, come on."

"Well," Crawford said, "I ——" He cleared his throat. "They're closing the land office in town today. We're all through now. And I ——"

"You're being transferred," Matthew said steadily. "You aim to take Arlis with you."

"That's about the size of it," Crawford admitted. He lifted his head. "We'd just like to have your good will on it, sir."

Matthew looked at him. He said, "So you finally asked my blessing. Well, you can have it—on one condition." He looked down at the unseeded cove, that was not even divided into fields. "All three of my boys are gone. I've got a lot of work to do, and just one pair of hands. If you and Arlis would be willing to stay here in Dunbar's Cove, I'll gladly give you the word of my mouth."

He kept his face stern. But his eyes watched for the faintest shade of resistance in Crawford—or in Arlis—ready to retract his words. Then he began to smile, for he could see the hope and the promise leaping into Crawford's eyes and into his face. Crawford dropped Arlis' hand.

"I never thought you'd want me ——" he said. He stopped. It was too much, too sudden. "It never crossed my mind ——"

"Do you really want us to stay?" Arlis said.

He looked at her. Then back at Crawford. "Yes," he said. "I want you to stay. Dunbar's Cove can be yours after me. You can take it on from where I leave off. One of these days I'll be ready to sit down. I'd like to know that it was left safe to your hands."

Crawford was watching him, bewildered and uncertain. Matthew clapped him on the shoulder. "Think about it, son. When you make up your mind, I'll be over yonder working."

"Yes," Crawford said, "I'll let you know. I'll—I'll be down there before long."

Matthew went on, smiling secretly to himself. He had seen deep into Crawford, he knew what the answer would be. He stopped and turned. There was one more thing. Just one. "Crawford," he said, "can you find out where Knox is working now?"

"Sure," Crawford said. "If he's still with the TVA, it won't be any trouble at all."

"That's good," Matthew said. "I want to write him. And Jesse John too. I've got to tell them what's happened." He started on again. "Anyway, they'll want to be able to find us when they get ready to come home for a visit."

Matthew hurried on—there was so much to do, more than he could ever hope to accomplish in the remainder of his lifetime. He went on down the hill hurrying, eager for the labor of the day.

Miss Hattie went across the flat of the cove and climbed up among the pines on the other side. She stopped, breathing hard from th climbing, and looked back down the way sh had come. The cove was beautiful, all righ But it would never be the way the cove ha been at home.

She crested a hill and stopped, panting hard She pushed her hair back from her face an took a handkerchief from her pocket to da the sweat from her forehead and her upper lip She had always believed that women did no sweat. None of the ones she knew seemed to But she certainly did.

She started on again, forgetting about th dishevelment she was making in herself. Sh did not know where she was tending; she wa only sure it would be a long time before sh returned to the tent. Perhaps, even, not before sundown.

"Well," a voice said, "where could you b going in such an all-fired hurry?"

She brought herself up short. A tall, lean boy sat on a hickory stump, grinning at her He had red hair, and he was taller than sh was.

"Who're you?" she blurted.

"Me?" he drawled. "I live around here You belong to them new folks who just move in down the cove?"

"Yes," she said shortly. "And I better b getting back. They probably need me fo something right now."

She started back the way she had come flustered by his sudden presence.

"Wait a minute," he called after her.

She stopped. "Where do you live?" she said

He waved a lazy arm. "Little ways ove yonder." He grinned at her. "Looks like we and you are going to be neighbors."

She looked down at the ground. She put her hand to her hair, smoothing out the tangles, feeling suddenly cool and ladylike.

"Yes," she said. "It does look that way." She lifted her eyes, looking directly into his face. The grin wasn't so irritating, after all. When you studied him a little, it was even rather nice. Then, under her gaze, it went away, and she could see into his eyes. She looked quickly away again.

"What's your name?" he asked, in a different voice.

She told him. Then he told her his own.

ARE GOOD MANNERS IMPORTANT TODAY?

politeness are suspicious of poetry. I think there is a school of snobbery in reverse, of deliberately cultivated oafishness which takes pleasure in sneering at anything more civilized than a beer commercial.

MR. GOULD: We see it on the stage and the screen. Marlon Brando, an extraordinarily capable actor, has become one of our most popular heroes by personifying bad manners—by coarsening the human emotions.

MR. BONNER (His face is rounded, his smile easy and friendly): Some people, I believe, cannot be trained. They are like horses. In any group of hunters, whatever their breeding, there are some with red ribbons tied to their tails. They have had the same training as the others, but they are bad-tempered; they kick and they bite. They are the horses to stay away from.

MISS HICKEY: Mr. Muggeridge, do you find this same sort of suspicion of manners in England?

MALCOLM MUGGERIDGE (He has been listening intently, his bright blue eyes turning from speaker to speaker, his white-crested head cocked first this way and then that): Manners (he says, in pear-shaped tones) in England are related to the class system and the class system is becoming increasingly abhorrent to the people, and along with it the codes of behavior which accentuate the differences between the classes.

And so people have invented techniques, like the first-name technique, in opposition to this idea of social hierarchy, of classes. They are seeking new manners. Everybody agrees that manners in the sense of kindness are desirable—but how is this to be expressed? By conversation, by clothing, by speech, by ways of eating—which are economic things really—or can they be expressed solely in a considerate attitude of mind, which may or may not find its expression in particular methods of behavior?

We live in what is called "the century of the common man." This means that we require different manners, more democratic manners, let us say, than the old European manners, which belong to a society which by virtue of its very nature presupposes a small elite.

MRS. GOULD: Certainly it is true that court manners were often designed to set up a barrier. And it is not surprising that with the growth of democracy we have rebelled against codes of etiquette whose purpose was, primarily, to suggest social distinctions. But isn't the problem, now, to create new codes which truly express and make manifest our consideration for others? Can this be called snobbish?

MR. NASH: Isn't snobbery under another name actually a very desirable thing? Certainly it is despicable to snub or be contemptuous of somebody who is vulnerable to snubbery—but isn't admiring somebody finer than yourself a very good thing?

MR. GOULD: You mean some people might call it snobbery, or social climbing, to wish to associate yourself with people who are more intelligent, perceptive, better mannered? You call it snobbery in reverse.

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: I do not think manners are such a society game. It is not the privilege of any one class to have a heart. The French working people are extremely shocked, more shocked than we are, by bad manners, by people who push them around. It is not a matter of society; there is an absolute human reaction between the person who treats you nicely and yourself. It would be rude to discuss, do you eat soup with a fork or a spoon? We know that is not interesting today. What is still interesting is that people want to be considerate of others, to make life comfortable for the person they spend time with.

MISS HICKEY: What do you think, Mrs. Post?

MRS. POST: My own manners were very much influenced by the French and German rules when I was a child, so when I had children of my own I gave them French manners. But today—well, real manners are what are important today, something that is real and sincere so that you will be kind and pleasant and well bred, so that you will make a happier place about you.

You must teach kindness today, how to make yourself pleasant to another person, how to make him pleased. You see the sun shining in his eyes, you put an umbrella over him. You think of the people you are talking to and you say something nice; you don't say something disagreeable but you don't lie. You find something to praise that deserves it. And you don't make fun of anybody ever. That's the worst thing you can do.

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: This is not the privilege of one class, to learn this. Manners are something that are everywhere. The Marlon Brando types—they are not only disdainful of manners, they are disdainful of people. "I am just as much as you are," they say, and what does that mean? "I am better than you are."

MR. BONNER: I'm afraid there are some people who will never have good manners.

MR. NASH: Sometimes they step on my toes with their hearts. The rough diamond with the heart of gold—well, a little polishing would not detract from his goodheartedness.

MRS. MEYNER: I agree. The more you teach the goodhearted, the better off they will be.

MR. MUGGERIDGE: Provided that you know what you want to teach them, that you know what period of history you are living in.

I think the basic thing, the foundation of all good manners, is that people should be taught to be good, and the instrument in our society which has expressed this concept is the Christian religion. And one of the reasons why this problem in manners exists at all is that the diminishing influence of this religion creates a vacuum which we are instinctively reaching out to fill. But we cannot fill it with artificial training. You say to a child, "Do not take the biggest piece of cake, another person may want it." But this will affect him only if he has true consideration of others—and if the others have true consideration of him. Otherwise the whole moral basis breaks down.

MR. GOULD: No one wants to see manners used for a purpose—as an artifice.

MR. MUGGERIDGE: That is what happens when a technique of behavior is used to replace a moral or religious position.

You see this particularly in Russia. People there, instead of trying to appear to belong to the cultured classes, try to appear to belong to the *un*cultured classes. A man there takes off his collar and tie and quite literally cultivates illiterate speech in exactly the way someone living in a small suburb of London tries to identify himself with the upper classes by cultivating a literate manner of speech. In both cases it's the same phenomenon. It's the biological drive of a person who belongs to a weaker section of society trying to identify himself with those elements of society which seem to him to be strong, to be powerful. The element of brotherliness has broken down; the drive for power has taken its place. The rules are just the superficialities of the thing, the code of behavior.

Beneath such varying conventions, in my opinion, is a reality, which is manners and which derives from morals. A person who is good has good manners; a person has good manners who is considerate.

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: There is more to it than that. Very often you don't know people long enough to appreciate their good heart or their bad heart. If I am in the Metro—the subway—in Paris, I find it very necessary for the man who is there to open the very heavy door for me—but whether he has the best heart, the absolutely greatest heart in the world, I do not care. I think that manners are important just because they are superficial and because our relations with other people are usually superficial. Superficiality is tremendously important. I cannot ask everyone I meet, "How do you feel inside?" Oh, no!

MR. NASH: A man can be very goodhearted and yet very disagreeable to sit next to at dinner. I worked with a goodhearted man for four weeks once who ate his food by pushing it down his throat with his finger. I respected his good heart, but I would rather have sat at another table.

MRS. GOULD: Then you think Mr. Muggeridge's gentleman with his wonderful heart and all the best instincts can still be an annoyance and a bore because he lacks politeness?

ON POLITENESS PAYS:

MR. NASH: I've traveled comfortably through five foreign countries without knowing the languages except for two words. The countries are France, Holland, Portugal, Spain and Italy, and the two words are "please" and "thank you."

MRS. POST: It must be taught. You begin with the child. Another little child comes in to play and your sweet child hurts that other little child, accidentally, and so you tell your little child, "You have hurt your little friend," so that he knows and so that he doesn't do it again. You try to make him understand how the other child is feeling. You say to him one day, "You have been kind today. You have been sympathetic"; and you say to him another day, "You have been a horrid little thing and I would like to spank you."

MRS. GOULD: You feel, then, that training in manners begins with directing a young person's mind to the consideration of someone else?

MRS. POST: Yes. And you must put yourself in the feelings of the child you are talking to and the child you are talking about.

MRS. GOULD: And you think that even goodhearted children who have not had their attention directed to the feelings of others may grow up a little oblivious of other people's feelings?

MRS. POST: That's it. Oblivious. Not their willingness to be unkind. But it is very important for every child to learn what unkindness is.

MR. BONNER: Last summer when I was out in Wyoming and Montana I met sheepherders, ranchers, cowpunchers, and all, almost without exception, had wonderful manners. They always said the polite thing, did the polite thing. Not the polished thing, necessarily, but the polite thing, They were essentially kind and understanding of the other fellow. Then I came back and stopped in several cities on my way home to South Carolina, and it was in the cities that I found the manners, generally speaking, abominable. Neither polite nor polished.

MR. NASH: Neither nature's gentlemen—nor gentlemen.

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: It is like the sea. If I look at it and see it is blue and charming to bathe in, I do not mind if it has monsters in it somewhere. I am not going to explore it. People can create the same happy climate as a blue sea. Even if they have monsters in them somewhere, they can create a happy climate with manners.

MRS. GOULD: Mr. Muggeridge, do you agree? Do you think your good man might be better able to live in society and create mademoiselle's "happy climate" with some schooling in the codes of behavior?

MR. MUGGERIDGE: Yes, I am in favor of it. I am in favor of people's being taught the code of behavior just as I am in favor of their being taught the law, so that they can stay out of trouble. But I do not think either will work well without a moral basis.

MRS. MEYNER: Personally, I find some of the new manners are good. I think the first-name business is good—it's healthy, friendly, a part of progress, and I like it. Just as I like the more informal dress today and people not talking the way they did in Queen Victoria's time.

MR. NASH: I think this first-name business is horrible myself. To hear a moderator on TV addressing his distinguished guest not as Professor Einstein but as "Al"—I think it breaks down reserves essential to self-respect.

MR. BONNER: It seems to me just as artificial and suspect as too polished and elegant manners. And I hope the wheel will go around and false intimacy will go out of fashion just as false elegance has gone out.

MISS HICKEY: But not everyone has been able to accept this fashion. When General Marshall was president of the Red Cross, he listened to me chairing a meeting one day, calling everyone by their first names. Then we had a little break, and the general came up to me and said "Miss Hickey, I'm not going to be able to enter into this in the same way the others are doing. Only Mrs. Marshall calls me George."

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: I do not mind this first name. I am not at all against a familiar attitude when it comes from a kind heart. On the contrary, it comforts me, makes me feel young, and a part of the new life.

MISS HICKEY: It is part of the new informality, certainly. But are there not times when informality is carried too far?

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: The American tourist! His style! You cannot say appearances are not important. For example, the porcupine is a kind, extremely intelligent animal. You could teach him to bring you café au lait in bed. But no one wants him to because of his appearance. It is the same with the American tourist: he appears spoiled, careless. His trousers, very, very low. Shirts outside, loose. Funny patterns—sometimes a naked woman diving in the deep blue sea—and all mixed-up colors. Always the camera. Short sleeves, no tie, any little old casquette—cap—of linen, or nothing. And they sit in the restaurants like that. If they didn't come, we should be much poorer and we realize it—but—well, they may be charming at heart, but how do we know it?

MR. NASH: It is like the damnable blue jeans, leather jackets and dirty white shoes we see on young people here. Sloppy dress is part of a general breakdown of social morale, deliberately sloppy dress.

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: It makes for bad sentiment in France, this tourist dress. The French say, "What do the Americans think we are—they do not put on a tie for us?" We French have a great gratitude toward America and we would like to be able to like the tourists—but we cannot admire their style. That is the real horror about this dress.

MRS. GOULD: You feel it shows lack of respect?

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: If I came to dinner at your house dressed in a pullover and blue jeans, you would certainly think that I had bad manners.

MR. BONNER: But you would be doing it deliberately. The tourist dress is chiefly an economic thing. We have in this country many who have only recently had enough money to spend their vacations traveling. It is a good thing—an excellent thing. But since they consider themselves on vacation, they put on their vacation clothes: their Hawaiian shirt, the cap, even shorts. They wear this vacation costume on vacation and it doesn't matter to them whether they take that vacation in Wisconsin or Florida, Paris or Rome.

MISS HICKEY: Mr. Bonner, you have had a great opportunity to see the world. Would you say there was a difference in the manners of one country and another?

MR. BONNER: No, I don't think it is possible to put a national label on manners. They vary from group to group and from area to area.

I view manners simply as a "civil and honest manner of behavior and speech," the essence of which is something inside you. It's a certain tolerance, a certain understanding, and a willingness to appreciate the other person's point of view. And there I must admit you do find a difference between totalitarian manners and those of the free countries. When Khrushchev speaks of coexistence, he means coexistence according to his way of thinking; he means agreement, provided it's his way. The free country's way is to try to understand the other fellow, to make some compromises, to be courteous.

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: But how you do this still depends on the code—and the set you are in. Basically the code of manners is not to offend anyone; to be your most beautiful self. Bad manners is to sin against yourself—to scratch the head, to pick the nose, to make abominable noises. And then there are the rules of the set. In the army, for instance, the private must salute the officers. In France, you must not wave to a woman on the street—you must at least stop and bow, and admire her. And it is an absolute law that the woman must go first. The most ordinary person in Paris will not pass before you through a door. He will say, "Passez, madame." He has got that law in him. This is manners. This is consideration.

It is the same with such things as dressing for dinner. If men dine alone, ten men together, how they dress I really don't mind. I'm not there. But if a man takes me out to dinner, I like him to smell of a nice soap, to wear his best suit, maybe black tie, so that I can wear my nice little dress. I will know then he has kindness of heart, he has said to himself, "I will make a little effort so that she can look her best."

But these things must be taught, these kind manners. "Darling, please don't chew with your mouth open, it's tremendously ugly." "Please do not fix your hair at table, it is very annoying." The child learns all that very easily with no strain of the mind. These are manners. Are they good? Are they great? I don't know, but they are better than bad manners.

ON FINE MANNERS:

MR. GOULD: Not long ago when President Eisenhower was being sharply criticized by his older brother, Edgar, it seemed to me he showed delightful manners. Ike could have drawn himself up. Instead he said, "Edgar has been criticizing me since I was five." By showing the all-too-human relationship between an older and a younger brother, he put everything in its place, without acrimony.

MISS HICKEY: Mrs. Meyner, in your home, when you were a child, how were you taught manners—and are you glad you were?

MRS. MEYNER: Oh, yes! It has been especially helpful to me to have some knowledge of the art of making people feel at ease. We had some behavior rules, of course, like not to chew with your mouth open, and to say please and thank you, and be polite—but the emphasis was on being interested in other people. We were taught not to talk always about ourselves, and we were also taught to give of ourselves and not just to expect to receive attention.

MRS. GOULD: Were you given any lessons in agreeable conversation?

MRS. MEYNER: No, just that we should try to draw the other person out.

MLLE DE VILMORIN: We were taught that when you sit next to someone at dinner and he asks you questions like, "Did you leave Paris during the summer?" you should answer, "And you? Did you?" And he answers, "Yes, I went to Portugal." And you say, "Tell me about it. Portugal—so interesting!"

That's the art of conversation: "And you?" . . . "Tell me about it."

MISS HICKEY: And how would you answer a young person who said this sort of conversation is artificial—is not sincere?

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: It is true that when I am dining among old friends, it is not needed. Everybody has something to say and everybody is very sincere. But what is sincere? Is it sincere to tell my dear friend, "You look dreadful in that pirate shirt—at your age"? Is it sincere not to speak to my dinner partner? Is there really a lack of sincerity in saying to someone, "Tell me about that"? It puts them at ease and makes the party less boring. The whole table may listen with the greatest of interest. Is it sincere—"Tell me about Portugal"? Why, it is perfectly sincere!

MR. NASH: I'm willing to let the young sit in sincere silence if they want, but I think they really ought to realize that there are many conventions which are neither sincere nor insincere. Should I say that I am being insincere when I address a letter to a complete stranger Dear Mr. So-and-so? Does it convict me of being his friend, his admirer, to call him dear? No, it is only a convention, it is manners.

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: I don't see why, in principle, the young should be so defiant.

MRS. MEYNER: Most everyone has something that is real and true and interesting to offer if you take the trouble to draw him out.

MR. MUGGERIDGE: Herbert Spencer wrote in his autobiography that when sitting next to a bore at dinner he used to plug his ears with cotton wool and continue with his eating. That's a very sincere act, but I should think it would cast quite a pall over the dinner party.

MRS. GOULD: And what do you think that you should do if your dinner partner bores you, mademoiselle?

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: That is difficult. But perhaps, perhaps I wonder, is not this my fault? I say I could not leave Paris because I had typhoid fever. He says, "Typhoid fever, but imagine! I had both legs cut!"

MR. NASH: This reminds me of those wonderful lines of Arthur Guiterman:

Don't tell your friends about your indigestion.

"How are you?" is a greeting, not a question.

MRS. GOULD: How not to be a bore is certainly a part of good manners. There are very goodhearted people who ask awkward prying questions, make personal remarks, interrupt—tell endless anecdotes whose only point is "I was there."

MR. BONNER: And think they are being very sincere. Which brings us to the question of whether you can be stupid and still well-mannered. I doubt it.

MR. NASH: This puts a perverse thought into my mind, and that is that one reason we should be polite is that rudeness is too precious a commodity to be dribbled away here and there. We should save it for occasions when we feel we really need to insult someone.

MR. BONNER: I think if you believe it is insincere to have party manners and party clothes, you must refuse invitations to go out. That is the only really sincere way to handle this.

MR. GOULD: Just as we dress up in our best clothes for a party, we should display our best manners, if we have them.

MR. BONNER: I think so too. But training requires discipline, and under the influence of Freud discipline has been very much discarded as being harmful and warping to the nature of children. I have never seen that discipline, properly administered, ever warped anyone in the wrong direction.

MR. NASH: I agree very strongly. I think a child finds security in discipline. He likes to know what the rules are so he can settle down contentedly to run on the rails instead of the crossties.

MR. GOULD: I regret seeing able, talented young people who are terribly ill at ease in a group just because they haven't learned any of the things we are talking about—how to forget oneself by interest in the other person, for instance. I sometimes think a few rules would save them years of difficult adjustment, make them better and happier persons.

MRS. MEYNER: I think discipline is necessary, but I also think that explanations should be given as to why rules are important, and that parents should try to teach manners as much by example as by rules.

MRS. GOULD: And how about teachers? Do you think that if strict rules of courtesy were adopted in our schools, the behavior of students in general would be improved?

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: I think many children do not have good manners toward their teachers because they are not told to. In France, we were trained to behave in a respectful way toward our elders and we defend that training. Let us say we have a friend to the house and one of the children, twelve or thirteen, says after she has left, "Oh, don't you think she had such a silly hat?" Then we say immediately, "Leave the room, dear child. Go and make fun of our generation on the other side of the door. Think anything you like about us, but do not say it in front of us." We defend our generation.

MRS. GOULD: Young people have never been old, rarely experienced severe illness or tragic loss. It is difficult for them to imagine these feelings, and to show consideration for them. Would not rules help here?

MR. MUGGERIDGE: Probably the basic quality in good manners is humility in the Christian sense, the awareness that all men and women, whoever they may be, are very much the same. And the more materialistic a society becomes, the more difficult it is to sustain and develop that particular quality.

MRS. MEYNER: To quote Emerson: "No manners are finer than the most awkward manifestation of good will to others." Good manners are just good human relationships, basically.

MR. BONNER: They are also good business. If you want to get on in business ——

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: Or society ——

MR. BONNER: —— or any pursuit of life where you come into contact with people, you have to have good manners.

MR. MUGGERIDGE: Ah, but the very best manners will be disinterested. All forms of generosity, of giving, are, at their highest, a desire for the other person involved to have something, rather than a hope for gain for the giver in terms of business advancement, or even love.

MLLE. DE VILMORIN: But we do have interests in teaching manners, all the same. We give to our children good chances when we give them manners. When they succeed, we are proud of them. We don't want our children to make us ashamed, we don't want them, or us, insulted because they have acted badly. Manners are a great treasure which we can give our children, and I think we should be happy to give it to them even if it is to our advantage.

MR. MUGGERIDGE: What we want today is an Aristotelian mean, a middle way. Much of the breakdown in manners today is due to the excessive discipline and artificiality of the past. Today we want discipline, but also freedom; manners, but resistance to artificial manners ——

MRS. GOULD: Education of the heart and soul for kindness ——

MR. MUGGERIDGE: —— the body for grace, and the mind for faith. All these things minister together to produce a harmonious and good and unegotistic human being and an agreeable and civilized society.

MRS. MEYNER: And just the sort of world I would want my children to grow up in. END

ON BAD MANNERS:

MR. GOULD: In Russia, in Sochi, we were staying at the very best hotel—it is a resort—and there were a lot of well-dressed, nice-looking people there. But in the dining room I saw a young woman of about twenty-five, beautiful in her evening gown, leaning way over her soup plate, holding a spoon half full of soup in one hand and waving a well-chewed bone with the other—absent-mindedly feeding herself and staring at me, as a visiting American.

MR. MUGGERIDGE: In Russia people try to belong to the lower classes.

MR. GOULD: And very successfully, it seems to me.

MR. MUGGERIDGE: Lord Birkenhead, who was a famous figure in London some twenty or thirty years ago, was once in his club and somebody started telling him an interminable anecdote. It went on and on and he listened attentively for a while. Then, finally, he rang the bell and said to one of the club's servants, "Would you mind listening to the end of this gentleman's anecdote? Because I have to go home."

In the channel fog

HER ENGINE FALTERED

A few minutes out of Dover, fog wrapped the flimsy Bleriot monoplane like a shroud.

The pretty young woman in the smart flying costume she'd designed it herself—"bloomers, blouse, and hood of mauve satin") glanced at her compass. It was the first time she'd ever used one. She thought of instructor Hamel's parting words:

"Be sure to keep on course, Miss Quimby, for if you get five miles out of the way, you'll be over the North Sea, and you know what that means."

She climbed to 6,000 feet. Freezing cold and still fog.

She pointed her nose down. The comforting clatter of the Gnome engine changed to a coughing splutter. It was conking out! She leveled off, figuring how she'd ditch. To her relief, the engine suddenly took hold. Harriet re-checked her compass.

Some time later, breaking into clear sky, she saw a stretch of beach below. She put down at Hardelot: and on April 16, 1912, Harriet Quimby, first American woman to earn a pilot's license, became the first woman in the world to fly the English Channel.

As charming as she was brave, Harriet Quimby combined the thorough femininity and the self-confident ability which make American women like no others on earth. And help make this country so strong in character that investing in America is the wisest thing any American can do!

The airport taxi draws up to the small red-brick house at 8157 Vardaman Drive in University City, Missouri, and quiz sensation Teddy Nadler steps out, a short, dark man in ill-fitting cotton slacks and a loud open-necked sports shirt. He has just returned from two weeks of personal appearances in New York.

"Hi, doll! Hi, baby!" he greets his 132-pound son, Michael, racing out to greet him. His two other sons crowd about excitedly as Teddy gathers up assorted paper packages and tips the cab driver. ("Eighty-five cents! I must've been crazy," he moans a bit later.)

Struggling up the front steps, Teddy kisses his black-haired wife, Clara, who waits for him, smilingly drying a dish. Once indoors, Teddy kisses and hugs his three sons exuberantly again and again, then sinks into a chair, beaming with joy and relief at being home again at last.

"I was at Grossinger's for the weekend. Grossinger's," he repeats louder to his wife, who is hard of hearing. "Jennie sat and ate with me. Jennie Grossinger. Senator Wayne Morse shook my hand, I had my picture taken a dozen times with four show girls from Damn Yankees—they turned the spotlight on me in the dining room. It was horrible. No, they didn't give me any free cigarettes this time," he tells his disappointed wife. "Here, boys, I got something for you." He struggles to untie the twine on one of his parcels. "I made a personal appearance at a food chain and they gave me these." Amid appreciative "oh's" and "ah's" he distributes plastic packages of dried prunes to his sons and wife.

Smiling widely, Clara opens the closet door of her prettily furnished living room and produces her "surprise"—four free packages of oatmeal. "From some man who heard about your ulcer," she explains. "And your books came. They're in the bedroom."

HOW AMERICA LIVES

"My books! My books!" Returning the oatmeal to the clothes closet, Teddy rushes out and returns, staggering under the load of an encyclopedia, gift of "some millionaire" Teddy met at the Advertising Club in New York. "I gotta look something up, see if they're any good," Teddy worries, hastily leafing through the volumes to Mozart. He squints painfully over the fine print, then announces in a pleased voice, "They're O.K. Gee." The famous winner of $152,000 on a quiz show looks proudly at the first books of any kind that he has ever owned.

"Wait," he suddenly recalls, turning to his suitcase. "I got something for you, Clara." With a bashful smile, he hands her a white jewel case.

His barelegged wife, wearing a bargain-basement sleeveless cotton dress, regards the slim box speechlessly for a moment, then opens it. She pulls out two strands of pearls. "Hey, nice. Who gave 'em to you?"

"Gave 'em to me?" Teddy looks outraged. "They cost me twenty dollars!"

"Wish I had known," worries Clara. "I paid twenty-nine cents for some just yesterday."

She puts the pearls carefully back into the box and smiles radiantly. "I'm living at last, understand? Really living!" Her glance takes in her immaculate living room with its pale gray walls and gray viscose carpet, the blond birch furniture and dinette set with touches of brass. Every stick of furniture in their newly purchased home is new, for when they moved from the three-room railroad flat which had been their home for twelve years, the Nadlers sold or gave away everything they had.

"Antiques, I'm crazy about antiques, big mahogany commodes with marble tops"—Clara indicates with her hand furniture six feet high—"but here the rooms are too small. So we buy new, everything very plain, very simple." In the boys' bedroom are colonial reproductions with brass hardware and a double bed and a single cot where the three boys sleep. Ted and Clara's bedroom is gay with ruffled chintz. "I got an automatic washer and drier, a dishwasher and garbage disposer and a telephone." Her blue eyes grow bigger as she enumerates all the miracles which befell the Nadlers in a single year. "Before, we used to be so poor, I tore up old sheets to make the boys handkerchiefs."

"Oh, everybody does that," Teddy tells her.

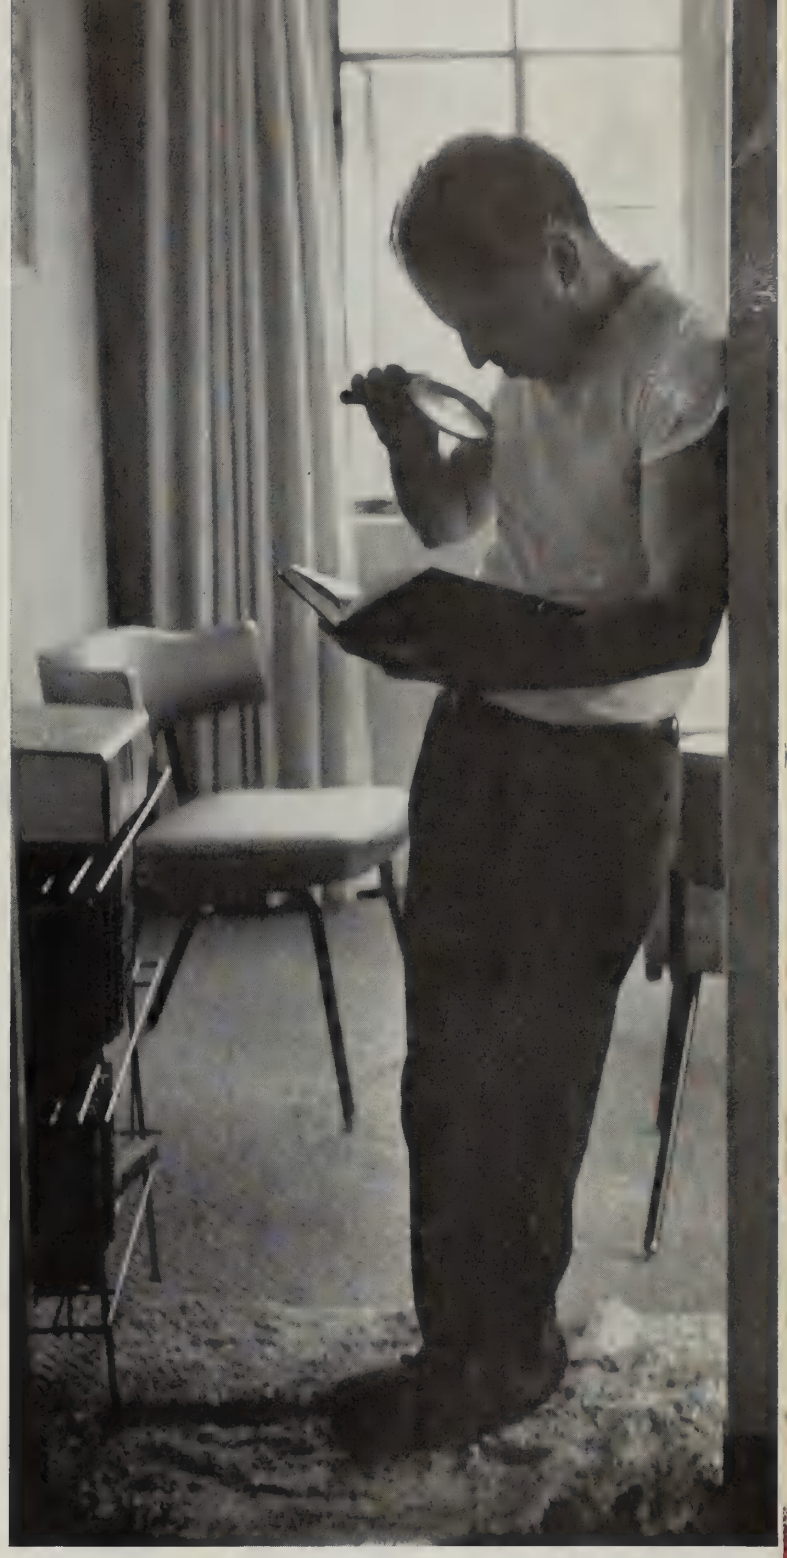
Ted has always been the family shopper.
He buys the groceries, hunts bargains in clothes for Clara and the children.
She goes practically nowhere, rarely has any new dresses.

Teddy may growl that the money slips away too fast.

But Clara is ecstatic: "I'm living at last. Really living!"

The Nadlers moved from a three-room apartment into a home they own outright.



Before the $64,000 Challenge, Ted had only one suit, now has three to choose from.

No installment buying for the Nadlers. They paid spot cash for a houseful of new electric appliances.

Teddy and his gift encyclopedia, first books he's ever owned. People always laughed at his bookishness. One day, in 1940, he quit reading everything, including the daily paper.

"Here I'm supposed to be deliriously happy with a home of our own," he comments, fiddling in a helpless manner with a broken front-door handle. "A house is like a cancer, it eats you up. We spend more on incidentals now than my whole salary used to be. And all that lawn to cut," he moans, gesturing through the picture window framed in new $100 oyster-white draperies. "I got a hundred feet of frontage. Supposing they put in a sidewalk, it will cost me a fortune, and all those bushes and trees and things, they bring caterpillars and mosquitoes. I got no time to take on the insect world."

Hurrying over to the new rose sofa, he snaps off a table lamp which is not in use. "We've moved into the Higher Brackets," he announces dramatically. "At this rate we'll be broke in two years and then who's going to pay me enough to live in this expensive neighborhood?"

Of his $152,000 winnings over the past year and a half, Teddy has paid (groaningly) $82,000 in taxes. Their nine-year-old, two-bedroom house in University City, a suburb of St. Louis, Missouri, cost $15,000. Teddy has paid for it outright and spent another $9,000 on furniture and appliances. New clothes, old medical bills, dental work for both him and Clara, plus living expenses, have whittled down the remainder of his winnings to $32,000. He has made no investments, but keeps the money in banks.

When fame and fortune came to Teddy Nadler, he was earning $1.98 an hour as a Civil Service laborer at an Army depot in St. Louis. He tried to get a year's leave of absence and, failing this, quit last winter, as he is now in an income-tax bracket which makes it foolish for him to earn any more money until 1958, he says.

One of the first purchases he made with his prize money was a hi-fi record player. "For fifteen years I never bought a record," cries Teddy, passionate music lover. Now he spends five or six hours daily on an aluminum chaise in his basement "rathskeller" listening to his slim newcollection of perhaps twenty classics. As he lies there immobile, eyes closed, sometimes all night until five in the morning, Teddy is not just simply listening to music. He's thinking about the composers. "Mozart, dead at thirty-five—a pauper, unrecognized, such a master! Such immortal music! I could cry!" With Handel's Water Music, he is floating down the Thames in a royal barge in the company of George I—"pompous, and fat, with a Germanic face and powdered wig. He can't speak English," Teddy rattles off about the English monarch.

"Clara, now," he sighs, getting up and preparing to go shopping, "she thinks I'm playing the same record over and over. She can't tell one from the other. If it weren't for all that money I won, she'd never stand for this"—he gestures about his cozy hideaway in the cellar with its cardboard printed sign in one corner, "No Quiz Questions, Please!"

"I'm goin' shopping, Clara!" he calls as he leaves the house a moment later. Since his marriage fifteen years ago, Teddy has done all the family shopping. He buys the groceries, all the family clothing, even lingerie and stockings for his wife. Until quite recently, Teddy owned only one suit and his wife nothing more than $2.98 cotton dresses. But for the boys he has always spent generously. Teddy will never allow Clara to darn the boys' socks or have their shoes resoled. The moment the boys' clothes show the least sign of wear, Teddy, product of an orphanage, throws them out and buys new. A chronic sufferer who neglects his own health (he lost his teeth from pyorrhea, for instance), Teddy has always seen that his three sons receive the finest of medical care. "Five dollars a visit at the pediatrician's," says Clara. "And Teddy pays the nurse before the boys see the doctor."

"Can I get waited on today?" Teddy is calling grouchily to the busy clerks in one of suburban St. Louis' large department stores. "I'm bleedin' to death." This is in reference to the duodenal ulcer which has hospitalized him three times

Ted's favorite purchase: a hi-fi player and a collection of classical records.

They threw out or sold all their furniture. Everything in the house is now all new.

Mike and Bruce got bikes from their father's winnings; Joey, a tricycle. They've demanded nothing more.

Ted tells the boys stories, "fantastic improbable tales," he says, "in which the hero—that's me—goes to a remote part of the world on an adventurous mission, or funny stories like hiding all the food when relatives come to call."

Product of an orphanage, Ted declares nothing is too good for his children.

"We've never had a baby sitter," says Clara. "Ted wouldn't trust anybody. He thinks it's cruel to let babies cry without someone to comfort them. And I do too. Love is everything in the world."

since 1938. Although it keeps him in constant pain, he refuses to submit to an operation because he distrusts all surgeons.

A clerk looks up and smiles, recognizing Teddy. "Be right over, Mr. Nadler."

Now a buzz of recognition surrounds Teddy; people nudge one another and whisper and stare; a few come up and shake his hand and congratulate him. Teddy's thorny manner mellows somewhat and he responds with shy smiles and polite "Thank you, ma'am"s.

As the clerk hurries deferentially over, Teddy picks up a pair of $3.98 men's slacks from the counter and asks, "These the cheapest you've got?"

The noise increases in the aisles and some say audibly, "With all the money he's got!" and "If I was in his shoes ——" and "Some nerve!"

A harassed frown puckers Teddy's brow as he buys his sons cotton sports shirts ("They must have thirty-forty of these already") and boys' socks ("Socks, socks!" he cries. "Every week buying more socks!"). He counts out the cash carefully from a roll of one-dollar bills and without a thank-you to the clerk elbows his way grimly through the staring crowds and out the revolving door.

"Who wants to be in my shoes?" he explodes, slamming the door of his secondhand Plymouth and then locking it and the three other doors. "I got ulcers, and arthritis in my shoulder. Down at the depot I used to lift reams of paper weighing a hundred and twenty, a hundred and thirty pounds. I feel miserable all the time. I got no job, no future. And the CONTINUED ON PAGE 190

Sam swallowed hard and said. "You don't have to ——"

"I'm talking facts, Mr. Bowden. I'm not talking to see how much I can get you unset. And I wouldn't talk to your wife like this. If he'd hit the boy the way he wanted to, we'd have had us a real bad time trying to figure where the bullet came from. But he missed and he put two holes in the shack and that gave us a line of sight. It couldn't be direct, because of the way the slug will drop, especially after going through a three-quarter-inch board. It put us on a line up the side of a knoll the kids call Shady Hill. There's a lot of back roads up in there and I know from a fact that there are plenty of places you can look down right into that camp. I've got a deputy working on it, and he'll find where the man with the gun was when he took aim. We were too late for any roadblock because we didn't know what to look for. I understand you can tell us who to look for, Mr. Bowden."

"I can't prove he fired the shot. I can't prove he poisoned our dog. But I know it was Cady both times. Max Cady. He got out of a Federal prison last year in September, I think. He drives a gray Chevvy sedan, about eight years old. You can phone Captain Mark Dutton in New Essex and he'll give you all you need to know on him."

"He must have a pretty strong hate for you folks."

"I was instrumental in getting him jailed for life. But they let him out after thirteen years. He was in for rape of a fourteen-year-old Australian girl during the war. He comes from bad stock. He's vicious and I think he's more than half demented."

"Is he smart? Shrewd?"

"Yes."

"Let's take a look at this situation now. Suppose he's picked up. He'll be miles from here. He won't have a rifle with him. He'll deny firing at any boy. He'll yell persecution. I don't know any good way to hold him, under the law."

"That's just fine."

"Now you've got to think the way those people think. All right. This was carefully planned. He had to spend some time scouting the situation. So he had to think of what he was going to do after he killed the boy. He knew you'd point suspicion at him. So he'd have to either brazen it out, depending on no evidence showing up, or he'd have it all set so he could hide out. Killing a kid would attract a lot of attention. He couldn't be certain somebody didn't see him up on those back roads. So I'd say he's got a hole to hide in. He'll have it all stocked and he'll be in some out-of-the-way place where nobody will look for him."

"You're so optimistic."

"I'm trying to be practical. So you can know what to expect. I'll bet he's sore at himself for missing. I think he was planning to move fast and get out of the area. He may try to keep on moving fast. I'd say this is the time to be just as careful as you can."

The sheriff stood up and smiled wearily. "I'll get hold of the people up there in New Essex and then I'll put out a pickup order on him. I think the thing to do would be lock up you people."

"I don't find that excruciatingly funny, sheriff."

"I can see how you wouldn't have much sense of humor left this afternoon."

"What can I do, sir?" Tommy asked Sam.

"Could you go —— No, I'll do that. I'll go over and pick up Bucky and bring him back here. Stay with the gals, Tommy."

"All right, Mr. Bowden."

"And thanks. Thanks a lot."

It took him just a little over a half hour in the station wagon to reach camp. He found Sheriff Kantz with Mr. Menard in the administration cottage. The young man with them was introduced as Deputy Ronnie Gideon.

Menard was obviously troubled. "I don't know what we could have done to avoid this, Mr. Bowden."

"I don't blame you in any way," Sam told him.

"I am finding it very hard to accept the fact this was intentional. Sheriff Kantz assures me it was."

The sheriff was tossing a small object into the air and catching it. "This is the slug. Badly deformed. Thirty caliber, I'd say. Mr. Menard here put a slew of kids to looking for it until they found it."

"We're saying it was a stray bullet," Menard said. "Everybody is excited enough as it is. But I don't know what the parents are going to say when they get letters saying a stray bullet wounded a camper. I'm sorry, Mr. Bowden. I shouldn't be complaining about my problems when yours is so much greater."

"Did you find the place where the shot was fired from?" Sam asked.

The deputy nodded. "Rock ledge. Prone position. About thirty feet from the road up there. He matted the moss on the rock. It was still springing back up. No car tracks, no empty cartridge case. Did find a chewed cigar butt. He'd rubbed it out on the rock. Mouth end still soggy."

"If he'd killed the boy," the sheriff said, "we'd be sending it along to the lab to see if we could get a type on the saliva. But I don't see as how it does much good."

"Cady smokes cigars."

The sheriff looked blandly at Sam. "Hope you got a permit for that thing you're carrying?"

"What? Oh, of course. Yes, I have a permit."

"What do you plan to do now?"

"We were going to take Jamie out of camp today anyway. I think I'll go over to the girls' camp and get Nancy's gear and check her out."

"And go home?"

"No. I'm going to leave my wife and children in the place where . . . she has been staying with the younger boy."

"Any chance of this Cady knowing where that is?"

"I don't see how he could."

The sheriff pursed his lips. "Sounds O.K. to me. Leave them all there until he's picked up. But suppose he isn't picked up? How are you going to know when he gives up and goes away?"

"I guess we won't know."

"Can't keep your family hid out forever."

"I know that. I've thought of that. But what else can I do? Do you have any ideas?"

"The only one I got I'm not proud of, Mr. Bowden. Think of him like he's a tiger. You want to get him in out of the brush. So you stake out a goat and you hide in a tree."

Sam stared at him. "If you could possibly think I'd use my wife or any of my kids as bait for ——"

"I told you I wasn't proud of it. You can guess what a tiger will do, I've heard, but you can't guess about a crazy man. He tried sniping this time. Next time he might try something else. I guess it's best to keep them hid. It's the best you can do."

Sam looked at his watch. "I'd like to collect Jamie's gear and pick up Bucky, Mr. Menard."

"I've had his gear packed and brought up to the mess hall. Bucky is with my wife. I'll go get him. I'm sorry this was such a bad ending to Jamie's month."

"I'm glad it wasn't worse."

"We'll look forward to having him back with us next year."

Sam said good-by to the sheriff and thanked him. The sheriff assured him there was a pretty good chance of Cady's being picked up for questioning. But there was a hollow ring to his assurances.

He was back at the hospital by quarter to five. Nancy was very surprised when she found he had checked her out of camp, and disappointed she would have no chance to say good-by, but she soon accepted it as a logical and inevitable decision.

She nodded slowly and said, "I know. There's so many hills. I couldn't be outdoors anywhere in daylight without wondering if ——" And she shuddered.

Sam phoned Bill Stetch from a booth in the hospital lobby and told him the situation and said he wouldn't be back in the office until Friday morning.
